FOR "THE FRIEND."

Richard Davies, although a minister in unity with his Friends, knew what it was to suffer from the opposition of some of the disaffected and contentious professors of the Truth. The Society of Friends, from its very inception, seems at times to have suffered from unruly spirits, whose actions were a source of anxiety to the more settled members. So we find that even the subject of this narrative was occasionally ill-treated by "false brethren." One instance can be recorded in his own words. He says: "Once I was at the Ball-and-Mouth Meeting, and there were in the gallery several troublesome people, and none of our ministering brethren, in true unity with us, but George Whitehead and William Gibson. The gallery being pretty full, one of them seemed to strive to keep me out, and our Friends G. Whitehead and W. Gibson perceiving it, made way for me to come up to them; another of them had been speaking long in the meeting, and had made many weary of him. I was under great concern in my spirit for the honor and exaltation of the name of the Lord and his Truth, and the ease of many that were under weights and burthens; yet, for quietness-sake, I silently bore the weight and exercise that was upon me, until he was done. Then my mouth was opened in the name and power of God, who had compassion on his afflicted seed, and caused the life and light of his countenance to overshadow the meeting, to the comfort and great satisfaction of the faithful. When I had thus eased my spirit, a concern came upon our Friend and brother, George Whitehead, and he sweetly concluded the meeting in prayer."

Soon after the above, a remarkable meeting was held near the town of Aylesbury, where R. Davies was led to speak on the subject of church discipline, and to advise Friends to adhere to the rules recently adopted regarding men's and women's meetings. Speaking of church officials, he told them, "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us also, to set up our men's and women's meetings, that the care and concern of the Church of Christ might be upon holy, self-denying men and women, who might take care of the fatherless and widows in their afflictions, and keep themselves unspotted from the world, which the Apostle James says 'is pure religion and undefiled before God.'" He also quoted the Scripture, "Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the Church of God, which He hath purchased with his own blood."

After R. Davies had concluded, one of the opposition arose, and spoke by way of reflection upon what had been delivered. When he had done, Thomas Ellwood suggested to the meeting that "all should sit down, and wait to feel the power of God amongst them, and let that decide whether Richard Davies did speak in the name and power of God among them that day."—This was agreed to; and a solemn silence ensued. Then, several Friends were constrained to speak with heavenly power, and tenderly testified that what had been spoken was "in the name and power of God." In the midst of these remarks, there stood up a young man, who with much feeling declared: "There is a man come this day amongst us, I know not from whence he came nor where he goes, but this I am satisfied,—the Lord sent him here, and his power and presence is with him, and his testimony is for the God of Truth!" Finally this meeting closed;—it had commenced at ten o'clock in the morning, and did not end until about ten in the evening. The Truth had been vindicated; the opposing party had been silenced;—and Richard Davies, in commenting upon it, says, "Blessed be the Lord, that doth not leave his people without a witness to himself; and He is the preserver and defender of all his people that wait upon Him. They that trust in Him are as Mount Zion, that cannot be moved."

There are many incidents in the lives of some of our early Friends, clearly establishing the fact that they were not under a delusion, or merely the victims of imagination, when they claimed to be guided and influenced by the Holy Spirit. They lived such watchful lives, and their spiritual senses were kept so alert by faithfulness to the inspeaking Guide, that they were ever ready to judge what was good and evil, and detect the difference between the false and true. A striking instance of this fact is found in the following:

Of a First-day morning during one of R. Davies' visits to London, he was taken sick, so as to be unable to attend meeting. But in the afternoon, although still very unwell, he felt impressed with a call to go to the Ball-and-Mouth Meeting. His friends reasoned with him, but to no avail. When he reached the meeting it was already gathered, many people being present. As he walked into the gallery, a man was preaching from the text, "Be ye perfect, even as your heavenly Father is perfect." After listening a few minutes, R. Davies arose, and challenged the authority by which the man was speaking. The latter stopped his preaching, and with much anger went out of the meeting, followed by a considerable number of people who sympathized with him. It was afterwards ascertained that a wager had been made that the speaker who had been so summarily stopped, would be able to preach in a Quakers' Meeting and not be discovered as an impostor. Richard Davies remarks: We have cause to bless the Lord for his goodness to his people, that gives them a discerning spirit to judge between good and evil; and between those that serve God in Truth and righteousness, and all deceitful hypocrites, who are to be judged by and condemned by the word of his power." Is this spirit of discernment still conspicuous in the Society of Friends?

About 1685 an ancient law was enforced against Friends, by which they were fined twenty pounds per month for absenting themselves from the established worship. As this amount was equal to $100 of our currency, and as the relative value of money in that day was much greater than at present, it can readily be appreciated what distress such an unjust enactment created. In a single county of England alone, Friends had property taken from them to the extent of 8,000 pounds, during the enforcement of this measure. Of this large sum, not a penny reached the king's exchequer; it was all consumed in the costs and official robbery connected with its collection. To correct this great evil, R. Davies, in company with his excellent friend George Whitehead, called on the friend of the former, the Earl of Powis, who was an intimate friend of the king's. The earl listened with the utmost kindness to the facts as presented by the Quakers—and used his influence with the king on behalf of the sufferers. An order was at once obtained, directed to all the sheriffs of the kingdom, ordering them to stop proceedings that had been instituted under the obnoxious law. So that persecution quickly ceased.

One of the last acts of Richard Davies was to make a visit with some other Friends, under an appointment of the Yearly Meeting, to Queen Anne. They presented to her the Yearly Meeting's acknowledgment of the liberty and protection its members had experienced during her reign; and he was particularly led to address the queen on this occasion.

But his useful life was now drawing to a close. The early part of it had been spent in toil and suffering on account of the Truth he so early began to love; but his latter days were passed in serenity and quiet rest. He toiled for his Saviour up to the very last; but the Christian's heritage of faith and confidence were with him until he laid down his head in peace. Then a short illness closed the scene. He died in the year 1707, in the seventy-third year of his age.

Such vigorous, active, Christian lives as that of Richard Davies, ought to teach good lessons to the Friends of our own day. We admire his courage, his love, his consistency, his ardent zeal; we see how Divine grace helped him, and how even amidst afflictions his heavenly Master blessed him. Let us remember that the excellent cause he sought to promote, has need of advocates in our day. Let us recollect that the same God who endowed him with the lovely attributes we so admire, can also enrich us with all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus, if we only seek them with the same fervor that Richard Davies did.

Breaking the Jug.

Among the German "Brethren in Christ," in Pennsylvania, whom we have known and loved, few were more honored and esteemed than the late Isaac Price, who was eminent as a preacher of the Gospel, and a wise and gracious counsellor—while at the same time he was diligent and prosperous in the business of this world. The following instance, related by a friend in Germantown, will illustrate his thoughtfulness and conscientiousness.

In the gone-by days when some things were not seen in as clear a light, as they are at the present time, Isaac Price for many years kept a country store, where supplies of all kinds were furnished to the farmer folk in the vicinity. In these days, ardent spirits was one of the commodities which were usually obtainable at the country store, and hence were included in the stock of goods sold by Isaac Price.

One day, a man who was already indebted to him some forty dollars, came to buy a quantity of goods. His means were somewhat limited, and he was not able to buy all that he desired, but he took care among his earlier purchases to include a gallon of liquor—and then as he watched the expenditure of money he brought, he said he wanted to get his girl a pair of shoes, but he should have to let them go for the time, as he was unable to pay for them.

His words sunk into the heart of Isaac Price. There came before his mind the sight of the poor little shoelless girl, deprived of what she needed for her comfort, while her father had spent for rum the money which should have bought her shoes. He studied over the matter for a little time, and finally said to the man:

"If you will let me break this jug, and promise never to drink any more strong drink, I will give you a pair of shoes for your daughter, and will forgive you all you owe me."

It was his customer's turn now to do some thinking. He did it; and after due consideration, he accepted the proposal. Isaac Price broke the man's jug, spilled the contents on the ground, set all the liquor he had in the store running, and never sold any more of it.

Years after, as Isaac Price was going to some neighboring church to attend a meeting, he was met at the railway station by a person who was to convey him to the place appointed. The man, though a stranger, seemed to know Isaac, who, after some little conversation, remarked:

"You seem to have the advantage of me. I do not know you."

"Do not know me?" said he. "I am the man whose jug you broke." This explained the matter. That jug-breaking was the turning-point in his life, and he was glad to take Isaac with him and show him what a comfortable and happy home he had, as the result of breaking that jug.—Selected.

We regret that a number of Friends should have been disappointed by not receiving their copies of THE FRIEND at the usual time last week. The paper was mailed as usual on Friday, but in consequence of a misapprehension on the part of the post-office authorities, in regard to the character of the Index, issued with the last number, was detained at the post-office in this city until Seventh-day.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Selections from the Journal of William Evans.

The comprehensive and valuable journal of our late beloved Friend, William Evans, was first published about twenty-one years ago. Apprehending that, after so long a time, there may be not a few, especially of our younger members, who are not familiar with the work, it is proposed to make some selections therefrom for the columns of THE FRIEND. This is entered upon with the earnest, hopeful desire that the passages chosen should have a stirring effect upon such as may have somewhat lost sight of his lively Christian solicitude for the welfare of our religious Society, for the bringing of people to Christ, and for the spread and exaltation of the kingdom of the Redeemer in the earth. And no less for a younger class, who may never have witnessed his fervent zeal and pleading entreaty, that his hearers might come to Christ Jesus, the Living Vine, and be engrafted into Him to their unspeakable joy, and to bringing forth fruit to his praise. To both these classes, the latter particularly, is commended the careful perusal of the original work, of which the following are but extracts and specimens:—

His journal thus opens: "For the purpose of commemorating the mercy and goodness of God extended to me from early life, and to encourage others to yield to the visitations and convictions of his Holy Spirit, that through obedience thereto the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ may spread and prevail, I have believed it right, from time to time, to preserve memorandums of his dealings with me, and to leave them as a testimony to his unflinching goodness and faithfulness to the children of men, who love, serve, honor and put their trust in him alone. I believe that George Fox, Robert Barclay, Isaac Pennington, William Penn, George Whitehead and many others were divinely prepared and anointed by Christ Jesus, the minister of the sanctuary and true tabernacle which God hath pitched and not men, for reviving and effectually preaching the same Gospel of life and salvation in its original purity and clearness, which had been much less sight of through a long night of apostasy. And though the spirit of anti-christ, and some who are more or less darkened and deluded by it, may seek to obscure the spiritual nature of the Gospel as professed from the beginning by Friends, yet a blast will be brought over all such attempts in the Lord's time; and He will raise up, from generation to generation, living witnesses of the power and coming of the Lord Jesus in his spiritual appearance in the souls of his children, who, as they are faithful in the day of small things to the unfoldings of his Spirit, will be qualified in living faith to call Jesus, Lord and Saviour, both from what they have experienced of his redeeming power in their hearts, and from a true and certain belief of all the doctrines and precepts of the Gospel as recorded in the Holy Scriptures.

My beloved and honored parents, Jonathan and Hannah Evans, were true believers in these doctrines, and their lives and conversation were consistent therewith. Walking in the simplicity and uprightness, which the Truth leads into, they become bright examples in the Church of Christ, and growing from stature to stature, were made pillars in the Lord's house that went no more out.

I was born in Philadelphia on the 5th of the Tenth Month, 1787, and at a suitable age was placed at a school under the care of a member of the Monthly Meeting, to which I belonged. I soon contracted a strong fondness for liberty and play in the streets with my school fellows, with some of whom, as I grew in years, I was at times involved in childish disputes, more excited by rude boys, who delighted to urge a Quaker child into broils, than any fondness myself for such collision—though I felt a strong disinclination to submit to imposition. I underwent much persecution in the street on account of a plain dress, an aversion which increased with age. My mother watched over us with affectionate and religious solicitude, taking suitable opportunities to induce serious reflection, telling us that our Heavenly Father saw us wherever we were and knew all that we did—that He was displeased when we did wrong, and that there was a place of everlasting punishment if we died in sin—but, on the contrary, He would continue to love us if we did right, and receive us into heaven if we thus lived and died in his favor. But she did not adopt the modern system, relying entirely upon reasoning with the children to convince their understanding, but at times resorted to correction to support authority and procure submission to her dictates.

Keeping to the truth and strict integrity were early inculcated and enforced, any departure from which brought distress over me.

Disinclination to restraint increased with years, and condemnation for sin rendered serious things and the society of religious people irksome to me. I sought the company of those whose passions and propensities were unsubdued, and took more satisfaction in their conversation than in the sobriety and reserve of the lovers of the cross. By such means, corruption strengthened, the innocence of childhood was tarnished, and my carnal appetites began to seek indulgences totally at variance with purity of heart, and that life which my parents earnestly labored to inculcate and keep their children in."

[The allusion by our friend to his fondness for liberty and play in the streets; his being then involved in childish disputes with his schoolmates; his exposure to rude taunts of these, on account of the plain dress, which then, as now, characterized the consistent Friend—bound to the maintenance of the testimonies as well as principles of the Society, proceeding from the same root—are points and experiences worthy of the thoughtful, careful attention of those of similar age and proclivities in the present day. While these, through the reproofs of instruction in his breast, added to the watchful, prayerful solicitude of his religiously concerned parents, came to be seen by him to be "at variance with purity of heart," and to his preservation and growth in the ever blessed Truth, they were no doubt helpful in teaching thus early to "endure hardness," as the Apostle Paul exhorted Timothy, and also as the commencement of a life of warfare against the spirit of the world, which helped to make W. E. such a fearless and faithful champion for the cause and cross of Christ throughout his remarkably dedicated Christian pilgrimage. Likethe youthful David, he hereby learned in whom to trust for weapons and strength "to thump down, pulling down of strongholds;" so that afterwards, when called to contend with the Goliaths of worldly stature, he was enabled, through the Holy Spirit, to stand for the law and the testimony so as finally to overcome. A Prophet has written: "It is good for a man to bear the yoke in his youth." And many have proved the unspeakable advantage of taking the cross of Jesus upon them, of enlisting early under his banner, and walking humbly in the footsteps of the flock of Christ's companions unto eternal life. How exceedingly great and multiplied are the advantages and blessings of these! They have the promise not only of the life that now is—so short, uncertain and unsatisfying—but of that which is to come. And what are all created things, when a never-dying soul and an endless eternity are placed in the opposite scale?

May our young Friends, like this honored servant of his Master, strive in their day, with the measure of grace received, to become valiants in a cause glorious above all others—a cause dignified with immortality and crowned with eternal life. May they receive with meekness the engrafted word which is able to save the soul, and through power, from on high, experience a being so settled and grounded upon Christ, the living foundation, as to become like plants grown up in their youth, and as corner-stones polished after the similitude of a palace.]

"In the Fifth Month, 1799, the boarding-school at Westown, instituted by our Yearly Meeting, was opened for the reception of scholars, and I was one of the first twenty admitted there. The school was frequently visited by the committee of the Yearly Meeting, who had charge of the institution, and by ministers travelling through the country. Under their ministry, and sometimes in the silent meetings, my mind was brought to contemplate the character of the holy men of old, who served God in their generation, and sincere desires were sometimes felt that I might become like them."

FROM "THE BRITISH FRIEND,"

Peculiarities of Friends.

THEIR OBJECTIONS TO CONGREGATIONAL SINGING.

I have already, for the purpose of illustrating Friends' views on congregational singing, made a comparison between reading the Scriptures and singing hymns. This subject may be further illustrated by a comparison between the devotional acts of prayer and praise. There is no prescribed form for the utterance of either prayer or praise. Mere rhythm of words, harmony of sound, or attitude of body, will not alter the character of either. Their character is determined by attitude of soul, and the outward expression of the soul's inward exercise. Many religious denominations recognize this to some extent, so far as prayer is concerned, for although in their congregations prayers are appointed to be offered at stated times by men specially appointed to the service, those who are thus appointed are expected to give utterance to the feelings of their own hearts, otherwise their praying would be regarded as formal and lifeless. It would not be allowable to read prayers, for however good such prayers might be, they would not be the spontaneous expression of the heart. Not that it is wrong to read prayers. Such reading may be profitable. We have quite a number of beautiful prayers in Scripture, which it is good not only to read, but to learn. But reading prayers, however profitable, is not praying, any more than reading prophecies is prophesying. What, then, about reading praises! The psalmist has written prayers as well as songs of praise, but there are many who consider that it would not be allowable to read his prayers and call such reading praying, who make a practice of singing his psalms and calling such singing praise. It is difficult to understand the reason for this. I do not know that any reason can be found. I have heard many excuses, but these were as applicable to prayer as praise. Both of these acts when in right ordering have their spring from the same source—the Spirit of God in the heart. Both express a true inwrought spiritual exercise and experience. A psalm or hymn book for the purpose of providing praise in completed form is as objectionable as a prayer book for the purpose of providing ready made prayers. Both may be admirable reading. They may be true expressions of prayer and praise under certain conditions, which may have been fulfilled in the cases of those who wrote them. These conditions, however, are not under man's control. He who can speak with authority to the condition of the souls of men is He who alone can bring them into that spiritual state in which prayer or praise can be acceptably offered, and even then the offering consists only of that which the Lord gives them to offer. It is He who begets in the soul heavenly desires, thank-offerings and praises. Nothing that is not of his begetting can be offered in his name, and only that which is offered in that Divine name can be accepted. The form of utterance in which such offerings are made, may not commend itself to the ears of the wise and learned of this world, but in virtue of that name and power in which they are offered, they are heard in heaven.

Praise as understood and acknowledged by Friends and the praise which consists in singing hymns from a book have nothing in common except their form. In spirit they differ entirely. The former comes from the heart to the lips and is real; the latter is taken from the book to the lips and is verbal. The one is according to the Spirit and the other is according to the letter. The one can only be uttered when by Divine grace it is felt as an actual experience; the other may be uttered by any one who can repeat the words, but all that is uttered extemporaneously as praise is not necessarily such. That which springs from the intellect of man, or is brought forth from his memory, or which he has by his own faculties laid hold of, but which is not prompted by the Holy Spirit, is not praise. True praise, like true prayer, has a Divine source, and is uttered with Divine authority and power. It is only when praise is offered in the name of Christ that it reaches the throne of the Father and is acceptable to Him. Man by himself alone has no right of access to God. Christ is the way, the truth and the life, and all who draw near unto the Father must approach in the name of his well-beloved Son.

[This letter appears to have been written to some Friend of Tiverton, R. I., about ninety years ago:—]

Dear Brother:—I have no doubt but thou feels tenderly with us on being informed of the decease of our dear sister Ann, which has been a very affecting circumstance to all her near connections here, and particularly so to my wife and myself: she has indeed suffered much in her health in consequence of the effect it had upon her mind; though she seems now gradually recovering, and becoming more comfortable, and I hope will again be restored to her former, and though very imperfect state of health.

In respect to the trial we have passed through in the removal of our dear sister, we have nevertheless had the consolation to see her mind bowed under the awful visitation, and reverently prostrated before the Father of mercies, whose unutterable kindness was graciously and evidently extended to her. She spent much of her time during her last illness in fervent supplication both by night and by day; during the last two weeks her mind seemed freed in a sweet, calm serenity and resignation, which we beheld with comfort, and I hope thankfulness on her account. She had a paralytic stroke, which entirely deprived her of the use of the left side, but did not affect her understanding, which was an unspeakable mercy. In this state she lay four weeks and one day—when, on the 9th day of the 4th Month, in the evening, she was suddenly seized with a second stroke, and in about an hour and a half after the attack, it pleased the great Disposer of life and death to put a final period to all her conflicts; and I have no doubt [He] has received her into the mansions of ever-enduring peace and happiness.

She was favored with the kind attention of several truly and solidly religious Friends—amongst whom were several of our Americans, (William Savery, George Dillwyn, and I. Dillwyn,)—who all appear to unite in believing that she is removed to a state of happiness. I would have given thee a much fuller account of her illness and comfortable condition of mind, had I not it at large in a book which I intend sending to brother Edward, which I hope will afford her relations and friends in America much satisfaction and comfort—and which I wish may be of use to such of them as stand in need of help. As the account I have sent is too long to copy, I must desire thee to apply to brother Edward for the perusal, or a copy of it.

Since I began this, I have received thy kind and affectionate, and truly acceptable letter from Tiverton, and am glad of such a testimony of the continuance of brotherly esteem. I am sorry, truly sorry, that thou hast not more comfort in thy children; the circumstances which have occurred amongst them I have no doubt must have been deeply trying to thy mind. I have often felt for thee and them, and it is my sincere desire thou mayest yet live to see them brought under the forming hand of Infinite Wisdom, and made sensible of the work of regeneration, rather than they should become prosperous and great in this world, in which I believe thou wilt cordially unite; and which has unquestionably been the prayer of thy soul to the God of mercy and Truth.

The account thou hast given me of the meeting in the back country is very pleasing and comfortable. I wish they may be graciously preserved on the safe foundation, the unshaken Rock in themselves—that the pure Truth may spread its benign influence far and wide, to the enlarging of Zion's borders and the enriching of her children.

It is now the time of our Yearly Meeting in this city. All the American Friends, who are visiting the churches in this part of the world, are in town, excepting David Sands, who, I hear is gone into the North of Ireland, and is in a very poor state of health. John Wigham, Deborah Darby, Rebecca Young, M. Routh, are all here—with many others of the priesthood. We have a little young woman here, of that class who seems to be the great wonder of the present day: She is now, I think, about 24 years of age; her name is Sarah Lynes; she was educated in Friends' Charity School, near this city, and afterwards lived as a servant in a Friend's family in Ireland. She first appeared in the ministry, I think, at about fifteen years of age, in a weighty and solid manner. She has grown in her gift far beyond what is common, and for several years past has travelled much in the service of Truth. Within the last year she has been much engaged in a very arduous line, having very large meetings amongst those of other societies in places where there are no Friends, and in some places where no Friends have had meetings since the earlier days of our Society, if ever; and in a great many large and populous towns, has addressed the people in the public markets on market days. She frequently stands from an hour to two hours and a-quarter, to the astonishment of all who hear her. She demonstrates a mind wonderfully gifted for such a line of service, and the people say, she must be inspired: which doubtless she is; and what is beautiful to behold, she is adorned with sweet humility and child-like innocence. Her voice is sonorous, her pronunciation uncommonly clear, her language sublime, and, above all, the power attending her ministry has an uncommon effect on all—the grave and the gay. Other societies have opened their places of worship for her, and even the civil magistrates have stepped forward to aid and protect her. My brother-in-law, Richard Burlingham, and his brother John, have accompanied her through most of her services in the public opportunities, to their mutual satisfaction and comfort. She is now in London, and has spent three evenings at our house. From her late very trying exercises, she had almost lost her voice, and could only speak in a whisper, till she found something on her mind to communicate to the company, when she again recovered her voice and spoke audibly; after which, it dropped again in a whisper as before; and the same circumstance took place in Grace Church Street Meeting-house, the morning of the same day.

Indeed, we have a considerable number of young women who have lately come out in the ministry, who promise fair to make useful, shining handmaids in the Lord's cause; and also some young men;—but the former outdo the latter in number at least. I believe the arduous labors of our American Friends have been blessed to the younger class of our Society in a remarkable degree, which will give them a claim to the gracious promise, made to those who turn many to righteousness.

As I am writing this at short intervals between our meetings, I may inform thee that this Yearly Meeting appears to be quite as large as they usually have been, which was scarcely expected, considering the present state of the times, when the expense of travelling is an object—which was supposed would be a discouragement to many who are very distantly situated. This is the sixth day of our annual meeting, and I think some of them have been eminently favored by the Father of mercies;—indeed, the testimonies of Truth seem to be spreading in many parts, notwithstanding the sorrowful revolt of a great part of our Society in a day of ease. But truly it may again be said, that whilst the judgments of the Lord are in the earth, the people learn righteousness. The alarming prospect which surrounds us, in the present convulsed state of the European nations, seems to have had already a tendency to awaken the minds of many to a serious consideration, and to have shown them the necessity of seeking a shelter in the munition of Rocks. Our religious testimony against wars seems evidently gaining ground amongst those of other societies, though it is probable it will not show itself much for some time to come. That against a hiring ministry is, I think, equally, or more so, spreading amongst different denominations of professors. Some instances of this have appeared amongst the clergy themselves—several of them having expressed in word and conduct, their objections to exacting anything towards their own maintenance from those who scruple the payment; and some others have resigned their places in the Established Church, and come among us.

We have had this day a pretty large number of Friends to dinner—I think we counted forty-one,—amongst whom were, Sarah Harrison, Charity Cook, Mary Swett, Deborah Darby, Rebecca Young, and several more ministering Friends, whose names I suppose are unknown to thee. Martha Routh, and about half a score of others, slipped off, from an apprehension that the number would incommode us; but we could have accommodated them all.

It is now two or three weeks since I began this letter, to which I have added a paragraph at a time, as things occurred, having only short intervals to devote to it,—for my time has been much occupied since I received thine; and the decease of my sister Ann has occasioned me a great deal of writing, independent of the history of her I have drawn up, consisting of about sixty pages quarto.

THE A. B. C. OF HEALTH.

As soon as you are up, shake blanket and sheet;
 Better be without shoes, than sit with wet feet;
 (Children, if healthy, are active, and busy;
 Damp beds and damp clothes will both make you ill;
 Eat slowly, and always chew your food well;
 Freshen the air in the house where you dwell;
 Garments must never be made to be tight;
 Homes will be healthy, if airy and light;
 If you wish to be well, as you go, I've no doubt,
 Just open the windows before you do out;
 Keep your rooms always tidy and clean;
 Let dust on the furniture never be seen;
 Much illness is caused by the want of pure air,
 Now to open your windows be ever your care;
 Old rugs and old rubbish should never be kept;
 People should see that their floors are well-swept;
 Quick movements in children are healthy and right;
 Remember the young cannot thrive without light.
 See that the cistern is clean to the brim;
 Take care that your dress is all tidy and trim;
 Use your nose to find out if there be a bad drain,
 Very sad are the fevers that come in its train;
 Walk as much as you can without feeling fatigue,
 Nerves could walk for full many a league.
 Your health is your wealth, which your wisdom must keep,
 Zeal will help a good cause, and the good you will reap.

RETIREMENT.

Oh that my mind was centred where it ought,
 Entirely free'd from all distracted thought!
 Vain wandering thoughts that crowd within my brain
 Do only add to my sad state from day to day
 And like the vagrant clouds obscure the mind,
 Which should to serious watching be inclin'd.
 Ah! rise thou Son of Righteousness, thy Light
 Can soon dispel the gloominess of night.
 Appear, appear, let thy victorious ray
 And longed for presence still renew the day,
 Whereby my slumbering eyes may wake and see
 The dawning morning of felicity
 Still more and more break forth to perfect day,
 Whose heavenly light guides in the blessed way
 That leads to thy renewed and holy hill,
 Where true obedience to thy sacred will
 Makes glad the hearts of thy redeemed ones,
 Who know the comfort of adopted sons,
 And can sing praises to that glorious hand
 Which raised them up and taught them how to stand,
 To walk and run the pleasant paths of peace,
 Rejoicing in true joys that never cease.

MY LESSON.
 I stood by the grave of a loved one,
 And sorrowful turned away,
 Striving to pierce, in my sorrow,
 The veil of the dim unseen.
 And my heart was bowed with anguish,
 And my eyes with tears were dim,
 As I thought, in the way that we count the years,
 How short her life had been.

The months had scarce made their cycle
 Since that beautiful Summer day,
 When we laid her there with her kindred
 And sorrowful turned away,
 And my heart cried out in its anguish:
 "O friend, where art thou now?"
 "That one who has dearly loved thee Stands o'er thee, dost thou know?"

"O friend, I pray thee tell me
 Dost thou sleep at my feet 'neath the sod,
 Or when they bade thee a fond farewell,
 Did thy soul go back to God?"

Just then on the ground I noted
 Where the grass had long been dead,
 A tuft of tiny blue flowers
 Had bravely raised its head.

And the flowers brought me a message
 Which I could not soon forget;
 Tho' weesons have gone since that morning,
 The lesson is with me yet.
 The word was one which the Master
 Spoke when He walked with his own,
 How life for the plant comes only
 From the seed which in death is sown.

And there came to my heart an assurance,
 Which dried the tears from my eyes;
 That as sure as the flower from this lifeless sod,
 So the dead in Christ shall rise.
 Small matter to us who loved them,
 Whether they wait 'neath the sod, like the flowers,
 Or go, in the hour that we bid them farewell,
 To that "land that is fairer than ours."

Tho' my feet with walking were weary,
 And the road to my home was long,
 Yet I did not heed the distance,
 For I bore in my heart a song:
 That though the mystery of death
 May be still beyond our ken,
 Yet wherever they are who believed on Christ,
 We know they shall live again. A. G.

THE OLD FAMILY CLOCK.

Standing stately, graceful, tall,
 In the old ancestral hall,
 Surviving all the days since pass'd,
 And of many relies, last.

Chronicle of many years,
 Its face unfurrow'd still appears,
 Its countenance is still as fair,
 As when it first was station'd there.

Its ceaseless cadence marks the flow,
 Of cycles as they come and go,
 And sun and moon, their phases run,
 And still its measured step moves on.

Each time it spoke with silver tongue,
 Each time its pendulum has swung,
 Some beating heart has watched the stroke,
 As on the ear its accents broke.

Uncounted years have come and gone,
 And still its measured pulse beats on,
 And it was watched with bated breath,
 When life was passing into death.

The hands that fashioned it have gone,
 And still its hands move calmly on,
 The sculptured urns that crown its head,
 Commemorate the happy dead.

No more of time—there yet are more,
 Although their pilgrimage is o'er;
 For winged upon the hours that fly,
 They pass'd into eternity.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

An Honest Acknowledgment.

[The following letter accompanied an extract from the minutes of Nottingham and Little Britain Monthly Meeting, containing an acknowledgment from one who had left our Society in the separation that occurred in 1827-8. The testimony it bears to sound doctrine, as well as the attending circumstances, seem to the editor to possess sufficient interest to warrant its insertion in a condensed form:]—

Sixth Month 23rd, 1851.

Dear Friend:—As one of my family was lately looking over the old minutes of Nottingham and Little Britain Monthly Meeting, she asked me about Amor C. Milner, whose name she found there appended to an acknowledgment. As she read to me the papers, I was struck with its force, and remembering the circumstances under which it was written, it occurred to me that the scrap of history it involves might be instructive. As I am the only living witness of the matter, it may be best for me to rescue it from oblivion.

A few years prior to this date, a charge was brought to our Monthly Meeting against the father of this young man. I was one of the committee to visit him, and I bring up the circumstance here because the son (A. C. M.) was present and seemed to exceed his father in opposing the Christian faith in all its bearings.

I did not meet with him again until (having studied medicine) he settled as a physician in our neighborhood and married. After some time his health gave way, and during the months of his illness I was frequently at his house. I cannot now recall the particulars of our conversation, but I remember that the verities of the Christian religion were brought to notice, and I was cheered with the evidence that a change of heart was going on.

He consulted with some Friends about offering a paper of acknowledgment as being all he could do to neutralize the force of his example in the enemy's service. He was not able to attend any of our meetings, and died not long after being reinstated as a member.

From the Minutes of Nottingham and Little Britain Monthly Meeting, Fifth Month, 1850.

Amor C. Milner having been in connection with the Separatists, and having lost his right of membership agreeably to a rule of discipline made respecting minors, forwarded to this meeting the following acknowledgment which, being read, was acceptable to the meeting, and he reinstated a member:—

To Nottingham and Little Britain Monthly Meeting.

"Dear Friends:—I have had a right in the Society of Friends by birth, but giving way to seducing spirits I have been drawn aside from the truth and led to embrace notions and opinions subversive of the Christian faith, having been snared by plausible, yet delusive doctrines.

But God, who is rich in mercy and powerful to save, hath not left me in darkness, but having loved me before I loved Him, hath shined in my heart to give me a knowledge of his glory in the face of Jesus Christ.

And blessed be his adorable name He has given me to see and to feel the force of the exclamation, "A Saviour or I die, a Redeemer or I perish forever." I am led to query what greater evil can presumptuous man commit than to detract from the divinity or character of Christ or attempt to divide Him who is in oneness with the Father, and who dwells by his Spirit in the hearts of the children of men, a reprover to the disobedient, a swift witness against them that commit iniquity, a wonderful Counsellor to the willing and obedient, as a fuller with soap and a refiner with fire to the humble penitent, and Prince of Peace to the lowly in heart, for to those He giveth to find rest unto their souls.

Now that I am drawing near to the close of life, my mind has been impressed with this subject, and I have not seen that I could better make amends for the past than by tendering to Friends this acknowledgment, and thus giving forth my testimony to the Truth as it is in Jesus. Hoping that on the reading of this in their next Monthly Meeting, they may see it right to receive me into unity with them, and suffer my name to be among their list of members, if my life be spared thus long; but if not, which is very likely, I give this into their hands to be disposed of as they may think best.

AMOR C. MILNER."

Fourth Month 24th, 1850.

A Wonderful Escape.

Nathaniel, an assistant to the Moravian missionaries in Greenland, when engaged in the seal fishery, being in company with another brother, who was yet inexperienced in the management of the kayak (a Greenland boat) he met a Freiterssoak, the largest kind of seal, which he killed. He then discovered his companion on a flake of ice, endeavoring to kill another of the same species, and in danger; he, therefore, left his dead seal, kept buoyant by the bladder, and hastened to help his brother.

They succeeded in killing the seal; but suddenly a strong north wind arose, and carried off both the kayaks to sea; nor could they discover any kayaks in the neighborhood. They cried aloud for help, but in vain. Meanwhile the wind rose in strength, and carried both the kayaks, and also the piece of ice, swiftly along with the waves. Having lost sight of the kayaks, they now saw themselves without the least hope of deliverance.

Nathaniel continued praying to his Saviour, and thought with great grief of the situation of his poor family, but felt a small degree of hope arising in his breast. Unexpectedly, he saw his dead seal floating towards him, and was exceedingly surprised at its approaching against the wind, till it came so near the flake of ice that they could secure it. But how should a dead seal become the means of their deliverance? and what was to be done? All at once Nathaniel resolved at a venture, to seat himself upon the dead floating seal; and by the help of his paddle, which he happily kept in his hand when he joined his brother on the ice, to go in quest of the kayaks.

Though the sea and waves continually overflowed him, yet he kept his seat, made after the kayaks, and succeeded in overtaking his own, into which he crept, and went in quest of that of his companion, which he likewise found. He also kept possession of the seal; and now hastened in search of the flake of ice, on which his companion was most anxiously looking out for him; having reached it, he brought him his kayak, and enabled him to secure the other seal, when both returned home in safety. When relating his dangerous adventure, he ascribed his preservation, not to his own contrivance, but to the mercy of God alone.—Arvine's Cyclopaedia.

Walking.

BY JOHN TODD.

We should probably be frightened if we knew how often we come near to death. Almost every one can recall the time and place when he was within an inch of losing his life. A single fall may so strike the head, as to paralyze us all the rest of life. A single slip on the icy path may break a bone that shall lead us to our grave. I once knew a physician who had one strap of the harness break as he was going down a mountain, and that frightened the horses and threw him out of the carriage, broke his bones and cost his life. A few days since, on one of our terribly cold days, a man went off to the woods to chop wood. He had only a little boy with him. He was several miles from home. In swinging the axe, it struck a very small twig or a branch of a tree, and yet it so turned the axe, that instead of striking the log it struck the full blow upon the poor fellow's knee! The blood flowed and the man fell. The frightened little boy ran for help; but instead of going to the nearest house, his little feet went all the way home! The consequence was, that when help reached the poor sufferer, he had fainted, and the wound was all frozen. It resulted in his having the lock-jaw, and consequent death. And yet how often is the axe swung among the brush and men escape death!

I sometimes stop and watch a bare-footed little boy. He runs like a squirrel and is nearly as lively. He does not stop to see where he is to put down his foot or even think of it. On he rushes. Should be step into a hole it might cost him a broken limb. Should he step on a nail it might cost him the lock-jaw. A little nail would first bring a smart, then a pain, then a swelling, and at length end in death, most likely. Now who guides his little feet?

Each little child takes from between four thousand to nine thousand such steps each day! Why don't more of the little creatures step wrong and get hurt? How many such steps in a year and in ten years? Why, we are never safe a moment? If we are on the water, the breaking of one single bolt in the ship, the breaking of one strand of the cable, the mis-pointing of the compass ever so little might drown all in the great ship. Just see what a multitude of men are walking in one city, in our country and over the earth every day. And yet how few step upon anything that hurts them. We should think there would be multitudes of sprained ankles, of wrenched feet and of bruises. In the dark night it is still more wonderful.

And how few are afraid to walk in the night. Thus by day and by night we walk without using our eyes or our thoughts. But the little sparrow that twitters in the rising sun, not knowing where she is to find her breakfast, gives herself no anxiety. At the right time and place she will find the little worm waiting for her. The little bee goes singing away from her hive, not knowing where she will find her sweet honey, but she gives herself no anxiety. There has been a hand before her to sow the flowers, and to have their sweetness all ready at her coming. How tired the mother sometimes becomes in watching two or three little ones during the day—to see that they do not get burnt, or run over, or thrown down, or cut with a tool, or hurt themselves. What a work it she had this to do for all the children in the world! Yet God does this every moment for all that live—seeing that the child puts down his little foot in the right place—seeing that the swift horse does not run over him, seeing that his food does not poison him, and that he shall be safe day and night! It gives me a wonderful thought of God's greatness just to see men walk the streets, doing it year after year. He keeping "their souls from death, their feet from falling and their eyes from tears." None are so great that they can do without God, and none are so small as to be forgotten by Him.

Ask a little boy how many fingers he has on his right hand and he will tell you "five." And how many on the left hand? and he says "five." Ask him how he knows, and he will tell you "it is so easy, he can't help knowing." Yes, easy to him; but could a dog know how many? He says, "No." Very well, this shows the boy that he knows more than the dog, because he is of a higher nature. Just so God knows just how many hairs there are on every head! The reason is, his nature is so great. "He can't help knowing," any more than the boy can help knowing how many fingers he has. O child! everything, even the walking of your little feet, shows that God is everywhere, and that "it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps."—S. S. Times.

Wild Carrot.—An experienced and intelligent farmer writes to the editor, commenting on an article copied into THE FRIEND, of Seventh Mo. 11th, from THE Independent, which mentions the Wild Carrot as the worst weed which exists in the section of country of which the writer speaks. My friend says:—"In my earlier years, when it was common to have portions of the farm in poor condition for grass, the prevalence of wild carrot on such portions was quite observable. But since the soil has been improved and properly seeded with grass, the carrots have disappeared, without any special effort to destroy them. Some of them, however, linger in spots out of the range of the plow. But should there be any about pasture land, I have not known cattle to leave them as they leave mule-ins, docks, or even daisies. Not only do the cattle eat the tops with apparent relish, but swine devour the roots."

The Merino Sheep.—The modern American Merino sheep is derived from Spanish stock, greatly modified by a course of selection and careful feeding. The average weight of the fleece has greatly increased. As an evidence of the fineness of the wool, a year or two ago some Vermont breeders killed a healthy, thrifty animal with a fine compact fleece, and before the pelt had time to dry, cut an inch square from the shoulder. A microscopic examination showed 222,300 fibres.

Runaway Sheep.—The editor of the Christian Advocate (New York), has recently been making a tour in the Southern States, in the course of which he visited a Methodist minister named Shackford, who related to him some of his experiences during the Civil War. Among them were the following:

"Two incidents were amusing. Mr. Shackford had a large flock of sheep, among which were three black sheep that had so often led the flock over the fences into improper places, that he had determined to kill them. The entire flock was captured and driven away by the soldiers. Three times these black sheep sprang out of the inclosure—the rest followed them;—twice they were followed and taken back by the soldiers; but the third time they were all obliged to leave so hastily, that the entire flock was preserved, including a lamb, which managed to keep up with the rest. Of course, the owner determined then to preserve the black sheep. It has not unfrequently happened that the boys, that for awhile have been considered black sheep, have turned out to be the main support of the family, and have given it its real honor in later years.

"The other singular circumstance was the fact, that when the cannonading began, the cattle went down to the river, waded through a marsh in which it was impossible to follow them, and there stayed for two days and nights, until the confusion ceased. They then returned and came to the house, the cows in great distress, with an air of intelligence which said plainly as words could: If this disturbance is over, we have come here to stay; if not, we shall go back to the marsh after you milk us."

The Meaning of Free Coinage.—The National Stockman and Farmer, having been frequently asked to define "free coinage of silver," wrote to the Treasury Department, at Washington, and got this definition from the Director of the Mint:

"The term 'free and unlimited coinage of silver,' means the conferring of the right upon individuals to take silver of any kind to the mints and have every 371½ pure grains of it stamped, free of charge, into a dollar; which dollar is a full legal tender for its face value in the payments of debts and obligations of all kinds in the United States." In other words, an ounce of silver (480 grains), which can be bought in the open market for 98 cents, is to pass, under the kind of free coinage now proposed, for $1.29 cents. A speculator who paid $98 for 100 ounces, would get at the Treasury $129 in national currency—making $31 by the transaction. Or, to put it differently, with the silver at 98 cents per ounce, he could get a 100 silver dollars, or silver certificates, for silver bullion costing him $75.79. The average cost of producing silver per ounce in the United States in 1886, was 51.1 cents per ounce. In Montana the average cost was 43.3 cents per ounce. The Granite Mountain Mine, in that State, according to the official statement of the Granite Mountain Company to the Director of the Mint in 1886, produced 2,987,745 ounces of silver at a cost of 12½ cents per ounce. In Mexico, the cost is 4½ cents; in South America, 3½ cents; in Australia, at the Broken Hill mine, 16 cents. Very large quantities of silver are produced at these figures.—Baltimore Sun.

The Studists.—The most important of the dissenters from the Russian Orthodox Church (Greek Catholic) are the Studists. The sect is pietistic throughout, and was begun by the holding of meetings for the revision of the Bible and instruction of the Scriptures. They began by rejecting the use of images and the making of the cross as being contrary to the Bible. This was followed by their withdrawal from the Orthodox Church and by the organization of independent congregations. In 1871 Balabok began a very aggressive propaganda, but was punished by imprisonment of one year in Kiew. Against Ratushny and the other leaders a petition was presented to the Emperor in 1873, which, after a trial covering five years, ended in a failure to convict. A rather remarkable coadjutor was found in a Syrian, from Persia, named Jacob Deljakov, who for twenty years labored quietly but effectively, and through his influence was named as Studists or Baptists. His method was to ask a peddler, going from house to house, and improving these opportunities to make a lecture on the Bible, and to offer wares that helped him most was the Bible. He was repeatedly imprisoned and once banished to Orenburg. But while here he succeeded in organizing a Studist congregation, which, in 1887, was in a most flourishing condition.

The Studists have no ordained ministry. The congregations select from their own ranks as leaders those who have the necessary gifts, although no fixed rites. Sometimes there is even no singing in connection with the services, although there are now several collections of Protestant hymns published in Russian and used by the evangelical sects. The sermon and prayer are the chief features of worship. Three services are generally held on first-day, and often each lasts from two to three hours. Prayer-meetings are regularly held. Once a month the Lord's Supper is celebrated, and on a more frequent basis the ceremony of foot-washing in Mandy Thursday. The congregational affairs are in the hands of chosen elders, who consult the whole congregation in important matters. A Church Council as such they do not have. The Studists lay great stress upon an upright and moral life. For his reason they favor early marriages, the young men becoming husbands at the age of from sixteen to eighteen; the girls wives as early as fourteen. In particular they still adhere to certain features of the Mosaic ceremonial law. Smoking, drinking of intoxicants, dancing, card playing and the like are absolutely forbidden. Chiefly on account of the early marriages, they are, as a rule, not much better educated than the average Russian peasant. Poor people often do not send their children to school at all; and there is a strong prejudice against higher education as detrimental to the health of the young. The young are subjected to strict discipline, in many cases not even being allowed to peak in the presence of their parents without permission. Family worship is insisted upon, and during this service boys of twelve and thirteen are urged to make extemporaneous prayers. Before and after each meal there are prayers.

The Studists have General Conferences, to which each congregation sends a delegate. The Conference meets each Spring, and among other things elects officers to manage the mission money and work. This mission work is done chiefly in Southern Russia, and is accomplished through traveling preachers, who in all cases are only peasants, but well-gifted and especially well-versed in the Scriptures. Only one of them has enjoyed the privilege of higher education, having attended a German university, and he labor extensively among the German colonists. Naturally, official statistics of the Studists, who live only because the Orthodox authorities cannot suppress them, are in existence. But the testimony of friend and foe agrees in this—that they are rapidly spreading, and that they number tens and even hundreds of thousands.—The Independent.

Is this Christianity?—Under this heading the Christian Advocate describes the entrance into a monastery of Dominican nuns, at Hant's Point in

New York State, of seventeen women. It says: Their life in the cloister is peculiarly severe. Each nun sleeps in a little cell, on a board with scanty covering, never removing her habit save for change and bathing. At midnight she must rise and proceed to the chapel which is connected with the cloister, engage in devotional exercises, and continue in meditation until 2 o'clock, when she may again retire. Certain religious ceremonies and making articles for the use of the altar constitute her occupation.

The sealing of this cloister was attended with considerable ceremony. Having been advertised beforehand, many visitors came to see the monastery and to be present when the solemn moment should arrive. Parents and relatives of the nuns were there to clasp the hands of these kindred for the last time. Hereafter their parents cannot see or converse with them, except through a double-gated window.

At the appointed moment all visitors withdrew to the chapel and a heavy wooden door was closed and fastened with two strong locks. No visitors will ever pass through that door again. It will only be opened to receive new members of the community, and the archbishop who may enter once a year attended by two priests. When one of the nuns is taken sick a physician will be admitted by a permit from the archbishop and superioress, but when she lies on her dying bed neither father, mother, nor other relative can enter. The inmates of the cloister are effectually and finally imprisoned. So important was this proceeding that the archiepiscopal benediction was bestowed on it, and many grave prelates were present to assist in the imposing ceremony.

When a woman yielding to the call of duty bids adieu to her kindred and goes abroad to teach the heathen, or in some way build up the kingdom of God, she deserves all honor, and the sacrifice she makes is Christ-like; but when she allows herself to be immured in a cloister, and sunders all natural ties, not to do anything for the world, but to hide away from all active pursuits, it is difficult to discover in the act anything akin to the religion of Christ. To sleep on a board and submit to hard fare is heroic when it is necessary in order to accomplish good, but when one chooses it, and in doing so cuts herself off from all fields of usefulness, it is the sheerest fanaticism.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 1, 1891.

A member of New York Yearly Meeting has called our attention to the want of clearness in the notice published on page 407 of last volume of THE FRIEND, of the action of that body in reference to the liquor traffic. The gigantic evil referred to in the Minute adopted was the liquor traffic.

It has become increasingly the custom in some parts of the United States, during the hot season of the year, for persons and families to leave their regular homes and spend a few weeks either in travelling or in a temporary residence among the mountains or by the sea-shore. The object sought for in this partial migration is the improvement or preservation of health. There are, no doubt, many persons on whom this temporary change of their mode of life has a beneficial effect; and who return to their business and usual engagements with renewed energy and ability; but there may be others who imitate their example, without having the same necessity, and to whom these outings cause a waste of time and means, which is scarcely justifiable to them.

A few days since we were impressed with the remark of a valued Friend, who under medical advice was about leaving home temporarily.

He said, that if it were not for the belief that his health required the change, he would not feel himself at liberty to indulge himself in so expensive a recreation, but would prefer to use the money it would require in relieving the wants of others.

We do not wish to censure any who, after proper consideration, feel the way open to make such journeys—but simply to refer to the need of care. "A word to the wise is sufficient."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Captain Huggins, of General Miles' staff, has been making an official visit to the Indian agencies in the Sioux reservation. He says: "I found that the Indians are abandoning their war paint and blankets, but crops have been almost total failures the last three years, caused by the drought, and the consequence is that those Indians who attempted to farm are now almost altogether dependent upon what the Government furnishes them for subsistence. Many have returned to their old ways of digging-wild turnips, a few get a little game and furs, and occasionally some of the latter are sold for money, but both Indians and whites have attempted to work, deserted and the owners gone into disgust."

The sealing schooner E. B. Marvin returned to Victoria, British Columbia, on the night of the 25th of Seventh Month, having been seized by the American cutter Rush in attempting entry into Ouhang, after having been ordered by the Royal Navy to go to do so. The Rush chased her into Ouhang, seized her and handed her over to the British warship Nymph, by whom she was ordered home.

The Treasury Department has issued a circular directing the confiscation of lottery tickets and advertisements, and has also issued a circular regarding the laws relating thereto. Customs Inspector Burke says that the result of the laws against lotteries will be to break up completely the sale of foreign lottery tickets through the United States mails.

A cablegram from London, dated the 21st of Seventh Month, says: "The mail steamer Shadwell, of the Wetmore, under Captain Sandercock, which sailed from Duluth, Minn., during the latter part of Sixth Month, arrived at Liverpool to-day. The Wetmore is an inland-built steamer, and her cargo, which consists of 95,000 bushels of grain, is the first grain cargo shipped from a lake port direct to Liverpool without being re-handled. It will be noted that the mail from Duluth, through the Welland Canal and thence down the St. Lawrence River and across the Atlantic. The success of this voyage is evidence that the proposition to establish direct communication between European and other ports, and the port of Chicago is entirely feasible.

Judge Hill, in the Circuit Court at Lebanon, Ind., in a suit for possession of the Mount Bapt Church property has decided that the minority of the congregation, having held to the articles of faith adopted by the church at its organization, are the rightful owners of the property in dispute, and should be put in possession thereof.

Secretary Edge, of the Pennsylvania State Board of Agriculture, says the crop of large fruit will be one of the largest for a number of years, and the crop of small fruit will prove phenomenal. The wheat crop will be the largest for years.

Great rainings were done in Waltham Township, Minn., on the night of the 27th ult., by a wind and hail storm.

Reports have been received of a destructive hail storm in South Dakota on the 21st. Crops in a tract of country 100 miles long and four miles wide were destroyed.

A heavy rain in North Dakota last week insures, it is said, a big crop for this season. As much as 30 bushels of wheat per acre are expected. Fears of a scarcity of help to harvest the crop is the thing that worries the farmers.

The mines of Coal Creek and Breiville, East Tennessee, last week, a number of convict contract laborers, who had been leased out by the State, were driven away by the miners. Governor Buchanan sent out a posse of armed troops to enforce the laws of the Commonwealth. At a meeting of the miners, it was decided to avoid a conflict with the militia by allowing the convicts to return to the mines, with the expectation of the law creating the difficulty will be repeated when the Legislature meets next winter.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 547, which is an increase of 48 over the previous week, and of 167 over the corresponding week of 1890. Of the foregoing, 205 were males, and 249 females; 212 were under a year of age. One hundred and nineteen died of cholera infantum; 54 of consumption; 33 of diseases of the heart; 32 of malarious; 25 of inflammation of the brain; 24 of convulsions; 17 of pneumonia; 15 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 12 of diphtheria; 11 of dysentery; 11 of alcoholism; 11 of old age; 10 of Bright's disease, and 10 of nephritis.

FOREIGN.—Recent statistics show the estimated population of the world to be 1,487,600,000, an increase of eight per cent. in ten years. Europe is the most thickly settled, having a population of 350,200,000, or 101 persons to the square mile.

The House of Commons on the 22nd ult., in Committee of Supply, voted the sum of 500,000 £ as salaries to the relief of the suffering poor of Ireland. The Chief Secretary for Ireland, Balfour, made a detailed statement in regard to this relief, saying that it was the Government's intention that the works should be a permanent means of promoting the welfare of the population. The Chief Secretary said that while he considered the difficulties of the vast system from the extreme north to the south of Ireland, it must be acknowledged that the Government was not wanting in appreciation of its duty.

On the 24th ult., an election held in the North or Wisbeck division of Cambridgeshire for a successor to the late Sir C. W. Selwyn, Conservative, resulted in victory for the Liberals. The result was as follows: Arthur Brand, Liberal, 3,079; Duncan, Conservative, 3,719. Liberal majority, 260. At the last election, Captain Selwyn, Conservative, received 4,109 votes to 3,082 votes received by John Eglby, Home Ruler, defeating the latter by a majority of 1,027.

On the night of the 26th ult., a collision between excursion trains occurred at St. Mandé, France, in which 43 persons are said to have been killed and 104 injured and three carriages wrecked. Both trains were returning from the Bois de Vincennes, and the engine of the second train crashed into the preceding train before the latter had left the St. Mandé Station. The guards' van and the three rear carriages of the fast train were wrecked and caught fire from the gas. The injured occupants were shrieking in despair, and the other passengers hurried to the aid of the grain and assisting them to get to safety. Soldiers also aided the fire brigade to quench the flames and rescue the sufferers, but some of the victims are said to have been drowned by their attempting rescuers. The work of helping the injured was carried on by torch-light. The responsibility for the accident had not been determined.

A German periodical gives statistics concerning the frequency of thunderstorms in various regions of the world. Java has thunderstorms on the average 97 days in the year; Sumatra, 86; Hindostan, 50; Borneo, 54; the gold coast, 48; the East Indies, 32; West Indies, 26; South Guinea, 22; Buenos Ayres, Canada and Austria, 23; Baden, Wurttemberg and Hungary, 22; Nilesia, Bavaria and Belgium, 21; Holland, 18; Saxony and Brandenburg, 17; France, Australia and South Russia, 16; Spain and Portugal, 15; Sweden and Finland, 8; England and the high Swiss

It is announced that the Italian deficit for the year 1890-91 is about 78,000,000 lire, notwithstanding all the economies introduced.

The Dominion Government has ended Sixth Month 30th, 1891, the amount collected at Vancouver, B. C., as duty on Chinamen entering the Dominion was $15,568, as against $3,563 for the year ended Sixth Month 30th, 1890, an increase of $12,005. The amount exacted from each Chinaman who sets foot in the Dominion is $120.

The Dominion Government has received information that, owing to the bright crop outlook in Manitoba and the Northwest, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has ordered 50 new locomotives and 1,500 box cars to transport this season's harvest to the seaboard. On the basis of the estimated yield it will require ten trains daily for seven months to work the crop.

DIED ON the 21st day of Ninth Month, 1890, MARGARET M. wife of Alfred E. Conland, age thirty-eight years, a member of Rich Square Monthly and Cedar Grove Particular Meeting of Friends. She was a loving and devoted companion, and a good neighbor. She bore her last illness with great patience and Christian fortitude, but passed through much conflict before she was made unconscious by her family, with the result that she died in much affliction. A short while before she was taken sick, she remarked to her husband, "I think my time here is very short, but I feel assured that my end will be peace, for now I love everybody." The day before her departure, after having revived from a severe attack, she took her husband and friends, and said, "My very dear one, I must leave thee. Please give me up, for I am suffering so much. My sufferings will soon be over; it is not kind in our Heavenly Father to permit us a home in heaven, where we can meet again, where parting will be no more? Say, will these be there?" While she loved ones, and friends, do mourn her loss, and much as we feel assured that she has entered that beautiful city whose walls are salvation and gates are praise.

—, at his residence, near Pleasant Plain, Jefferson Co., Iowa, JOEL C. PAXSON, aged about seventy-two years, a much esteemed member of West Branch Monthly Meeting (Conservative Friends), Iowa. He came to Iowa in 1839, and located where he resided until his death, Seventh Month 7th, 1891. He was a man of strict uprightness and integrity, ever ready to lend a helping hand to those in need, and his loss will be deeply felt by a large circle of friends, and acquaintances, as well as his own family.

His health had been failing for some months, and he felt that it was nearing the terminus of life's journey, to which period he looked with calmness until it was reached, when he quietly passed away, he has expressed that he felt nothing in his way, and would manifest no anxiety at his death. His right turn of mind it would all be right.—Friends' Review please copy.

—, at her late residence in Philadelphia, Fifth Month 8th, 1891, REBECCA H. WILLS, widow of Jacob Wills, in the seventy-eighth year of her age. A member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends at Pleasantville, in the Western District. Formerly a member of Upper Evesham Monthly Meeting of Friends, New Jersey.

MARRIED, on the 9th of Seventh Month, 1891, Friends' Meeting-house, Chappaqua, N. Y. OTTENSIE FOSTER, son of J. B. and M. E. Foster, of Pleasantville, N. Y., and MARY ANN, daughter of Charles E. and A. J. Conklin, of the former place.

For "THE FRIEND,"

1802.—In the Seventh Month of 1802, being then a little over fourteen years of age, I was removed from the school [Westtown], having been there about two years and nine months—and being rather young to be placed an apprentice, my father got me into a counting-house of two Friends, in the flour business, in order to acquire some knowledge of book-keeping.—Their store was on the wharf, and when there was nothing urgent in the business, my inclination led me into the company of persons whose sentiments and habits were not congenial with a religious life; and thus, had it not been for the mercy of my Heavenly Father, I was in great danger of entering rapidly the broad way to destruction.

In my new situation I had many temptations to war with, from within and without. The business of a store that was much frequented, subjected me to intercourse with those who knew little or nothing of the work of religion, and a volatile, active spirit often led me from under the cross into converse with such, by which I suffered loss. I was much separated from the care of anxious and exercised parents; and though I was afraid of close intimacy with young persons who were of a libertine class, yet more or less I was drawn into company of two of them residing near the store; but their wicked habits and conversation created a dread in me of being joined to and carried into their depraved practices.

One fine winter evening, my master's sleigh and horses having been out, he told the apprentices we might take a ride, and accordingly, with one of these young men, we set off and rode out a few miles to the banks of the Schuylkill, when this young man proposed we should go out to a tavern and get something to drink. This was a new proposition to me, upon which I hesitated—having never been accustomed to go to taverns, or drink anything like ardent spirits. We got out of the sleigh, but I did not move from the side of it; and while hesitating, the countenance of my father presented to my view, as though he had suddenly appeared before me, which immediately conveyed the idea of disapprobation; and I gave my voice against going into the tavern; and we accordingly resumed our seats and rode home. This was an evidence of the watchful care of the unslumbering Shepherd of the sheep, in bringing to my mind the conviction, that were my father present, I would not dare to go into such a place—and further, shows the importance of the circumspect deportment of parents before their children, and of the application of salutary restraint towards them.*

Notwithstanding I had been thus far carefully educated and watched over by my parents, attended steadily the meetings for worship to which I belonged, and had been taught in the principles of the Christian religion as set forth in the New Testament, and in the writings and journals of Friends: believing that Jesus Christ was the Savior of the world—that He died for all mankind; and who would save all who were obedient to Him: that my Heavenly Father, who is almighty, saw me wherever I was, and every thought and every action that I did, and by his Holy Spirit in the heart, convicted me for sin, bringing me under the fear of death and everlasting torment; but gave peace whenever I resisted temptations and did right, yet, so far as I can remember, I had never yet had a full sense of my lost condition, and the necessity of an entire change of heart, in order that I might be brought into his favor, and sanctified so as to be fitted for spiritual communion with Him. My father frequently read the Bible to us, as well as other religious books, particularly on First-day. One evening, when collected for that purpose, I read to the family William Leddra's epistle, written the day before he was executed. It had a very powerful effect on me, tendering my heart in an unusual degree, and bringing me to trembling, under which I was favored with an extraordinary visitation of heavenly love, producing a sense of my sinful, impure condition, and fervent desires after holiness—that I might become changed, and hereafter live a life of acceptance with my Heavenly Father. I had never had the same view of myself, nor felt the same willingness and desire to dedicate myself to Him as at that time.—The savor of it continued many days. The light of Christ shone clearly into my heart, showing me that many of my habits were contrary to the Divine purity, and must be abandoned—that many of my words were light and unsavory, and a guard must be placed at the door of my lips. Love flowed in my heart towards my gracious Almighty Parent preeminently, and then towards all men as brethren and creatures of the same all-powerful hand. I desired above all things to be with Jesus, and to know Him to continue with me; and at the time it seemed as if He did converse and to manifest himself in a clear manner, so that his countenance was lovely, and I walked under his guidance and protection with great delight. It was the baptism unto repentance, the day of my espousals—the beginning of a new life; and while favored with these heavenly feelings, I thought nothing would be too hard to part with in obedience to the will of my Saviour.

From this time I began to love retirement and serious meditation, and to present myself in the presence of the Lord to partake of his favor, and to know my strength from time to time renewed.

Having never been accustomed to keep much company, and believing that a retired life was best for me, I contracted very little intimacy, excepting with one or two persons of a serious character. Our business required attention until ten o'clock in the evening, and when it was my turn to be at the store at night, if the business admitted of it, I passed the time in meditation, and reading religious, historical or scientific works. I had frequent conversation on points of doctrine with an orderly young man, a Methodist, apprenticed in the neighborhood to the same business, and a few times accompanied him to their meeting out of curiosity to observe their mode of worship; but I never saw anything among them that attracted me, or produced any dissatisfaction with my own religious profession. On the contrary, in some of their prayer-meetings, the passions appeared to be much exerted, and their efforts to convert persons from their evil ways, that they might "get religion," as they call it, seemed to operate much through the nervous system. Familiar association with other professors, or attending their meetings, appears to me quite improper for members of our Society. Those whose feelings are lively, may be caught by the excitement, and receive a bias which may unsettle them for a long time, perhaps through life. If we keep to our Divine Lord and Master, He will instruct us in the mysteries of his kingdom, and nourish with the bread and water of life which He gives, by which the inner man will be strengthened, and the soul made wiser than all teachers who are acting in their own spirit.—"He that drinketh of this water, shall thirst again;—but he that drinketh of the water that I shall give him," said Christ, "shall never thirst, but it shall be in him a well of water, springing up unto everlasting life."

The dignified station of a minister and messenger of the Gospel of Christ, for the purpose of gathering souls to Him and exalting his name and kingdom among men, was opened before me, and I fully believed that all who are rightly placed in that honorable office, are made ministers by Christ himself; and what they preach should be from the direct openings and communication of his Spirit in the heart, who only knows when his flock need instrumental help, and what is suited to their respective conditions. These things I was favored to see in the light of the Lord Jesus, and at times I felt as if I could stand forth as a servant

* The admonition contained in the foregoing note, may apply to any and every case, where young people are tempted to do that—whereupon W. E. so wisely "hesitated"—which would be disapproved by concerned earthly parents, especially so by our Omnipotent Father in Heaven, who is continually watching over us for good, and whose blessed Spirit is our spiritual reprover and infallible guide into all truth.

under his authority to proclaim the glad tidings of life and salvation, and gather souls into the Gospel net.

The Lives of Early Quakers.

That busy noise of controversial propaganda to which we listen across the centuries, must not make us forget the quiet daily life of the Quakers, which was its most effective argument. Much of this, from its nature, could not be recorded in history; but here and there we catch glimpses of the extraordinary fidelity to principle which characterized this people. It was their habit to bring every part of their behavior to the test of the Light, and to reject all which could not bear the pure celestial ray.

In their commercial dealings, they upheld a standard of probity which at first incurred suspicion from its very strangeness. William Edmondson found that the Friends' strict rule of verity, which would at once ask or offer the price intended to be given or taken, was a hindrance to doing business. "In those days the keeping one price in selling goods was a great stumbling-block to most sorts of people, and made them stand at a distance from buying for some time, until they saw farther into the justice of the manner thereof."

These Quaker shop-keepers carried the Light into their shops, and actually made the goods they dealt in, matters of conscience. Gilbert Latcy, a fashionable West-end tailor, who had been "in great business in the world," and who had a large connection among persons of rank and quality, whose apparel he had been accustomed to set off "with much superfluity of lace and ribbons," after he became a Quaker, found out that his conscience would not suffer him to aid and abet this extravagance, nor permit his servants to do so. He made his conscience the measure by which to cut his customers' coats. Naturally the customers objected; his business decayed; he was compelled to dismiss his workmen, and the prospect of having to become a journeyman himself stared him in the face.—Honest Gilbert escaped this hard fate somehow; probably as the Quakers increased in number, they found their way to his shop. Atkinson and Armstrong, doing business on the Scottish border, not only declined to smuggle, as was common around them, but refused to sell "such striped and gaudy cloth as was not seemly for Friends to wear."

Christopher Story tells us, that "honest Friends, of what employment soever, were then concerned to be testimony-bearers in the way of their trade and business; and though it looked for a time as if it would hurt their trades—yet, as Friends were faithful and persevered in a meek and quiet spirit, they prospered; and though some had but little when they were convinced, their endeavors were blessed; for being diligent in the management of their words and promises, they gained credit in the country." The time came when people would inquire for a Quaker tradesman or artisan. Then the Quakers grew rich, and wealth sapped the fortress which persecution and poverty had assaulted in vain. But that was in the after time. In this first age, honesty and industry, frugality and brotherly kindness, reigned among them. F. S. TURNER.

Nothing is more important in the mental training of a child than the bringing him to do what he ought to do, and to do it in its proper time, whether he enjoys doing it or not.

FROM "THE S. S. TIMES."

An Outing Among the Peaks of India.

BY HARRIET M. OGDEN NEVIN.

Among the most striking wonders of nature are the snowy Himalayan Mountains, as seen from some of the hill-stations in India. Although these peaks are the highest in the world, and are covered with everlasting snow, and their summits are miles away from the places to which the Indo-European resort during the heated season, people always speak of a trip to them as going to "the hills," never to "the mountains."

A visit to India, without at least a glimpse of Mount Everest, the highest of these peaks, and, consequently, the highest mountain in the world, would seem like a visit to Rome without seeing St. Peter's. So, one bright winter afternoon we left Calcutta for Darjeeling.

The Indian steam-cars differ greatly from ours, and are arranged exclusively for warm weather. Three ladies can always command an entire compartment to themselves when traveling over night, and generally during the day, although it is generally intended to hold six or eight. The cars are not very comfortable, unless you wish to recline; for the seats run along the sides under the windows, and, in order to look out at all, you must sit with your feet up on the seat, and leaning against either end of the car. Even if you desire to sit with your back to the window, the seats are so wide, and covered with such slippery leather, that one is constantly sliding down. Small bath-rooms often adjoin the compartments, with a shower-bath attached, which you can use whenever you please. At the other end of the car is frequently a space for baggage, as you have to carry everything with you that is needed at night, in the way of bedding and rugs. Hanging sometimes at the windows are "cuscuss tattles," or grass mats, that are kept wet in summer, so that the air blowing through them may keep the compartment cool.

Soon after we left Calcutta, our ride began to be a pretty one—past clumps of large tree-ferns, by groves of bananas, palms, and the exquisite feathery bamboo, with many brilliantly plumaged birds darting in and out among the branches, or perched high above us on the telegraph wires. Then we would pass large fields of tobacco, or plantations of rice, with the scantily attired natives wading in the marshy ground, gathering in the harvest.

Damookda Ghât was reached early in the evening, and a boat was taken to cross the dirty but sacred waters of the Ganges to Sara Ghât. Here a narrower gauge road awaited us, and we spent a comfortable and very cool night, requiring all our wraps to keep us warm. At Saliguri we partook of a good breakfast, and then we made the last change of our journey to funny little open cars, with awnings over the top, running on a road the gauge of which is only two feet.

Before we started we had a fine view of snowy Kinchinjunga, 28,256 feet high, the second highest mountain in the world. We soon lost sight of the snows, but had beautiful views of peaks clothed with green to their summits, and of the pretty Balasun valley and river. The Mahanuddy River was crossed by a high bridge; the river was far below us, and nearly dry then, but in the rainy season it often overflows the bridge. The narrow road up the mountain is really a marvel of engineering skill. There are so many curves that at no time is all of the little train straight on the track, and yet there is not a tunnel anywhere. But there is an almost bewildering succession of small circles, loops, and figures-of-eight, and several places where they cannot turn, but must run forward, then back on to another track, and forward again on a third.

The ground is so treacherous during the rainy season, and there are so many landslides at that time, that they have to deal gently with it; and although the road is only fifty miles long, it takes nearly a day, about seven or eight hours, to run either up or down. The grade is so very great at any point; and it was most amusing to see them, when we were hardly aware that we had commenced to ascend, have two men to run ahead of the engine to brush the leaves from the track before the little train could get along at all.

We passed through many native villages of the Lepchas, the aborigines of the hills, who look extremely like Mongolians, and of the Nepalese and Bhooteas. A great deal of jewelry is worn by these people—turquoises and coral abounding—and occasionally necklaces of rupees strung together. Then too, they use considerable paint, and go to the stations draped in fine cashmere shawls, beautifully colored.

As we steamed slowly along in our little train, it was interesting to watch the curious people, and to pass through the large tea plantations, with the tea in every degree of growth in bloom and being cut. We arrived at Darjeeling, 7,200 feet above the sea, about four o'clock in the afternoon. We climbed up a steep little hill to our hotel, "The Woodlands," and were given pleasant rooms, affording, they told us, a magnificent sight of the snowy range, but all was then clouded in mist; and we retired to rest, with gloomy forebodings of what the people in Calcutta had warned us. A dense mist and drizzle baffled us all the next day. We were delighted when we arose the following morning, however, to be told that it would be a beautiful day for our excursion.

Directly after breakfast we started for Sinchul, some of us on excellent little mountain ponies, with attendants to lead them, and some in "dandies"—a queer contrivance with long handles—looking like a coffin without any lid and carried by four men. When we first started before sunrise, the mountains were in the clouds but, shortly after, some dark shapes began to make their appearance, and a discussion arose as to their nature. One thought them too high to be anything but clouds, while another thought them certainly too high not to be snow-capped. Whilst the discussion was at its height, the sun arose, dispelling the mist—and imagine our amazement when we saw that these were only the dark, green-clad foot-hills, and far, far above them towered the masses of eternal snow in all their glory. The sense of height and grandeur was almost overpowering, and we could only gaze at the wonderful scene in silence, lost in a consciousness of the mighty works of God!

Below us nestled the pretty little town, with houses covered with roses and other flowers in full bloom. Then came the foot-hills clothed in vivid green, and then, far above, Kinchinjunga, and the rest of the mighty range—the peaks about 28,000 feet high, and looking close at hand, although forty miles away. For an hour and a half we rode up the mountain winding backward and forward—and all the way to Sinchul fine views of mountains, hills, and valleys were given us. At Sinchul we walked out on a barren, rocky plateau, and from there had a magnificent view of Everest, 29,002 feet high, the highest mountain in the world.

It was surrounded on all sides by other peaks closer to us, and so seemingly almost as high. Then we walked to the summit of Tiger Hill, and had a much more extended view, seeing all around the horizon. As we went up the hill, we saw a tiger's tracks, but caught no glimpse of the animal itself. At last we had to tear ourselves away from the magnificent scene; and, soon after we started on the descent, a heavy mist rolled in, and hid mountains, hills, and town from view, as if it were too marvellously beautiful to be long vouchsafed to human eyesight. On the way down, one of the dandypoles broke, and the occupant was only saved from coming roughly to the ground by the strength and dexterity of her bearers.

Later in the day we walked to Birch Hill, past the Governor's house, and the pretty bungalows embowered in roses, and enjoyed lovely views of the hills and picturesque little town, with its bazaars in full play; but it was too misty for any further sight of the mighty snows.

As we ascended the trail on the way to Simbul that morning, a jackal came rushing by our ponies' feet, and plunged into the dense underbrush on the other side of the road—that, and the tiger's tracks, making us realize a little more vividly that we were indeed in the heart of India. The next morning, another clear sunrise was vouchsafed us, and we once more, and for the last time, saw the Indian mountain snows in all their unequalled glory and majesty. As we returned to Calcutta, some of the party were "trolleyed" down the mountain—a process like coasting than anything else, with a wheeled truck instead of a sled, and car-tracks in place of snow and ice. And so we retraced our steps, spent another night in the cars—so different from our sleepers—and arrived in Calcutta about noon of the following day.

RIVERTON, N. J.

THEY ARE OF GOD.—"It is in my heart to eave behind me a testimony to the Truth. In my youth, when dead in trespasses and sin, and walking according to the course of this world, although in my infancy educated in an esteem of those precious testimonies borne by George Fox and his fellow-laborers to plainness of dress and address, I contemned them in my heart and departed from them in practice. When I was awakened to a sense of my lost and miserable state without a Saviour, I embraced them with all acceptance in their strictest forms, and have not since deviated from them, either in sentiment or practice, not for an hour. They are of God and will be established in the earth, when he crown of pride shall be cast down and the glory of all flesh abased. Nevertheless, let none, who by the influence of education or any other means, invariably adhere to them, glory in, or alue themselves upon a bare exterior conformity to these truths; while the inner man of their eart is full of pride, self-preference and ravening after the unrighteous mammon."—Samuel Coet.

AN INHERITANCE IN HEAVEN.—H. Kirk-White was so thoroughly impressed with a sense of the importance of his Maker's favor, that he said he would willingly give up all acquisitions of knowledge and all hopes of fame, and live in a wilderness unknown till death, if by so doing e could insure an inheritance in heaven."—Selected.

The Resurrection.

"Secret things belong unto the Lord, our God, but those things that are revealed belong unto us, and to our children forever, that we may do all the words of this law."—Deut. xxxii. 29.

These are the words of Moses, the servant of God, who wrote the first five Books of the Holy Scripture, and through whom the law was given to the Israelites. God, through Moses, had revealed much of his Divine will (to the Israelites) sufficient for their salvation, if they kept the law. Yet, as time rolled on, it pleased Him to unfold more and more the blessed purpose of his will, to gather all things, both in heaven and in earth, to himself in Christ; and faintly as it were, revealing to his people the glories of the world to come. He set before them the present benefits of blessing in a fruitful land, as a reward for faithfulness. The Sadducees approached Jesus concerning the resurrection. They rejected all Scripture but the Pentateuch, and denied any resurrection or angel or spirit, and as a necessary consequence, any future state in heaven or in hell. But Jesus unanswerably demonstrated to them from the inspired writings, which they themselves acknowledged, that there is a resurrection, even though Moses may not have particularly treated of that doctrine, like as the Book of Esther, though not once mentioning the name of God, yet declares loudly of his superintending providence. Now, the doctrine of the resurrection is one almost universally held by Christians, for what else could have supported them amid all the cruel sufferings which they were at one time called to endure: "for if in this life only we have hope, we are of all men most miserable." But God hath by the testimony and doctrine of Jesus and of his apostles, who themselves talked with Moses and Elias on the Mount, by the resurrection of the saints who appeared unto many in the city, and above all, by the resurrection of himself and his ascension into heaven, beheld by many witnesses, left the matter beyond cavil. And here we would gladly leave the matter were it not that some in these times would trouble the church by seeking to be wise above that which is written, and making their assumptions an important article of belief, whereas it may well be said to them as the Lord said to the Sadducees, "ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God." Matt. xxiii. 29. Neither would this error assume the importance it does, were it not a first stepping aside from the path of Truth, and as such the root of still greater departures. Then what say the Scriptures? for what is not consonant with their teachings is not from the Spirit that gave them forth.

"And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life and man became a living soul" (Gen. ii. 7); and it was said to him, "of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die." Gen. ii. 17. So man possesses evidently a natural life of the body, common with other living creatures, and a spiritual life which was capable of enduring temptation, which it did and succumbed thereto, and died to the Divine life and image in which man was first created. Again was it said to Adam, "till thou return unto the ground; for out of it was thou taken; for dust thou art and unto dust thou shalt return." Gen. iii. 19. Solomon asserts the same distinction (see Eccles. iii. 19-21), "that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; * * * all go to one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again." But of the spirit, He saith, "Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth?" Again, "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it." Eccles. xii. 7. To King David was given a more glorious revelation of his great successor, of whom He prophesied, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption," and yet the Jews well knew that the natural body of David moldered in his tomb. From the archaeological relics of the Egyptians, we can have no doubt that they held the belief of the resurrection of the natural body, and individuals may have thought this amongst the Jews, though their Scriptures were silent on the matter, but when we turn to the teachings of the New Testament, we find such a view strongly controverted.

Our Lord himself says that in heaven, "they are as the angels in heaven," whom we are told are ministering spirits. Did not Stephen, the protomartyr, on looking up, see Jesus standing waiting to receive him, when he cried, "Lord Jesus receive my spirit," and did the bereaved brethren not carry the body of their beloved brother to the grave? And Jesus said, "He that believeth in me shall never die." But this could not be spoken of the body.

Again, those who would affirm that the same body which we now occupy will rise again, must assuredly know how we shall appear, whereas the beloved Apostle John most emphatically declares, "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when He shall appear, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is." 1 John iii. 2. From this it is plain our future body and its nature is one of the secret things belonging unto God, and not revealed unto us, as in no ways essential to our salvation, and, therefore, for any one to affirm the necessity of believing a supposed solution of this secret, is a burden which they unwarrantably lay on men's shoulders, for they presume to be wise above that which is written, and such too often soon learn to despise what is written. John in his apocalypse saw "under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God, * * * and white robes were given unto every one of them." Rev. vi. 11. But it is the Apostle Paul who is more especially the Apostle to us, Gentiles, who hath treated of this doctrine most lucidly and fully (see 1 Cor. xv.), from which it is seen doubts of this great doctrine had already risen through misconstructions of unlearned ones. "But some will say, How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" The modern body resurrectionist would promptly reply, "With this same body. Not so Paul. To such he says, 'Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die, and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body which shall be, but bare grain—it may chance of wheat or of some other grain. But God giveth it a body, as it hath pleased Him, and to every seed his own body. He goes on to show that there are terrestrial and celestial bodies, but that the glory of one differeth from the glory of the other. But He strikes at the root of this carnal theory when He says, 'Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption' (v. 50); and in perfect unison with the passage already quoted from the Revelation of Jesus Christ, which He gave to us by his servant John, is the saying of this same Apostle Paul to the Corinthians, "If our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. For in this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house, which is from heaven; if so be that being clothed, we shall not be found naked." 2 Cor. v: 1-3.

In conclusion, let us not be vainly desirous to know the manner or character of this resurrection, since it appertains to another and an eternal world, and God in his wisdom has withheld such knowledge, but let us rather seek to assure ourselves that we, who were dead in trespasses and sins, have awaked to righteousness, and sin not, for "blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ and shall reign with Him a thousand years" (Rev. xx: 6). And if we are ever permitted through Divine and unmerited mercy to "awake in his likeness, surely we may be satisfied, and leave all else with Him who doeth all things well; and rather than judging each other uncharitably concerning that for which we have no data, let us with reverent thankfulness praise the goodness and grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, who himself tasted death for every man, and hath robbed death of its sting—so that we can look upon the remains of the dear departed ones and rejoice through our tears that they have fallen asleep in Jesus.

Cochise, the Apache Chief, and Peace.

BY L. E. DUDLEY, SUPERINTENDENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The expedition of General Kearney through New Mexico to the Pacific Coast, in 1846, first brought the citizens of the United States into contact with the Apache Indians; although their near neighbors, the Mexicans, had known them for nearly two hundred years. Magnus Colorado was then the chief of all the tribes of Apaches. Cochise was captain of the Chiricauha band, and war chief of his brother-in-law, Magnus Colorado. Some years after our occupation of the country, Magnus Colorado, Cochise, and many other prominent Apaches, with their families, were enticed into a corral at or near Fort McLean, now abandoned, in Southwestern New Mexico. Once safely within the corral and separated from their arms, the soldiers were ordered to fire upon these defenceless people—men, women and children. Nearly all (I think all but Cochise,) were killed, Cochise escaping, severely wounded. Through treachery, his chief and all the members of his own family had been killed; and is it a wonder that Cochise soon made the surrounding country extremely dangerous for white men?

Cochise at once rallied all the Apaches he could reach, and began a bloody war upon the whites. No road was safe to any traveller unless protected by an invincible armed escort. The Overland Stage Line then ran through Southern New Mexico, passing through Apache Pass, which is in the Chiricauha Mountains, and had always been the home of Cochise. The road through this pass winds about through mountains for five miles, sometimes ascending the steepest of steep hills, and again descending into the deepest valleys, with rocks overhanging it on either side. Behind these rocks, Cochise and his tribe lay in ambush hundreds of times, and waited for the unwary traveller. It has been estimated that four hundred men are buried in Apache Pass who met their death at the hands of the Indians. More than once bodies of troops have fallen into his terrible ambushade, and many a brave blue-coat has been sent to his long account by an arrow or bullet, which found its way to his heart from behind one of these fearful rocks. Eastward, for nearly a hundred miles, the road was watched by these terrible avengers. Cook's Cañon is another death valley, and has many and many a time been the scene of terrible carnage.—Travellers, grown bold because the Indians had not appeared there for a long time, have first become aware of their return by a fatal shower of arrows and bullets.

In the early days of the Overland Mail, a distance of one hundred miles was traversed by an open coach, with horses or mules; and the road was for a long period so dangerous, that men were paid one hundred and fifty gold dollars for a single trip; and it has been said that these men, whose cupidity induced them to accept this dangerous employment, generally lived to make only about three trips.

In many fearful conflicts with the troops, Cochise lost numbers of his best warriors, and frequently escaped by means which seemed, to his own superstitious people, and sometimes to his soldiers, miraculous. Once, when dangerously wounded and his horse killed under him, and with the troops but a few yards distant, he disappeared, only to return to his work a short time after. These escapes caused his tribe to look upon him as something more than human, and, without exception, they believed he had a charmed life and could not die. And this opinion they held until they saw him cold in death.

These fearful raids upon travellers along the line of the road, were varied by attacks upon settlers, and frequent incursions over the border into Old Mexico, and for a hundred miles along the northern frontier of Sonora, the inhabitants found Cochise a dangerous and unprofitable visitor.

In the year 1868, the new Indian policy was inaugurated, and means were found to treat with Cochise. The negotiations resulted in his abandoning his warlike career, and himself and his people taking up their abode upon a reservation in the valley of the Allamossa, about twenty miles in a direct line from Fort Craig. For two years peace reigned. Some depredations probably were committed; but the change was a great one, and gave satisfaction to all.—But white men had constructed a town upon what was to be the reservation, before it had been formally set apart as a home for the Indians, and demanded fabulous sums in payment for their improvements; and the Rev. Vincent Collyer, who had been sent out as a commissioner to arrange the matter, selected another reservation, one hundred and twenty miles further west, and ordered the removal of the Indians thither.

There were many objections to the new location. Cochise objected to being placed so near his old enemies, the Navajos, as well as to the country selected; but it was believed that the teeth of the old dragon had been drawn, and no fear was felt by the inexperienced men who had charge of the removal. But when the time came to move, it was found that Cochise had already moved himself and gone back to his old haunts. The Indians who did not belong to his own particular band, remained, and were removed to Tulerossa, from which the writer secured their return to Allamossa, three years later.

When Cochise left Allamossa, he went believing that the promises made him had not been kept, and at once entered upon his career of warfare again. Pursued by troops constantly, he was able to outwit them; and for months Fort Bayard, in New Mexico, was surrounded by them. No one dared to ride out of the post without an escort, and several unwary persons were killed within sight of that military stronghold.

Finally, General O. O. Howard was selected by President Grant to take the Indian affairs of our Southwestern frontier under his personal supervision, and through his fortitude and untiring zeal, he was enabled to do what all the troops on duty in that region had failed to accomplish. With one man for a guide, General Howard, at the peril of his life, penetrated to Cochise camp, and succeeded in making a treaty with the old warrior, which was never broken while he lived, nor by his people, until it had first been broken by an agent of the Government.

The writer first visited that section of the country a few months after General Howard had completed his negotiations, and found the people, almost without exception, bitterly hostile toward the one-armed general, for having made peace with their terrible foe. The universal desire was to have a war of extermination declared; and no one believed that Cochise would keep the peace that he had made. But the sequel proved that General Howard was right; and when, two years later, the writer was sent to remove these Indians, he found the citizens almost universally opposed to such an attempt. All agreed that Cochise had been faithful to his word, and that no depredations had been committed on our side of the border.

The reservation set apart for Cochise, by General Howard, embraced the Chiricauha and Dragon Mountains, with the valley four miles wide lying between, from Apache Pass southward to the Mexican line, the reservation being about forty miles wide and sixty long. If the same understanding which General Howard secured with Cochise had been reached twenty years earlier, more than a thousand human lives and millions of dollars' worth of property might have been saved.

To the last, Cochise entertained the greatest love and affection for General Howard. His spoke of him as a soldier who dared leave his troops behind and come and visit him alone, when to do so might have caused his death.—He regarded him as the personification of truth and fair dealing. The introduction which put the writer upon the best possible terms with Cochise, was a carte de visite of General Howard and himself, taken together, and no better recommendation could have been found. Cochise kissed the picture of General Howard, and continued to look upon the representation of the beloved features as long as he retained consciousness.

A Saving Regeneration.—Since nothing short of the grace that came by Jesus Christ can effect in us a saving regeneration, its inward guidance, therefore, is the most important principle of the Gospel dispensation, and is the surest rule for our faith and practice, since it cannot lead into error; and furthermore, is that for which all Christians ought most zealously and watchfully to strive after and to obey.—Selected.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A HYMN OF PRAISE.

For all pleasant social hours,
For earth's beauty and its flowers,
We thank thee Lord.

In all trials, all temptations,
Greater griefs and small vexations,
We need thee Lord.

For thy Son whom Thou hast given,
For the blessed hope of Heaven,
We praise thee Lord.

For thy leading in our blindness,
For thy own great loving kindness
We love thee Lord.

For a purer, nobler being,
For a faith from doubting freeing,
We ask thee Lord.

For the past, though it has faded,
For the future, dimly shaded,
We trust thee Lord.

All through life where'er we're going,
E'en to death's dark river flowing,
We want thee Lord.

For whate'er our souls are needing,
With our earnest heartfelt pleading,
We pray thee Lord.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

MADCAP MINNIE.

What shall we do with our youngest?" sighed Grandma,
Minnie the wildest of all in the nest,
Minnie with cheeks like the red russet apples,
Minnie whose black eyes were never at rest;
Dimpled and loving, but wayward and roving,
Ever of frolic or mischief in quest.

Now we are old, we resemble the children;
Join in their laughter and joy in their plays,
Fear to correct them, for fear they should sorrow
For her who brightened their infantile days.
Oh, if she only lay dead, then our Minnie Might have grown up with more womanly ways."

"Bless us," cried Grandpa, "there's many a changing
Bere the Spring's blossoms grow into the fruit,
Tide we'll fear for the buds and the flowers
Seen in our orchards, if sure of the root,
She is but twelve, let her still be 'our baby,' Munching this logic with stamp of the foot."

"What if she's nimble of foot as the roebuck?
What if she climbs up the trees like a boy?
What if a tomboy, the wildest in gambol?
Is she not ever our comfort and joy?
Nay, shall we miss the bright hues of life's sunset, Cause the small gnats of decorum annoy?"

"Then thro' our land came the storm-king that summer,
Rolled 'neath his chariot the thunders loud crash,
Flashed in his pathway the red lightning's glimmer,
Oh, shrieked the wind 'neath the cut of his lash.
All of the sky was now shrouded in mourning;
Down poured the rain with monotonous splash.

"Then a short respite, the sun peeping shyly,
Bore the day sleep in a mantle of gloom;
Entered the thunder, and searching, affrighted,
All sought our Minnie from room unto room, Searched, but we found not, and down swept the tempest,
Rushing and tearing with horrible boom,
Minnie had hastened on reaching the railroad,
To where a bowlder hung sombre and black;
For cherished refuge, but now, to her horror,
Lying torn up, right alongside the track,
And the express train would shortly be coming
Bound that same curving with none to warn back.

"Forward sprang Minnie, unheeding the tempest
Now raging round her with horrible roar,
Heaven only knows how she crossed o'er the trestle
Where never-ceasing the dark waters pour,
Clung to the cross-ties with hands groping blindly,
Crawled on her wounded knees, bleeding and sore.

Now o'er the track, 'tis one mile to the station,
Onward she fled, but the storm sped more fast,
Dashed in her face, tore the shawl from her shoulders,
Shrieked in her ear, but more loud than the blast,
Shrieked out the engine afar in the distance,
Shrieked for the homestead 'twas hastening past.

Into the station a small figure darted,
Panting and breathless, and dripping with spray,
"Stop the express there's a rock on the trestle,"
Such were the words ere she fainted away.
Out sprang the master, his hand on the signal:
"People and engine were rescued that day!"

Oh! how they sobbed as they bent o'er our Minnie,
Raised the bedraggled and shivering form.
Oh! how we smiled when they bore her safe homeward,
Cheerful and thankful, and clothed dry and warm.
How the kind neighbors all anxiously hastened
To see if "our Madcap" was hurt by the storm.

Minnie is now a sweet womanly maiden,
Thoughtful and loving, the pride of our town.

Was it the golden watch, gratefully given,
Token of praise, dearer far than ransom;
Was it the thankful prayers offered to heaven?
Or her grave peril that sobered her down?"

FROM THE "LONDON FRIEND," Dancing.

Dear Friend:—It has been brought to my knowledge that some young Friends in and about London, have formed a "dancing club," to which none but members of the Society, or those connected with it, belong.

It is but natural that we young Friends should begin to question whether an amusement such as dancing is not lawful for us as well as others. I maintain it is right that we should question this, and amongst others have done so.
After a short time of wavering, during which I placed dancing in my "doubtful" list, I came to this conclusion—that it was harmful on the following grounds:—

1st. That it would do me spiritual harm. I felt that, like many others, I should grow passionately fond of the amusement; that an occasional dance with my friends would not satisfy me—I should need balls and dancing parties.
These entail much expenditure of time and money, and of more thought on dress, both of self and others, than seems consistent with the high calling of a Christian. We are so much drawn by the things of sense, that it is difficult to keep pure and unsullied our communion with Christ, when we are occupied by a pleasure so absorbing as dancing, which seems to lead on to other pleasures of a dubious nature; and I knew that for me the outward excitement would dim the light which I cannot see with my outward eyes.

2nd. That it would hinder my testimony as one in the world, but not of it. Those who are not Christians regard Christ's followers as a people still apart; they are the very first to notice if we are not "unsported by the world," even when we do not perceive it, and perhaps follow their lead, thinking it no harm; and one of the very first amusements which a worldly points at a Christian for taking, is dancing. I have seen it, and been surprised and ashamed again and again by the keen insight which those who do not follow Christ have of what is lawful for his followers. I knew it would be a difficult and incongruous thing to speak of an indwelling Christian as my King in a ball-room even if the dancers were all Friends.

3rd. I found with bitter shame that circumstances such as these were a fruitful cause of sin and stumbling to our brothers and sisters.
If young Friends knew of half the evils connected with dancing, I do not believe that we should hear anything more of a "dancing club."

Paul, pleading with the Romans for his weaker brethren, said, with a pathos that goes to our heart of hearts, "Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died." And in Corinthians he exclaims, with terrible force: "But when ye sin so against the brethren and wound their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ."

There are many young men and women who, through seeing their "Christian" friends dance at social evenings, have been led to dancing, and more dubious amusements, till their spiritual life has been frittered away. This is an undoubted fact, and I vowed that if I could help it, no brother or sister should be led away from my Saviour by such inconsistency.

These were my personal reasons; but I should like to ask:—

1. If such amusement is in accordance with Friends' principles of separation from the world?
'They have held their ground as a peculiar people ever since the days of George Fox—Is this to cease now?

2. May it not be that we are forgetting that the Lord can only fully use consecrated, i. e., set-aside, vessels?

My firm conviction is, that if we should deny ourselves pleasures that are real pleasures, and be truly more what we are in theory—a people guided by the Spirit of God—we should be able to make more headway against the awful tide of sin and infidelity which besets every class, and that the Lord would be no longer among us as a mighty man that cannot save, but there would be such a wonderful outpouring of his Spirit as we have not dreamed of before.

Apologizing for trespassing so much on your space, I remain, yours sincerely,

A YOUNG FRIEND.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

While there is good reason to hope that the latest discoveries of Dr. Koch, in the treatment of pulmonary consumption and allied diseases, will result in some substantial benefit to mankind, it will be well to keep in mind the real advances made in the knowledge of these diseases during the last thirty years. The most important fact brought to light seems to be, that pulmonary consumption is an infectious, contagious disease. At all times there were some good observers who felt satisfied that this disease was often acquired through intimate contact with a person suffering from it—and the practical experiments made, to clear up this question, point to the same conclusion.

Once fully understood, these views lead to far reaching deductions. They imply that we may perhaps hope to stamp out the disease, if proper care is taken, that the unfortunate sufferers cannot infect their healthy companions. History shows that this result was obtained in the case of leprosy, and, within the last years, in the case of wound erysipelas, pyæmia and septicæmia;—possibly history can be made to repeat itself.

"RELIGION is the sweetest solace of life. I would rather be a Christian than the monarch of the world. That blessed name embraces and supposes principles more elevated, and joys more exalted, than all other names combined. Men may talk of honor, of integrity, and of moral rectitude; they may dream of pleasures and follow the phantom till they die, but the Christian alone possesses dispositions calculated to make us truly good or truly happy."—Selected.

WEST CHESTER, Twelfth Mo. 31st, 1857.

Dear —: Thy letter received yesterday, was truly refreshing; indeed I could not wonder that thou should devote time to one who feels so unworthy. But I believe we both know very well, that if any good is done, it is not of ourselves—for can we not in truth adopt the language of the Apostle, that “in me, that is in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing.” Happy, then, for those who have such an abiding faith in Jesus, as to look above themselves; and even over all the discouraging things that present themselves to our view: unto Him who is “mightier than the noise of many waters.” I trust thy example will be as a little leaven, which, as faith and faithfulness is maintained, will have its influence. “He maketh use of things that are not to bring to nought things that are.”

Oh, I think, I have seen the mischief that a want of proper attention to the government of the tongue has done, and is doing, even amongst us. It is very important for Friends to set an example to the world around us, of opposing wrong things, and supporting right things with a right spirit—with the renewed spirit—for it needs waiting for and being renewed, even from day to day: a truth which the world, and too many amongst ourselves, are slow to learn and too impatient to practise (myself among the number), as it ought to be. “The same Power that raised up and built the Church, must sustain it. The example of Uzza was for a warning to the Church, we must suppose for all ages. We have no reason to doubt his sincerity in wishing to save the Ark from danger, but the commandment for such occasions was broken, and the penalty must be paid as a warning to all. A very few words spoken in right authority—that is, in the right spirit and at the right time—will often avail much, when many words, without this, do but darken counsel. All the endless, countless contentions in the political world, arise from this very mistake, defending and opposing in a hasty, unsubdued spirit, which genders strife and thwarts the good that is aimed at. * * *

I believe it is very proper to have a judgment, and when called for, to be fearless in avowing it—and yet we are told to “judge nothing before the time:” showing that there may be, as there often is, a necessity for patience, for something, perhaps, to be brought to light, which may be important to a right decision; or which is more likely, that we may stand still and see the thing we desire brought about without our interference. If we become impatient, or intolerant to the opinions of others, we may be urged on to commit wrongs which it might be hard to repair. Do we not find the power of true religion on the mind, as it is submitted to, works in us a very humble opinion of ourselves and of our gifts, while at the same time we very properly entertain a high regard for the gifts of those whom we know to be in advance of ourselves in age and experience, and faithfulness. With such feelings as these, how cautious would we be in reproaching others—or in urging our claims to preference in any respect. Should we not rather be patient where we cannot see alike, and wait in faith until the mountain is removed and cast into the sea. “The name of the Lord is a strong Tower; the righteous flee thence and find safety.” May this be the experience of many.

With true regard, thy friend,

JAMES EMLEN.

Physical and Manual Training.

It is pleasant, in these times of “high art” and great intellectual pursuits, to find such an evidence as is contained in the following extract, of renewed attention being given to the training of the hand, as well as the head:

“Principal Sayre, of the Philadelphia Manual Training School, bears strong testimony to the practical value of industrial education in greatly increasing the opportunities for ambitious boys to make a living. It is no longer the case that boys educated in the city devote themselves so largely to mercantile occupation. ‘None of our boys,’ I might almost say, remarked Mr. Sayre, ‘take clerkships.’ There is always a demand equalling the supply, and all get positions where skill of hand and directive ability are needed. Scarcely a week passes but there is some fresh demand, and there are few of the boys who do not get positions. Some go into machine shops, others are secured by architects and draughtsmen; others again go with their fathers into the carpentering or building lines; and some again, become chemists.’ The beneficial effects are not confined to the boys in giving them a greater variety of vocations to choose from. The different trades and industries, and through them the general public, reap a distinct advantage in being able to recruit their ranks with bright young lads who have had careful training.”

There are no letters extant to be compared in fluency, beauty of language, and force of expression to those of Paul, the great apostle; and yet he was a tent-maker and wrought at his vocation.

George Fox was a shoemaker; and of his Journal, Spurgeon, the noted Baptist preacher, of London, says: “His life well repays the earnest student. It is a rich mine. Every page of it, is as precious as solid gold. Books, nowadays, are hammered out, and you get but little metal in acres of leaves; but the Journal of George Fox contains ingots of gold, truths which require to be thought of month by month before you can get to the bottom of them.”

John Woolman was a tailor by trade, and worked at it; of his Journal, Crabbe Robinson says, in his diary, “A perfect gem! His is a beautiful soul. An illiterate tailor, he writes in a style of the most exquisite purity and grace. His moral qualities are transferred to his writings. Had he not been so very humble, he would have written a still better book, for fearing to indulge in vanity, he conceals the events in which he was a great actor. His religion is love. His whole existence and all his passions were love.” Charles Lamb says of him: “Get the writings of John Woolman by heart and love the early Quakers.” In the preface to a little work called “John Woolman, a Study for Young Men,” by Thomas Green, believed to be a dissenting clergyman of England, he says: “Acting on this testimony, I read Sewall’s History and Woolman’s Journal, with all his extant writings, and I had no difficulty in following the latter part of Lamb’s advice and loving the early Quakers. They were indeed men of wonderful strength and simplicity of character. Their clear headed and clear hearted obedience to conscience, carried forward inculcatingly the cause of freedom, and laid mankind under lasting obligations.” “I thought it might be of some advantage to the young men and others to whom I minister, if I brought before them the character of John Woolman. * * * I would urge them to get his Journal for themselves, * * * and to ‘read mark, learn, and inwardly digest’ it, even if they do not literally carry out Lamb’s advice and get his writings ‘by heart,’ I think, if they do this, they will receive into their lives a pure and stimulating influence that will benefit them to the end of their days.”

Many, if not most of our ancestors acquired in their younger lives a knowledge of some handicraft, and there is no evidence that such knowledge impaired in the least their intellectual attainments or usefulness.

It is a great relief to the overtaxed mind to be able to take hold of tools and execute a piece of hand work—and it is hoped much good may result from the establishment of the “Manual Training” department of Westtown Boarding School, as well as elsewhere.

Natural History, Science, etc.

A Large Heronry.—An unusually large settlement of herons has been discovered in the hills near Valley Forge, Chester County, Pa. Two visitors to the spot counted over 600 nests. Dr. Hughes found that turkey vultures eat the young, while crows pick the eggs. The trees are also all covered with the lime of the herons. The immense number of the birds causes their chattering to be very noisy, continually and can be heard distinctly a quarter of a mile away. The heronry has consequently been of great annoyance to the farmers in the vicinity.

Two Affectionate Horses.—Horses become greatly attached to places and people, and there have been anecdotes how, on leaving some old familiar place or being sold to a new master, they have pined and grown ill as faithful dogs might do. I knew a farmer once who had two little colts who were kept in the same stable at night and in the same field during the day. Such a bond of affection existed between them that they were positively unhappy apart. They ran around knee-deep in clover, biting playfully at each other’s ears, and disputing their respective rights for apples and sugar handed to them through the bars. When they were about a year old, one of them was sold, and although there were others left to play with the year-old colt, he moped and grew irritable and very mournful. This continued for weeks, and then the sensible little animal began to regain his old-time gayety and exuberance of spirits. Two years after, when that gentleman who had bought the other colt moved away, he had a sale of all his horses and stock, and my old farmer bought the colt back. He was put in the field with his old friend, and immediately there was a great rush, as the two young animals flew toward each other, apparently with the wildest joy, rubbing each other affectionately, and giving vent to little whinnings of pleasure. Without a doubt each recognized in the other his first playmate and old friend. The farmer kept them for a number of years driving them together, and when I saw them they were quite an old Darby and Joan couple.—The Illustrated American.

Sea Cask Water—Snow Water.—There is no the least reason to suppose that if “pure” water were put in the butts which go to sea that there would be any change whatever in it, but, as a matter of fact, the water put on ship board is rarely even approximately pure. It is not unfrequently taken on board from rivers and creeks, the water of which is alleged to be “fresh,” and that single alleged quality is enough for the sailor. Such water will go through a peculiar process, called "fermentation," but which really consists in the oxidation of the matters in suspension and in solution. The results of the oxidation are found in the form of a sort of mud on the bottom of the cask.

Rain-water from the roof, especially if it be caught in cisterns before the roof is thoroughly washed, will carry with it more or less of organic matter, which will, by standing, be oxidized, and thus the water will lose the yellowish look which it is apt to have when the first of the storm water is caught. As respects snow, there is something more to be said. There is good reason to think that the process of crystallizing commences in the upper air on the minute surfaces of the dust particles which are always present there. These are organic in character for the most part. Hence we have from melted snow the organic matters which serve as nuclei for the crystals, but, in addition, we have a considerable amount of condensed gaseous matter. Ammonia, nitric acid, carbonic dioxide, and all the products of combustion and putrefaction on the earth's surface, are constantly either formed in the air [as in the case of nitric acid by lightning] or poured into it. The low temperature in the regions where crystallization is going on, favors the condensation of these gases, and so they are brought down with the snow, and, of course, are found in the water which is formed by its melting.—The Independent.

ATTRactions OF CONTINENTS FOR WATER. Prof. Angelo Heilprin, in a recent address before the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia, drew attention to observations on the attraction of continents for the water which bounded them, the result being to elevate the water along their shore lines much above the level of the sea a long distance from the land. According to this a ship is sailing "up hill" when approaching land, and running down hill when sailing away. He stated that, at the mid-Atlantic Ocean the surface of the seas was 3,000 feet nearer the earth than on the continental shores. In relation to the supposed elevation or depressions of coast lines, the Professor states his to be owing rather to the elevation or depression of the tide levels in consequence of varying attractions. It may be inferred, though the Professor did not say so, that Greenland is comparatively flat surface would have less attraction for the water than when covered by mountains of ice, and that such diminished attraction would result in lowering tide levels on neighboring shores.

EIGHTH MONTH 8, 1891.

The following memorandum, left by that odd man and eminent minister of the Gospel, Thomas Chalkley, seems to us so instructive and so suggestive of the duties which devolve on the present generation, that we believe it best to re-produce it here.

It is well known that horse-races, prohibited by the laws of New Jersey, are habitually practised near Gloucester; that that State, in close vicinity to our city; that the race-course is the sort of gamblers, who bet large sums of money a result of the races; that the efforts of a well-disposed and law-abiding citizens of Camden County to enforce the laws have thus far been frustrated by the indifference of the legal authorities and the influence of those pecuniarily interested in the races, or in furnishing drink to their frequenters; and that of the public newspapers of Philadelphia, some even which claim to be respectable, encourage these violations of the law and the iniquities connected with them, by constantly publishing the results of the races: thus giving them an effective, free advertisement.

Is there not reason to believe that the Divine displeasure is kindled against those who are participants in this evil, or who do not use that effort to effect a reformation which the Lord calls for at their hands?

The memorandum referred to is as follows:—

"I may not omit taking notice of an exercise, which I felt one night as I lay on my bed in Philadelphia, the 21st of the First Month [1727]; my sleep being taken from me. It was in this manner:

"That the Lord was angry with the people of Philadelphia, and Pennsylvania, because of the great sins and wickedness which were committed by the inhabitants in public houses, and elsewhere. That the Lord was angry with the magistrates also, because they use not their power as they might do, in order to suppress wickedness; and do not so much as they ought, but the laws already made into execution against profaneness and immorality;—and the Lord is angry with the representatives of the people of the land, because they take not so much care as they ought to do to suppress vice and wickedness, and wicked houses, in which our youth are grossly corrupted; and also the Lord is angry with many of the better sort of the people, because they seek after and love the things of this world, more than the things of his kingdom. It was showed me that the anger of the Most High would still be against us, until there was a greater reformation in these things. It is worthy of commendation that our governor, Thomas Lloyd, sometimes in the evening, before he went to rest, used to go in person to public houses, and order the people he found there to their own houses; till, at length, he was instrumental to promote better order, and did in a great measure suppress vice and immorality in the city."

It has been suggested that it would be desirable to give notice through our columns, that Concord Quarterly Meeting, on the 10th and 11th of the present month, will be held at Media, instead of at Concord, as heretofore. Under the present arrangement, it convenes at Concord but once in the year (in the Fifth Month), the other three times being at Media.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President has issued a proclamation announcing the ratification of the treaty of reciprocity with Spain.

There was no reduction in the debt during the Seventh Month, but the Treasury is stronger by nearly $2,000,000 than it was on the 1st ultimo.

The total number of immigrants arriving in this country during the last fiscal year was 559,496, as against 451,219 during the fiscal year 1890.

Chief Mays, of the Cherokee Nation, has issued a proclamation calling upon all Cherokees who have cattle grazing on the Cherokee strip to pay their grazing tax at once to Revenue Collector Critchfield. Any refusal to pay will be regarded as treason against the Cherokee Government. He has invoked the aid of the Interior Department to eject all persons except Cherokees from the strip and confiscate their cattle. Critchfield has already begun collections.

Steps are being taken by the People's Enforcement League in Augusta, Maine, for the prosecution of a case against the County Attorney of Waldo County for the non-enforcement of the Prohibitory law.

A new bridge is to be built over the Harlem River, at Seventh Avenue. It will cost $1,250,000, and will have the widest draw in the world. This will be 412 feet long, and will be 4,500 tons and be operated by a 60-horse power engine.

The largest pine tree in Massachusetts is said to be on the road between Shrewsbury and Holden. It is 92 feet high, and midway up its trunk its circumference is 154 feet. The tree is thought to be 150 years old.

A vein of nickel, seven feet wide, is reported to have been uncovered near Hope, Idaho.

An insect pest, resembling the measuring worm, is reported to be destroying the foliage and killing the hemlock trees in Potter County, in this State. Thousands of trees are dying from its ravages.

Deaths in the city last week numbered 427, being a decrease of 120 from the previous week, and an increase of 13 over the corresponding week of 1890. Of the foregoing, 170 were under one year of age; 227 were males and 200 females; 81 died of cholera infantum; 37 of consumption; 34 of diseases of the heart; 51 of marasmus; 18 of convulsions; 15 of inanition; 16 of pneumonia; 16 of cancer; 15 of inflammation of the brain; 13 of inflammation of stomach and bowels, and 10 of typhoid fever.

Markets.—U. S. 4½'s, reg. 100; coupon, 101 ½'s; 118; currency 68, 110 a 120.

FLOUR.—Quotations: Winter bran, in bulk, $16.00 a $16.75; spring bran, in bulk, $15.00 a $15.75.

FLOUR.—Western and Pennsylvania super, $3.75 a $3.90; do, do, extras, $4.00 a $4.25; No. 2 winter family, $4.25 a $4.50; Pennsylvania, roller process, $4.50 a $4.90; Western winter, clear, $4.50 a $4.75; do, do, straight, $4.75 a 5.00; winter patent, new, $4.90 a $5.25; Minnesota, clear, $4.50 a $4.80; do, straight, $4.75 a $5.10; do, patent, $5.00 a $5.40. Rye flour was quiet and steady at $4.15 for new and $4.50 per barrel for old and new mixed.

GRAIN.—No. 1 white wheat, $1.07 a 1.08 ½ cts. No. 2 mixed corn, 67 ½ a 68 cts.

No. 2 white oats, 34 a 35 cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extras, none here; good, 5½ a 5½ cts.; medium, 5¼ a 5½ cts.; fair, 4½ a 5 cts.; common, 4 a 4½ cts.; culls, 3 a 3½ cts.; 5 Texans, 3 a 4 cts.; fat cows, 2½ a 3 cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5¼ a 5½ cts.; good, 4½ a 4¾ cts.; medium, 4¼ a 4½ cts.; common, 3½ a 3¾ cts.; culls, 2½ a 3 cts.; lambs, 4 a 6½ cts.

HOGS.—Choice Western, 8½ a 8½ cts.; common Western, 7½ a 8c.

FOREIGN.—Passengers who arrived in New York on the 1st inst. on the steamship Portia, from Halifax, say that the closing of the lobster canning factories on the west coast of Newfoundland has created a perfect panic among thousands of workmen formerly employed in them, and they are actually starving. They say no report of the condition of affairs could be exaggerated. A. M. Dyer, of the London Standard, says that the Boston Herald says that the closing of the lobster canning factories on the west coast of Newfoundland has created a perfect panic among thousands of workmen formerly employed in them, and they are actually starving. They say no report of the condition of affairs could be exaggerated.

Great excitement was caused on the night of the 2nd inst. in the city of Barcelona, by an attack made on the garrison of the city by a band of fifteen revolutionists, all of whom were soon captured.

An associated press despatch of the 1st instant from Berlin says:

The Emperor's projected measure for the repression of public drunkenness, has become, under the manipulation of the Ministers, merely a proposal that the Landtag should increase the penalties imposed on drunkards. Ministers Herrfurth and Miquel and others concur in the belief that the public would not tolerate active legislative interference with drinking. The Emperor thinks differently. A draft of the proposed bill was sent to him and was returned with suggestions concerning State supervision of the healthy qualities of beverages. Impressed with the recent official statistics concerning the growth of criminal offences and suicides arising from drink, the Emperor has opened an inquiry in regard thereto, and is drawing evidence from hospital and other medical sources concerning the increasing use of potato spirits and other impure alcohols, and how far the use of these spirits may be regarded as a leading factor in crime.

The official returns of suicides committed in Berlin during the year 1890 show a total of 147. The cause of this enormous self-destruction is at-

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

1808. When I became of age the prospect of commencing business for myself involved me a serious thoughtfulness, but as it was for my support, I took a house and opened a drug store in a moderate way, in the Twelfth Month, 808, but while it was a necessary duty to provide for my own subsistence, the kingdom of heaven and the righteousness thereof were in my view, primary to everything else. I set out with the desire to have the world kept under foot, and to devote myself to the Lord and to whatever service He might call to; at the same time it was my settled conviction that to provide things honest in the sight of all men is a bounden duty where health permits, and that in the prosecution of business, strict integrity in dealing and a scrupulous guard against contracting debts without ability to discharge them, and to live within the limits of our income, are also duties indispensable to the Christian.

I had a great fear of bringing any shade or reproach upon the profession of the Truth, or upon the Society to which I belonged; and whenever any business presented, however profitable, which appeared to me to conflict with either, I felt most easy to decline engaging in it. Although my transactions were on a small scale, and consequently did not open the way for the accumulation of riches, which sometimes as humiliating, and produced sensations of dissatisfaction that I was not likely to stand among men as independent as many others, or procure the accommodations which they had, yet I never was involved in any difficulty in my meeting my engagements, and was always able to provide every comfort in life that I desired. Since that day I have observed one among us who had succeeded in accumulating wealth, looked upon those who were small business with contempt, and at times spoke slightly of their scruples respecting Friends engaging in extensive concerns.

But the latter have a refuge which cannot be assailed by the pride or superciliousness of man, into which they are often permitted to flee and find safety. Whenever I was subjected to sensations of that kind, retirement to my Divine Lord and Master, committing myself and my course I had taken to Him, and looking reward for consolation and the recompense of him at the end of the race, raised me above these earthly and sordid views, and gave me an authority and dominion over that spirit, of which none could deprive me. Wealth and the importance arising from it were nothing to me, and not worthy of comparison with a place in the Lord's house, and the honor and dignity with which He clothes his humble, faithful children.

1809. Business opening very slowly in the following spring, I felt concerned lest it should not prove adequate to my necessities, and one day sitting in the store seriously and solitarily contemplating my prospects, my gracious Master condescended to show me that if I was faithful to his requirings, I should never want food or raiment. The language and impression were so clear, humbling my heart before Him, that I believed his word, and thereby proved that that faith, of which He is the author, is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen; my mind firmly and peacefully rested in it, as much as it would have done in an independent estate, although no change in the business very soon occurred.

1811. On the 11th of the Twelfth Month, I was married to Deborah, daughter of Aaron and Abigail Musgrave. Some time before she had been brought under the convicting power of Truth, with several other young persons who attended our meeting, and was strengthened to exchange a life of gaiety and mirth for one of simplicity and humble walking with her Divine Lord and Master, and was then received a member among Friends. Our engagement was not entered upon without the requisite deliberation and strong desire to be preserved from taking such an important step, unless accompanied with a sense of Divine approbation. This was graciously afforded by Him whom we desired to obey in all things; and although many years were not allowed for our earthly pilgrimage together, yet the few were past in much sweetness of fellowship, and their termination was a bitter cup to the survivor.

1812. [After a visit to the seaside, he writes:] To weakly or sick persons, sea air and bathing are doubtless often useful; but amongst the mixed companies that resort to these watering places, there are many incitements to throw off the restraints of the cross, and to fall in with the current of fashion and dissipation, and the use of language and manners quite at variance with our religious profession. Being removed from the society of parents and religious friends, and consequently under the influence of their example and their known sentiments in opposition to these corrupt liberties, a salutary restraint is withdrawn, which makes it easier for young persons to take liberties they would not resort to under their supervision; and they may be too easily induced to frequent those places, where they may receive moral wounds more dangerous than the physical disorders which they seek to have cured.

again writes:] One day, sitting in our religious meeting, it plainly appeared to me that though the mind may be able to compass much, yet beyond its capacity it cannot go. If all its energies are enlisted in the concerns of the world, and their pressure is as great as it is capable of bearing, the all important work of religion must be neglected. This, it appeared to me, must inevitably be my case [should I enter upon a large business]. My time and talents would be wholly engrossed, and I must abandon all prospect of usefulness in religious society for the privilege of serving a man of the world.

[In taking a view of the character of a disciple of Christ, and how he became a disciple, our Journalist, in 1814, writes:] "Take my yoke upon you," said our blessed Lord, "and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly of heart." Here the attention of the mind is arrested, and as it submits to him, He gradually unfolds to it what He would have us to leave undone and what to do. As his requirings often prove the reverse of our inclinations, we often need the aid of his Spirit in conforming to them, which in this case is compared to a yoke to keep down our propensity to evil, or a cross to crucify our stubborn wills, which often rises in opposition to the coming of his kingdom in the heart. "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, take up his cross daily and follow me." The direction and rule of the heart are to be entirely given into his hands. We are not to choose for ourselves, but, simply as little children, attend to his daily instructions, which, as we carefully follow, will produce growth and increase of spiritual strength. Our sinful propensities and passions will become gradually weakened—our affections loosened from things below and set on things above; and through the prevalence of his love it will become our meat and our drink to do the will of our Father who is in heaven. Various are the baptisms, the inward plungings and washings we must witness before this state is attained; but it is, nevertheless, our duty and our highest interest to come to it, and without it we shall fall short of the stature of a perfect man in Christ Jesus.

1815. [In a short testimony concerning his wife when on the bed of death, he records that on one occasion.] "With uncommon energy, she broke forth nearly in these words: 'Oh! that I had the opportunity to testify to the goodness of the Almighty, and that it was in my power to impress upon the young people the very great importance of giving up in early life, that the mind may have a foundation to rest upon in the time of trial when the world is as nothing.' And again she said: 'When but about eleven years old I was so clearly convinced of a principle within, that condemned for doing wrong and led to do that which was right, that I have been induced to leave my pillow with my cheeks bathed in tears, and on my knees pray that I might be a good child. I have craved that they (her children) may remember their Creator in the days of their youth, and have desired that rather than that they should not walk in the way that is well pleasing to Him, He would be pleased, while in their innocence, to take them to Himself."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this. To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." James 1:27.

Not only from the world without, but from the world within,—“the lusts of the flesh, the lusts of the eye, and the pride of Life which is not of the Father, but of the world.” It is declared in the Revelations of John concerning such as had their robes washed and made clean, “they shall walk with me in white, for they are worthy.” The question which now presents itself is, Who among the different professors of religion make it manifest in their lives that they are of the number of the blood-washed? By the Angel’s account of the Church of Sardis, but few were found. Is it to be supposed that among high professors more are now to be found, because of greater and higher claims to holiness? Away with the supposition!

There is nothing in sacred Scripture, when rightly interpreted, that will justify the claim to be holy—by conversion, by water baptism, by human imaginings or inventions of any kind. No!—(say the modern claimants)—We claim Holy Ghost power, and Holy Ghost baptism—while in the use of water, as confirmatory.

What need of confirmations, when the seal to a godly life is not in forms and ceremonies? Under the outward law—God did show unto man what was good; that, in order to gain acceptance with Him, man was required to do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly. Under the Gospel, it is more abundantly to be witnessed, that “according to his mercy, He saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost; which He shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour.”

Then, away with the religion that vaunteth itself without power to prove that what is professed hath in it a reality. The magicians of Egypt could imitate, but could not create even the meanest little thing that hath in it life to disturb life. But better things are to be hoped for from the professed followers of the Lamb of God—who was himself holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners—while ready to bless and do them good by turning to Him with full purpose of heart to serve Him.

“The humblest being born is great

If true to his degree;
His virtue illustrates his fate,
Whatever that may be.”

P. R. GIFFORD.

PROVIDENCE, Seventh Mo. 28th, 1891.

The Law and the Testimony.—“From my being first convinced of sin, righteousness and judgment, I have been shy of receiving either doctrinal or practical truths upon trust, or only because others have received or believed them; my concern having rather been to try them by the law and the testimony—‘the law of God after the inward man,’—and the precious testimonies of Holy Writ. If all who profess the Truth, as held forth by us called Quakers, were built upon the rock of Divine and internal revelation, the rapid inroads of libertinism would be repelled and deism extirpated. But the law written on the fleshy tables of the heart, the Scriptures of Truth, and the counsel of concerned elders and brethren, would, as a three-fold cord, unite and not easily be broken.”—Samuel Scott, Church Councils.

[The following notice of some of the early councils in the Christian Church is condensed from an article on the subject, by Prof. Lovejoy, in The Episcopal Recorder. Its effect on the mind of the reader will probably be to lead him to the conclusion that it is not safe to place much reliance on the conclusions come to by bodies of men, who were exposed to so many influences beside the pure love of the Truth.]

The “General Councils” of the Church are seven. Though called oecumenical, or universal, they were, both in locality and make-up, Eastern and Greek. All but Ephesus were at or within easy distance of Constantinople and the palace. General councils in any strict sense have never been held. The list is as follows:—

1. The First of Nicea..... 325.
2. The First of Constantinople.....381.
3. The Council of Ephesus.....431.
4. Council of Chalcedon.....451.
5. The Second of Constantinople 553.
6. The Third of Constantinople.....680.
7. The Second of Nicea.....787.

To the seven recognized by the Greek and Latin Churches, the Latins added twelve more, some of which deserve mention. The Church of England in her Homilies, speaks of “six councils which were allowed and received of all,” the first six. All through the early Christian centuries local synods were frequently held, but none of a “general” character till Constantine convoked the first of Nicea.

At first, church councils were composed of the clergy and laity, with about equal privileges; then to clergy was reserved the right of voting; later, after fourth century, or as others, after Nicea, the lower clergy and laity were excluded, and the bishops, as representatives of the apostles, alone decided the terms of the Catholic Faith.

At Nicea were assembled 318 bishops, about one-sixth of the whole number in the empire.

The subject before it was the true doctrine of the son of God in opposition to Arius the Presbyter of Alexandria. Arius was not, as often conceived, a Unitarian, but in language approximated very closely to Orthodoxy. Christ, with him, was created ages before the world began, and at an infinite distance from all other creatures; still, as he expressed it, avoiding the word “time”—“there was when He was not.”

There was no bishop of Rome, and only seven Latin bishops. St. Peter’s chair had no voice in the greatest of the Christian Councils. Of those present all but a few from the far East had suffered in the persecutions some bodily mutilation or injury. Two are mentioned as having had their right eye dug out with a sword, one as banstrung in his right leg. To most of them it was a great event—the greatest in their lives. They were to see the Emperor for the first time, on whom they must have gazed as on an angel from heaven. From the scorching flames of the Diocletian persecution, they had come to this happy day. Their experience was like Peter’s in prison, an angel had opened the door to liberty. They met in one of the large rooms of the palace, having had their preliminary meetings in a church. In the centre was placed a copy of the Gospels “as the nearest approach to the presence of Christ himself” and near it a throne or central seat for the Emperor, with ranges of seats and benches stretching away to either side.

Notice next the entrance of the Emperor: Constantine came in at the head of a procession of Christian officers of the palace with shields and spears, headed by the avant courier, bearing the customary torch. His speech in Latin, interpreted at once into Greek, given by Eusebius, is full of one thought—his disappointment on coming to sole rule that the Christianity that he had looked to as a bond of union should threaten to dissolve the Empire. “To me far worse than any war or battle, is the civil war of the Church of God.” * * * “Do not delay, dear friends; do not delay, ministers of God, and good servants of our common Lord and Saviour, to remove all grounds of difference.”

The two men who stood opposed as the debate progressed were Arius, tall, lean, of great pallor, and with downcast eyes from defective sight, wearing an ascetic garb, of pleasant voice and winning manners, and with the weight of sixty years upon him. He was opposed by the almost dwarfish presence of Athanasius, who is described as of bright, serene countenance, with hooked nose and light Auburn hair. This is Athanasius, whose firmness first shown on this memorable day, is to win him lasting renown embalmed in Richard Hooker’s Latin as Athanasius contra mundum. Hardly twenty years of age, his wonderful vehemence and ability in debate not unaturally aroused the jealousy of many of his elders. Eusebius of Nicomedia led the extreme Arian party, and their creed was at once torn in pieces. Eusebius of Cesarea headed a middle party, approved by the Emperor, and acceptable to Arians, and which at first seemed to constitute a majority.

The First Council of Constantinople, under Theodosius the Great, had 150 bishops, all from the East, and of Nicene faith. They were busy with the doctrine of the Procession of the Holy Ghost. Gregory Nazianzen presided, and one of the first acts of the Council was his consecration to the See of Constantinople, which he shortly receded from to avoid a quarrel [a thing much too common in those days] with the rival claimant.

The Council of Ephesus was opened prematurely by the impetuous Cyril. He would not wait for Nestorius, who came later with eighteen bishops in military array. Cyril has been named the Champion of the Virgin, Cyprian is the father of the extreme views of Church and pre- lacy. “Outside the visible Church no salvation” is his. Ephesus condemned Nestorius with needless savagery, of which one sequel was the growth of the Nestorian schism in the East.

At the “Robber Council,” of Ephesus, so named by Leo the Great, in a letter to Pulcheria, Flavian, Bishop of Constantinople, was so badly beaten and trampled by the Egyptian followers of Dioscorus, that he died three days after.

Chalcedon, 451 A. D., was the most numerous attended, and in addition the most tumultuous Council. It is also the second in importance. The doctrine of the Two Natures was settled then. Here is part of an authentic report of the Council itself: “And when the most reverend Bishop Theodoret entered, the most reverend the Bishops of Egypt, Ilyria, and Palestine shouted out—‘Mercy on us!’ the faith is destroyed. The Canons of the Church excommunicate him. Turn him out! turn out the teacher of Nestorius! On the other hand the most revered the Bishops of the East, of Thrace, Pontus, and Asia Minor, shouted out—‘We were compelled [at the former Council] to subscribe our names to blank papers; we were scourged into submission. Turn out the Manichans! Turn out the enemies of Flavian; turn out the adversaries of the faith.' Dioscorus, the most reverend Bishop of Alexandria, said, 'Why is Cyril to be turned out? It is he whom Theodoret has condemned.' The most reverend the Bishops of the East shouted out, 'Turn out the murderer Dioscorus. Who knows not the deeds of Dioscorus?'—with much more of the same sort. The 28th Canon of Chalcedon, while asserting the equality, gave the priority in honor to the Bishop of Rome over him of Constantinople.

At the Fifth Council, at Constantinople, 553 A. D., under the Emperor with whose name is forever connected the famous legal "Code of Justinian," the decrees of the four previous councils were made part of the common law. Here is the formal union of Canon and Civil law.

The Seventh, or Second Nicæa, is memorable as settling the "Image Controversy." The decrees were signed by the empress-mother, the famous Irene, as well as by her son, Constantine V. It was decreed that "images and pictures of the Saviour and Virgin, of angels and saints, were to be set up for kissing and reverence, but not for that real worship which belongs to God alone."

What lessons may we learn from all this? First the catalogue itself is a descending series—from ill to bad, to worse. As these councils—I mean the first seven—were Eastern, in this fact, that they represent Greek-Oriental Christianity, lies the special value their study may have for us. And so Stanley, from whom I all borrow for his suggestiveness, without endorsing all that he says. Quoting the German proverb, "Behind the mountains there are also people," he begins, "Behind the mountains of our knowledge, of our circumstances, of our acts, * * * is to be found nearly a third part of Christendom, one hundred millions of souls professing the Christian faith. Even if we enter to further into their history, it is important to remember that they are there. No theory of the Christian Church is complete which does not take account of their existence."

"In some respects the spirit of the Eastern clergy is more hierarchical than that of the Latin clergy. * * * For centuries in the Church of Alexandria, and still in the Church of Armenia, the dead hand of the first bishop has been employed as the instrument of consecration in each succeeding generation. This is a more carnal and literal representation of a priestly succession than is to be found in any Western ordinations."

If we were bent on having dogmatical belief and conservative tradition to its fullest extent, we must go not to the Church which calls itself Catholic, but to the Church which calls itself Orthodox—to the Church which will die but never surrender the minutest point which Council or Father has bequeathed to it. * * * Remember that in the eye of orthodox Greeks the Pope is not the representative of a faith pure and undefiled, but [I quote their own words] is the first Protestant, "the founder of Germanationalism!"

PUNDITA RAMABAI held the second anniversary of her "Sharada Sadhau," or widow's home, recently. — Ranade, the intelligent wife of a cultured native of Poona, a member of the legislative Council, presided with dignity; and another well educated woman moved an address of thanks, with remarkable self-possession. This surely indicates progress in the conservative city of Poona, a stronghold of Brahminism.

Extracts from My Christian Experience.

BY T. G. TAYLOR, THE CONVERTED CONVICT.

INTRODUCTION.

A child may sometimes suggest a consolation, which might not otherwise have cheered a desolate heart; and even a flower smiling upward from the sod, may turn the thoughts heavenward. May I not hope that by the Holy Spirit's grace, as the reader turns to my simple page, he will hear in it a still, small voice, whose speech shall be the word of God to his soul?

CHRISTIANITY, AND HUMAN WANT.

Judging from personal experience, every human being finds himself indicted before the bar of his own nature by the consciousness of sin, with the resulting fear of punishment. We may not always think of this fact, and may in words sometimes deny it; yet there are times when it will stare us in the face, and fill us with guilty apprehensions—for there is no consciousness among men, more universal and absorbing, than that of sin; and there is no want so profound and soul-searching as that created by this consciousness. But God understands our necessities in this respect, and in the Gospel of Christ. He has supplied a complete and all-sufficient remedy for sin, and made it available to all, as a full, sure, and eternal salvation, upon the condition of our acceptance of the terms of his own infinite mercy.—For "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth."

THE SINNER'S FRIEND.

The Scriptures tell us that "Christ died for the ungodly." Blessed fact!—it will fill eternity with praises. It is the foundation of all blessing and goodness. He willingly died in our stead, that He might reconcile us unto God, in redeeming us from all iniquity. Precious mysteries of redeeming love!—Who can fathom the unsearchable depths of the cross of Christ?

In all thy troubles, whatever they are, and however they have arisen, go, poor sin-sick soul, at once to Jesus, the great Physician, and be sure that if thou put thy trust in Him, He will not turn thee away. Thy sins cannot have exceeded the transgressions of the writer of this, who now humbly triumphs in redeeming grace—a living witness of the forgiving love of God, upheld by infinite mercy, as an encouragement to every poor sinner, to fly to the same Fountain—to the precious blood of Jesus Christ, the "Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world."

SPRINGVILLE, Seventh Month, 1891.

Ways of Pleasantness and Peace.—Remember that the grace or Holy Spirit of God is ready to save thee from transgression. It is always at hand, thou canst not sin without wilfully rejecting its aid.

And is there any real pleasure in sin? Thou knowest there is not. But there is pleasure, pure and exquisite pleasure in holiness. The Holy Ghost can make the paths of religion and virtue, hard as they seem and thorny, ways of pleasantness and peace; where, though there are thorns, yet there are also roses, and where all the wounds, which we suffer in the flesh from the hardness of the journey, are so healed by the balm of the Saviour's love that they rather give joy than pain.—Henry Kirk-White, about the twentieth year of his age.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

What are the Needs of the Society of Friends.

FIFTH PROPOSITION.

Being tempted they sinned and fell into transgression. "For God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof then shall your eyes be opened, and ye shall be as God's knowing good and evil." We find human nature still in the very same subjective attitude to its superior powers, as Adam was before he fell into transgression; so that, as God and all his laws are unchangeable, all that God created subject to change can only be truly changed as it is brought into actual co-operation with that power which is the real cause of righteousness, for sin and righteousness are both effects wrought in us by our free will and choice in subjecting ourselves to our chosen Master; we are of God created to be servants. "For his servants ye are to whom ye make yourselves servants to obey, &c."

The deeper a man falls into sin the less he aspires to return to former days of a better life, yet where sin abounds grace doth much more abound, so God's ways are equal. As Christ was free, separated from sinners, so it is his work now to separate sinners from sin, and he whom the Son makes free shall be free indeed.

The first temptation was the aspiration after knowledge through a wrong channel, "for when the woman saw that the tree was good for food and that it was pleasant to the eyes and a tree to be desired to make one wise." One brief statement contains a large catalogue of the aspects of self-gratifying pleasures with its own sustained knowledge, so we may see here that in the day of our first parent's state of innocence, sin took occasion in the fleshly desire springing forth by looking at that which was desirable to make one wise. If she had withstood, a knowledge of the power of grace would have been the increasing result. If darkness was not set over against light, there could be no use for our free will choice. God is free in creating, we are free in choosing only. "She took of the fruit thereof and did eat, and gave also unto her husband with her and he did eat." Death comes into the world because of sin, and death passes upon all men, because we all have sinned, and sin always is the transgression of previous knowledge. "The eyes of them both were opened and they knew that they were naked." From whence came this knowledge and what feelings did it bring? The knowledge stood in the inward consciousness that God is true and the serpent a liar from the beginning. A feeling of shame seized them "and they sewed fig leaves together and made themselves aprons." The same who tempts to commit sin, tempts also to conceal shame.

An effect is always small in its beginning, consider the germination of all seeds, and learn that cause and effect is God's unchangeable law. It is the little foxes that spoil the tender vine, because behind lies the powerful unseen cause, even him that beguiled Eve, and not only beguiles now, but goes about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour, whose wrath is great because he knoweth that his time is short, and as practice makes perfect, so the serpent's wisdom is now as ever it was wont to be, arising in the heart, taking the place of God and calling itself God, saying, "Ye shall not surely die, if ye do eat of the fruit of the forbidden tree." Therefore, desire not to partake of anything God has forbidden, but stand still and see the salvation of God.

SIXTH PROPOSITION.

Falling, they were first inwardly convicted and condemned; secondly, God himself examined, tried and proved them guilty. Then the promise was given before the judgment was pronounced, and then they were put forth out of the garden. "And they heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the Garden in the cool of the day, and Adam and his wife hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God amongst the trees of the garden," and the Lord God called unto Adam and said unto him, "Where art thou?" The fact of Adam's responsibility as the head of the woman is here prominently brought to view. Eve sinned first, yet he is called first to answer, and how could he answer? "I heard thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid, because I was naked and I hid myself." Fear then is the consequence of sin, because the voice of the Lord doubtless was a familiar one; and with fear follows inward conviction, in being self-condemned by the true light manifesting his evil deed.

The second act of temptation was self-exercise; and next, that bold accusation, "the woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree;" and last, his confession, "and I did eat." How rapid the development of the principal features of sin in their pure nature, even the same as to-day! A different excuse is given by the woman, "the serpent beguiled me and I did eat." The inward consciousness was thus reached by the hearing of the voice, but that which is reached must not only be in previous existence, but remain with them. The true light that enlighteneth every man, &c., (John i: 9) although it shineth in darkness and the darkness comprehended it not, &c., yet it shineth; and it is a measure of that fulness which Christ had without measure, (for by him were all things created) so it is, ever active; and as Christ is the only source and foundation of life—the active cause—so his own true light is the only channel through which life flows, and in which it is received, for they that love the light are those "that do truth," and bring their deeds to the light, that they may be made manifest that they are wrought in God; whilst Adam with all that do evil, hates the light—neither cometh to the light—lest his deeds should be reproved. So the light reproves—and it is in the heart of them that do evil; and evil-doers will not come to it. Here we meet two facts of the greatest importance for the true beginner in the school of Christ, to learn first to know ourselves. The active operation of the true Light is against all lawlessness, while the warning of Paul ever stands true and needful, "Beware, lest as the serpent beguiled Eve, so also ye should be beguiled from the simplicity of the truth as it is in Christ Jesus; for the flesh warreth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, and the two are contrary the one to the other, so that ye cannot do the things that ye would." But if we cannot do the things that we would, then we are afresh reminded of our subjective, dependent position during this life of probation. Therefore, the second and indispensable thing to aid to knowing ourselves is that of possessing — "In your patience possess ye your own souls." To possess our own soul includes and demands a mind controlled and kept in its subjective attitude at the Master's feet, and not only as an unplanted but engrafted vine, feel after the ceaseless spring of life. As long as the mind wanders, it feeds upon, at the best, seen realities which often are so sin-stained as to be to the consumer death.

To the pure mind all things are pure: it sees things as they are, and handles them accordingly; but to them that are defiled, all things are defiled, because that which is born after the flesh or fleshly wisdom, always condemns that which is born of the spirit, therefore Cain the first born slew Abel the second born, because the deeds of the second birth, Abel, were righteous; but Cain's, the deeds of the first birth, were evil. Although the serpent was a fallen angel, cast forth from the presence of God, yet he is openly met in the Garden, exposed and condemned—"And the Lord God said unto the serpent because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle and above every beast of the field, upon thy belly shalt thou go and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life."

With every increase in transgression there is an increase in condemnation. Reconsider well the two active causes to which thou art subject, to look not so much outside as within thyself. Which one's effect is manifest in the daily train of thought, that is moulding thy character?—God soon met our first parents in the cool of the day, and they both confessed "I did eat," yet righteousness then and now condemns sin in the flesh, and upon the flesh in measure lays his just judgment for transgressing his known law. Yet remember, and look here closely—mercy is joined hand in hand with judgment, as the promised seed intervenes. "I will put enmity between thee and the woman;"—(what warning this expression includes,) "and between thy seed and her seed. It shall bruise thy head, and thou [the serpent] shalt bruise his heel;"—indicating the painful suffering the believers who are truly in the seed's life, are subject to all their lifetime, even as Christ, the seed, did exemplify in his agony in the Garden of Gethsemane and upon the cross; and in their comparatively pure state (one sin separates from God—a continuation of sin darkens the understanding), they saw and understood the promise, as Eve, at the birth of her first born doubtless looked for the fulfilment of the promise, as she exclaimed, "I have gotten a man from the Lord," the effect of sin is a self-evident fact with all; if we say we have not sinned, we make God a liar and the truth is not in us; it is therefore the victorious overcoming that is to be our daily concern. This stands in a continual conflict between the flesh that lusteth against the spirit and the spirit against the flesh;—whosoever will save his life shall lose it, and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it: that is, crucify the desire after anything which we know God has prohibited; for in the day we eat or partake, we shall surely die.

AN easy and habitual yielding to the passion of anger, is fatal to that coolness of judgment and calmness of temper which are indispensable qualities of strong characters, and truly successful lives. Select out of any community, the hot-headed men who are frequently heard raving at events and berating their fellow-men and you select the essentially weak men, who neither win great respect nor carry great weight in the community; strong men are men who know how to keep cool, or to restrain themselves when excited. Their coolness or their calmness, is a part of their strength. The man whose temper controls him, incapacitates himself by blind passion, for the exercise of that shrewdness and judgment with which a man who keeps a calm and steady mind and manner, will surmount difficulties, conquer opposition and defeat injustice.

FROM THE "HERALD OF TRUTH."

To Which Flock Do You Belong?

"Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good will to give you the kingdom." LUKE xii: 32.

This is a comforting promise to those who belong to the flock that is led by the Saviour, that great Shepherd, whose pleasure it is to give to his children, not only food and raiment, but also the kingdom; but it gives no comfort to the sinner while he is yet unwilling to be numbered with Christ's flock. The text says: Little flock; and it is a lamentable fact that Christ's flock is much smaller than Satan's flock. Satan seems that Satan is ever busy, with his deceitful ways, trying to draw Christ's followers into his fold. But his trying to win them does not make them his unless they yield to his allurements. On the other hand, the Saviour is always trying, in his loving way, to draw sinners to Him. Yet they are not his unless they come to Him and desire to live for Him.

Christ was mocked and derided, suffered many trials and persecutions, and at last had to give his life for his flock; but can we find that Satan ever endured any trials or sacrificed any pleasures for his flock?

Satan promises pleasure in this life, but the reward is endless torment. Christ's followers have to endure trials and temptation, but they have a loving Friend to help bear them, and the reward is peace to our souls now, and everlasting joy and happiness in the world to come, if they are faithful.

This life is only too short, but the life to come is without end. Oh! how sad to think that any should live so in this life that their portion will be allotted to them in hell where they will be in everlasting torment without even a hope of release; and it is sad, too, that so many are not willing to suffer for Christ's sake here and enjoy eternal happiness over yonder.

Dear, un saved soul, how can you longer spurn your Saviour's pleadings, and choose only pleasure here? If you do not accept Him while you live, surely you will be banished from the pleasures of heaven, which are unspeakable and full of glory. Come, and be numbered with Christ's flock, and do not put it off for a more convenient season—for such a time may never come. You may have to suffer scorn and persecution; but if you look to Jesus for aid, He will make them easy to bear, and you will be rescued from everlasting punishment.

The Christian's life is not one of continual sorrow and contention, as some think. True, he must often suffer derision and persecution for Christ's sake; but it is easy to bear if the heart is truly willing. We must watch, and fight, and pray, but that is not a hard task, unless we make it so. Some Christians make their religious life a life of sadness and discontent. Cheerfulness is one of the characteristics of pure religion. The child of God cannot be sad and go about with a long face, when he knows his saved condition and realizes that Jesus died to release him from the bondage of sin and death. Christ says: "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, and you shall find rest to your souls." He also says: "My yoke is easy and my burden is light." But there are Christian professors who make the yoke hard to bear and the burden heavy, and therefore find no rest to their souls. They are always lamenting that they are too incompetent to do anything for their Master, that it is so hard to keep all the commands, and that they are not as good as they ought to be. The trouble is, they have not come to Christ in meekness to learn of Him; but rest on their own wisdom. They try to do the work themselves, instead of placing themselves in God's hands as instruments to be used as He sees best. When we once do just as God directs, we know we are doing that for which we are intended, and the yoke becomes easy and we find rest to our souls.

Thus we see the life of a true, confiding Christian is easier to live than the life of the sinner who has to bear the load of a guilty conscience.

Dear sinner, I entreat you once more to come to Christ. He is interceding for you—you who have mocked and rejected Him. He still loves you and longs for your return. I pray that you may yet be won from the fold of Satan to the fold of Christ, before it is forever too late. In using the expression "Christ's flock," do not understand that I mean a certain church denomination, and that all outside of that church belong to Satan's flock. By saying Christ's flock, I mean all the true followers of Christ, no matter of what name or order they may be.

Trusting my feeble efforts into God's hands, I will close my writing.

Tenderly the Shepherd,
O'er the mountains cold,
Goes to bring his lost ones
Back to the fold.

An Appeal for Aid.

The following letter tells its own story. It was addressed to our friend John Stokes, of this city, whose office is at No. 116 N. Fourth St., whose whose feelings respond to the appeal can communicate either with J. S. Stokes or directly with the writer.

188 Vine St., Chattanooga, Tenn., Seventh Mo. 27, 1891.
Dear Friend:—Considering the financial outlook of the country, and of the South in particular, and the dull state of trade at this point, the number of persons already out of employment, and the much larger number likely to be during the coming winter, it requires no prophetic eye to see in the future much suffering among the poor of this city, many of whom have not so much as one dollar laid up for the winter, and when thrown out of employment their wives and children must be brought to the point of starvation. And my heart goes out in a desire to be able to relieve as much as I can of this suffering, and feel drawn to write Friends of Philadelphia these facts, and ask such assistance as they are willing to give—old cast-off clothing of every description, particularly that for women and children, or any other help you may feel disposed to send. I have frequently in the past two winters found women and children who could not go to school nor meeting for want of shoes—children who are rowing up in ignorance within a few squares of public school (free) but who could not go for want of clothing and books.

As I do not know who would be the proper ones to whom I should apply, I ask of thee the favor to lay this matter before them or give me an address so that I may do so. I do not know any one to whom I can refer for my own reputation unless it be my own parents, Joseph and Atharine A. Stanton, of Springboro, Ohio, or (l)th Ann Stanton, of Monroville, Morgan Co., Ind., who is also a relative by marriage; Joseph Otts, who I believe is now in North Carolina; also Rufus P. King.

If thou wilt give this matter such attention as thou thinks it merits, thou wilt very much oblige thy friend,

J. F. STANTON.

FORGOTTEN WORKERS.

SELECTED.

They lived, and they were useful; this we know,
And naught besides;
No record of their names is left, to show
How soon they died;
They did their work, and then they passed away,
An unknown band;
But they shall live in endless day, in the Fair, shining land.

And were they young, or were they growing old,
Or ill, or well,
Or lived in poverty, or had they wealth or gold—
No one can tell;
Only one thing is known of them—they faithful
Were and true
Disciples of the Lord, and strong, through prayer,
To serve and do.

But what avails the gift of empty fame?
They lived to God;
They loved the sweetness of another name,
And gladly trod
The rugged ways of earth, that they might be Helper and friend,
And in the joy of their ministry
Be spent, and spend.

No glory clusters around their names on earth,
But in God's heaven
Is kept a book of names of greatest worth,
And there is given
A place for all who did the Master please,
Though here unknown;
And their lost names shine forth in brightest rays
Before the throne.

O, take who will the boon of fading fame;
But give to me
A place among the workers, though my name Forgotten be;
And as within the book of life is found
My lonely place,
Honor and glory unto God resound
For all his grace.

JOHN G. WHITTIER.

Great master of the poet's art!

Surely the sources of thy powers
Lie in that true and tender heart
Whose very utterance touches ours.

For, better than thy words that glow
With sunset dyes, or moonlit heat,
That count the treasures of the snow,
Or paint the blossoms at our feet,

Are these that teach the sorrowing how
To lay aside their fear, and doubt,
And in submissive love to low
To love that passeth finding out.

And thou for such hast come to be
In every home an honored guest.—
Even from the cities by the sea,
To the broad prairies of the West.

Thy lays have cheered the humble home
Where men who prayed for freedom knelt.
And women, in their anguish dumb,
Have heard thee utter what they felt.

And thou hast battled for the right
With many a brave and trenchant word,
And shown us how the pen may fight
A mightier battle than the sword.

And therefore men, in coming years,
Shall chant thy praises loud and long;
And women name thee through their tears
A poet, greater than his song!

But not thy strains, with courage rife,
Nor holiest hymns, shall rank above
The rhythmic beauty of thy life.
Itself a canticle of love!

—Phebe Cary.

INVOCATION.

Come down to us, help and heal us,
Thou that once life's pathway trod,
Knowing all its gloom and glory,
Son of man, and Son of God.

Come down to us, help and heal us,
When our hopes before us flee;
Thou hast been a man of sorrows,
Tried and tempted, even as we,

By the weakness of our nature,

By the hardness of our hearts—
Steady up our fainting courage,
Save, O save us from despair!

By the still and strong temptation
Of consenting hearts within,
By the power of outward evil—
Save, O save us from our sin!

From the dim and dreary doubts
That with faith a warfare make,
Save us through thy sweet compassion—
Save us for thine own name's sake.

And when all of life is finished,
To the last low, fainting breath,
Meet us in the awful shadows,
And deliver us from death.

Extract of a Letter from George Fox, dated Kingston-upon-Thames, the 15th of Twelfth Month, 1686-7, expressing his intentions of giving Petty for the use of Friends, viz:

"I do offer and give up freely to the Lord forever and for the service of his sons and daughters and servants called Quakers, the house and houses, barn, kiln, stable, and all the land, with the garden and orchard, being about three acres of land, more or less, commonage, peats, turfmoss, with whatsoever privileges that belong to it, called Pettys, at Swarthmore, in the Parish of Ulverston.—And also my ebony bedstead, with the painted curtains, and the great-elbow chair that Robert Widlers sent me, and my great sea case with the bottles in it. These I do give to stand in the house as heir-looms, when the house shall be made use of for a meeting-place, so that a Friend may have a bed to lay on, a chair to sit in, and a bottle to hold a little water or drink: it being free land, and free from all Tythes both great and small. And all this I do freely give up to the Lord, and for the Lord's service, and his people, to make a meeting-place of the said house of Pettys, and the land with the rest of the houses and all that belongs to it, for the Lord's service and his people. And the land, &c., may keep the meeting-house in order and repair; and further I do and have given up Pettys, which I bought of the children of Susan Fell and Rachel Fell, for seventy-two pounds, for God's people to meet in when they do not meet at Swarthmore Hall; and let the rent of the ground and malt-house maintain the meeting-house which may be made fit—either the barn or the house—as the Lord shall let Friends see which is best: and to slate it, and to pave the way to it and about it, that Friends may go dry to their meeting; and so let or sell part of the house and the land to maintain itself forever for the Lord's service. And you may let any poor, honest Friend live in a part of the house; and so let it be for the Lord's service to the end of the world, and for his people to meet in, to keep them from the winter's cold and the wet, and the summer's heat. And let Friends make as firm and safe writing concerning it as they can; and let John Rouse, Thomas Lower, William Meade, and Daniel Abraham be Trustees, to settle this with some of the Monthly Meeting of Swarthmore, and some of the Quarterly Meeting of Lancaster: that so Friends may be sure forever of a house to meet in which is free and will maintain itself, and which is the Lord's forever."

This letter was directed to Thomas Lower, at Marshgrange.

WHEREVER souls are being tried and ripened, in whatever commonplace and homely ways, there God is heaving out the pillars for his temple.—Phillips Brooks.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Habits of Wasps.—The Biological and Microscopical Section having precedence at the last meeting of the Academy, Harold Wingate made an interesting communication on the relation of wasps to spiders. It is a well known fact that certain species of mud daubers or wasps, which build their nest of clay against walls and boards, deposit their eggs in the bodies of spiders, confining their hosts in the mud inclosures to serve as food for the young grubs when they are hatched. It had been found that these spiders were not killed, but simply paralyzed by one or more stabs of the exquisitely sharpened sting of the wasp into one of the nerve ganglia. That a fluid is injected into the body of the spider at the same time is probable, but it is not necessary to suppose that this fluid has a preservative influence on the tissues, as had been suggested because the spider is not dead, and therefore is in no need of preservation. The instinct which inflicts just the injury necessary to produce paralysis, but not death, is a most extraordinary one, and no less so is the instinct of the young grubs, which, while feeding on the living meat selected for them by the parent, carefully avoid all the vital portions until the last, as the ptomaines of decaying dead tissue would be almost instantly fatal to them. In this process of a gradual approach to the life-center of the host the young grubs show a knowledge of anatomy far in advance of the student.

Even the powerful tarantula is not exempt from the attacks of the enterprising wasp. As related by Dr. McCook; the spider, when attacked, trembles violently, standing up and making a show of resistance, which, however, is feeble and of no avail. Its foe soon discovers a favorable moment and darts upon the tarantula, which it wounds with its sting, and again commences flying in circles. The injured spider is thrown into a tremor, and often becomes at once paralyzed, though a second and even a third wound is sometimes necessary. Sooner or later it becomes powerless, when the wasp approaches, carefully feeling its way to see if its work has been effectually done. It then begins to drag the tarantula into a hole, which it has previously dug in the ground, wherein it is covered up after the deposition of an egg.

Silver Mining in Mexico.—In Guanajuato is found the richest vein of silver bearing ore in the country, known as the Veta Madre, and though the most primitive modes of mining and milling have always been and still are pursued here, over eight hundred million dollars in the argentiferous metal have been realized from this immediate vicinity since official record has been kept of the amount; and with all this Mexico is still poor!

The ore has now to be raised from a depth of fifteen hundred feet and more. There are between fifty and sixty crushing mills in operation at this writing, reducing the silver-bearing quartz. Two of the mills are operated by Europeans, who use steam power to some extent, but the scarcity of fuel is a serious objection to the employment of steam. We saw scores of mules treading the liquid, muddy mass for amalgamating purposes driven about in a circle by men who waded knee deep while following the weary animals. As these huge vats contain quicksilver, vitriol and other poisonous ingredients, the lives of men and animals thus occupied are of brief duration. The mule lives about four years, and the men rarely twice as long if they continue in the business. This result is well known to be inevitable, and yet there are plenty of men who eagerly seek the employment.

Without going into detail we may describe the process of obtaining the silver from the rocky mass in a few words. The ore is first crushed, and by adding water is made into a thin paste. Many tons of this are placed in a huge vat, at least a hundred feet square, and into it are thrown, in certain quantities, sulphate of copper, common salt and quicksilver. Driving the animals through this mass, ten hours a day for three or four days, causes the various ingredients to become thoroughly mingled. The quicksilver finally gets hold of and concentrates the coveted metal. The quicksilver is afterwards extracted and reserved for continued use, performing the same function over and over again. There is, of course, a large percentage of quicksilver lost in the operation, and its employment in such quantities forms one of the heavy expenses of milling.—Astec Land.

The Opal.—One of the staple commodities produced at Queretaro is that classic, beautiful and precious gem, the opal. It is found imbedded in a certain kind of rock in the neighboring mountains, sometime in cubes, but oftener in very irregular forms. It will be remembered that Nonius, who possessed a large and brilliant specimen of the opal, preferred exile to surrendering it to Marc Antony. Whether he was opal-mad or not, it is clear that persons who visit this place are very apt to become monomaniacs upon the subject of this beautiful gem. We expended considerable sums for these precious stones, cut and uncut, during the brief period of our visit. The choicest of these specimens is the true fire-opal, which in brilliancy and iridescence excels all others. Nearly every person one meets in Queretaro seems to have more or less of these lovely stones to sell; nine-tenths of them are of a very cheap quality, really fine ones, being the exception, are valued accordingly. The pretty flower girl, who first offers you her most fragrant wares, presently becomes confidential, and, drawing nearer, brings out from some mysterious fold of her dress half a dozen sparkling stones which she is anxious to dispose of. Even the water carrier, with his huge red earthen jar strapped to his head and back, if he see a favorable opportunity, will importune the stranger regarding these fiery little stones.—Astec Land.

The New Lake in Colorado Desert.—This desert has been an arid waste, the lowest part of which is said to be 265 feet below sea level. It has evidently been the basin of a great lake in former times, fed by the Colorado River, which is now again pouring its waters into this sunken area. An article in The Independent says: "A newspaper party started some days since from Yuma, the border city of California, Arizona and Mexico, and explored the whole extent of the overflow. They claim that beyond a doubt the new lake is the overflow of the Colorado River. Some few miles below Yuma they found the water pouring through many channels, in one case twelve feet deep, into the desert stretching away to the northwest and covering the whole country as far as could be seen. As they travelled westward, they at last reached New River through a succession of lakes in which the main current kept its course. Then they came to the sanilikh section, and here the current turned abruptly at right angles until, through a vast crevasse, water rushed down through a thirty-foot channel, forming small falls, and made itself a passage way through the sandhills forming banks from thirty to four hundred feet high. As they passed on the high banks caved off continually, and for miles they ran over rough water, where the boat danced like a cork. At last, having travelled four days, they reached what at first they were sure was Salton Lake, but again they found themselves mistaken, and were hurried on between banks which grew higher and higher. They barely escaped some falls, and the next morning left the channel and entered Salton Lake, reaching Salton self about noon. They felt certain that the general course they had followed was the old channel of the Colorado River when it lost itself in the desert previous to its having found its later course to the Gulf of California. Should the result prove that the course is permanently changed—and the apparent forming of a bar in the river at the point of overflow makes this probable—this great basin, scarcely more than sixty miles northwest of San Diego, will again be an inland sea, and the effect on vegetation and upon the climate will be most marked. Already the river is bringing down quantities of seed, and places that were perfectly arid and desert, are showing signs of vegetation. Widely different stories, some of them very wild, have been circulated with regard to this sudden freak of Nature, one correspondent claiming that the water has really found its way from the ocean as the result of volcanic action which has loosened the bands that volcanic action had formed long years ago when this section was still an inland sea. The line of the Southern Pacific Railroad passes right through this section now overflowed, and should the change be permanent, an entire rebuilding of a long portion of it will be required."

A Warning to the Intemperate.—A scene of tragic pathos took place in Long Island City on June 30th, at the family residence of a wealthy citizen. A large number of friends had gathered to see the daughter of the host married. The bride was ready, and the minister was in waiting, but the groom came not. After a long delay, during which the friends became anxious, the family had about made up their minds to inform the guests of the non-arrival of the missing bridegroom, when he entered the door. The person he met first was the father of the bride, who saw that he was in no condition to act as principal in a wedding. Without a moment's hesitation he ordered the young man out of the house, and told him never to darken the doorway again. The young man started in a dazed way, and the minister, who had followed toward the front door and commanded "to leave. He obeyed instantly.

Love may be as strong as death, but wine is stronger than love. We pity the bride that she loved an unworthy object, and felicitate her that his mask slipped off before she became irrevocably his.—Christian Advocate.

African Slave Trade.—Cardinal Lavigier has established a new order of monks, the "Warrior Monks of the Sahara," who differ from all the orders of the Roman Church in that they are trained to fight with carnal weapons, and are as ready to march as to fast or pray. They are to penetrate into the northern portion of Africa, where the slave traders are busy in their heroic work, and across the great Desert. They are to seize cases in the Desert and fortify them. In these stations they are to train themselves for journeys through the desert, and to receive from the hands of their drivers they are to fight, if need be, at all events to attempt the rescue of the slaves from their brutal owners. The headquarters of the order have been fixed at Biskra, on the Algerian borders of the Great Sahara Desert, which has been thus described: "Biskra, with M'salla (the prayer-place, in Arabic) is the first station. It is a plantation of palms, 150,000 of them, and of olives, 600,000 of them. It has one large street and a number of smaller streets opening off it. The next station is Wargla, three hundred miles to the south. Here is the first armed station. The next station is Mes Jonoh, on the Morocco frontier. Here all the slave caravans must come, and here is where the hard fighting will be. This oasis has an evil name, because it is here that terrible brutalities are practised. It is five kilometres long and half kilometre broad. The population is cosmopolitan, and includes French, Tunisians, Arabs, Moors, and Israelites." From this point the order is to stretch out its work of rescue and relief southward. Other oases are to be held, palm trees planted, refugees opened for fugitive slaves, and civilization and Christianity to be carried down into the heart of Africa.

The "Warrior of the Desert," thus go forth on a crusade of "snatch men and lions" from the hands of the infidel, and save them from the unutterable horrors of a slave march.

Boys' Clubs.—It was in the fall of 1878 that the small boys about Tompkins Square, having exhausted the ordinary methods of street enjoyment, began to amuse themselves by throwing stones through the windows of the Wilson Mission, at No. 125 St. Mark's Place, and by jeering at the various people connected with it as they passed in and out of the building. These customs proving in time both expensive and annoying to the ladies of the mission, connected with the mission, and complained to the police department only resulting in a temporary cessation of hostilities whenever they ox-eyed policeman on the beat appeared, and as long as he remained in sight, one of the ladies determined to try the soothing effects of coals of fire, poured metaphorically upon the heads of the offending boys. So one evening she answered an especially irritating volley of stones by appearing on the door-step with a bucket of coals, and in the end, in the cat-calls which her appearance had excited, asked the boys if they would not come in and have some coffee and cakes. Visions of "cops," with big clubs, behind the door, naturally occurred to the minds of the prospective guests; but when a few of the more venturesome had sidled in, and no attacks, apparently, had been made on them, the others took courage and followed them, to find themselves welcomed to the simple refreshments which the lady had plenteously provided as the most practical form in which to administer her coals of fire.

Every one had as much as he wanted, no reference was made to the cause of the broken glass, and each boy was treated with a kindness and courtesy quite unexpected, in view of the fact that within a few moments he had been engaged in smashing his mistress's windows. When the supper had all been absorbed, the boys were sent forth with a pleasant "good-night" to ruminant on their evening's experiences, and to decide which part of the evening had been the more enjoyable,—defacing the exterior of the mission building, or being treated with kindness and courtesy within its walls. And their decision soon became apparent; for not only did the annoyance cease, but the boys were soon back again not for coffee and cakes, but to see if they could not come in and play games,—though there was little in the rooms but an atmosphere of kindness and good breeding.

Then more boys came and were welcomed, interested friends sent down chairs and tables and games, a board of managers was instituted, and so the first boys' club was started, on the broad piazza in front of the Wilson Mission, and to welcome for any boy, whatever his condition of relief, who prefers an evening of innocent enjoyment in a place where he must show respect and courtesy to all about him, to the thoughtlessness and hidden dangers of an evening in the street.

The Boys' Club is now in the thirtieth year of its work, and an average attendance of over two hundred and fifty boys a night was the result of the season's first three months.

The article in Scribner's Magazine, from which the above is taken, says that a number of other clubs have been established, all of which have libraries.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 15, 1891.

The Christian must partake of those trials and sufferings which are incident to our existence in a body of flesh, in which we are liable to accidents and disease, and whose ever-recurring need for food, clothing and shelter makes frequent demands for care and labor.

Although his faith may often be severely tried, yet he can rely upon the promise of our Saviour, that if he seeks first the kingdom of heaven and the righteousness thereof, all things necessary shall be added. Amid the complex relationships of civilized life, it becomes increasingly the case that loss or distress in one part of the world affects in measure the whole body politic—so that the mechanic, tradesman or farmer in the interior of America feels in some degree the influence of the prosperity or adversity of communities thousands of miles away.

We believe it is in accordance with the Divine purpose, that mankind should be linked together by the silken chains of commerce, and thus be taught to look upon the whole human race as brethren. In proportion as our natural selfishness is kept in check, and we seek to promote the good of all, this intercourse will become increasingly beneficial, both in its material and moral effects.

Since our prosperity depends not solely on our own exertions, but also upon a thousand other things, which are beyond our control, it is a great stay to the mind to believe that there is an all-powerful Father in heaven, who knows all things, and to whom we can appeal in every time of trial. How cheering is the language of the Psalmist: "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble: therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea; though the waters thereof roar and be troubled; though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof."

We cannot reasonably expect success in our business, unless we are willing to bestow upon it the necessary thought and care, as well as the active exertion it requires,—but besides all this, we need the blessing of Him who is the Sovereign Ruler of all things; and when we have learned to look up to Him in our outward affairs, as well as in our spiritual warfare, we shall have a stay and support to our minds,—which many have experienced to be an inexpressible comfort, which has kept them from sinking below hope. For they are assured that their Heavenly Father knoweth that they have need of earthly comforts and supplies, and their faith is renewed that He will withhold nothing that it is essential for them to have.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A despatch from Little Rock, Arkansas, says that orders have just been received here from the Union Pacific Railroad, directing the strikers from the Choctaw Nation. During the suspension of removal, numbers of non-removals have married into the tribe. As many as thirty marriages have been celebrated in one day in some localities. White men thus intermarrying become adopted citizens and cannot be removed.

A despatch from Yuma, California, says that a report was brought there by the Cochop Indians that the earthquake on the 30th ultimo resulted in changing the course of the Colorado River. It left its old bed near the mouth of the Colorado, and ran for 1,000 feet long. The report is not generally believed, but one result of the recent earthquake was the renewed activity of the volcanoes in the Cochop region. The earthquakes also caused a great tidal wave at the head of the Gulf of California.

It is reported that the business branch of the Kansas Alliance has completed arrangements by which it will handle three-quarters of the Kansas wheat crop of 50,000,000 bushels. Half of the crop will be stored in the big elevators in Kansas City, Chicago, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Baltimore, and other large cities, for an indefinite period, or until the owners desire to sell. "Arrangements have been made in the East to secure an advance on the wheat stored in 75 per cent of the present value of wheat. This new move by the Alliance practically corners the Kansas crop."

A despatch from West Superior, Wisconsin, says that the Great Northern Railway officials estimate that the volume of grain to be handled will be 20,000,000 bushels over last year, or a total of 70,000,000. The road expects to handle 12,000,000 bushels more than they got last year, and the Northern Pacific Company expects to get a larger percentage of increase.

Councilman Howes, of Kansas City, Missouri, has introduced an ordinance which requires the purchaser from the city of a license by all drinkers of intoxicating liquors, the license to vary in cost from $20 to $50, according to the expensiveness of the liquor which the purchaser drinks. The ordinance further provides that each application for a drinker's license shall be countersigned by the applicant's wife. The despatch from Pierre, South Dakota, reports "the hottest weather ever experienced there," the temperature on the 8th inst. being 110 degrees in the shade. Late wheat has suffered terribly, and some fields will not be cut, while the corn is dying for want of rain.

The wheat crop of North Dakota is reported to be in a critical condition, owing to the extreme hot weather of the past few days.

The cattle disease which broke out in and around Emmetsburg, Iowa, about four weeks ago, still continues unabated, and veterinarians there are at a loss to find a cure. It is reported that the malady, so far nearly 100 head have died, and they are still dying at the rate of four or five a day.

The Census Office has issued a bulletin giving the population of the State of Iowa by counties, townships, cities, &c. The State has a population of 1,911,896, an increase of 257,281, or 17.68 per cent.

Another find of silver is reported from Pomeroy Mountain, near Caribou, Colorado. The vein is said to be three inches thick and of pure silver.

A Bellefontaine, Ohio, despatch reports the discovery of a wonderful cave by a former named Ungert. The cave has been explored 600 feet, and several beautiful chrysoberyls and a rocky staircase are said to have been found.

A woman named Griffin was arraigned before Judge Burke, in Boston, last week, charged with drunkenness. A policeman testified that she had been arrested 90 times for the same offence, in the majority of cases being let off with a fine of $5. During the past year she had been arrested nine times, he said. The woman asked the Court to release her, and promised to go to Europe, as she had plenty of money to pay her passage. Her request was not granted, and she was sentenced to the House of Correction for eight months. On appeal, she was held for the Superior Court.

Terrible damage was done on the morning of the 6th inst., to the Chicago and St. Louis limited express, on the West Shore Railroad, near Port Byron, New York. A freight train was disabled by the breaking of a coupler before it could leave the main track for a siding to get out of the way of the express, and the freight train derailed. The engine and the first six cars were telescoped, and piled, with the baggage and express cars, in a heap on the tracks. As a result, 15 persons, mostly Italians, are dead, while 21 are suffering from severe injuries. The wrecked cars caught fire and were consumed. A thick fog prevailed at the time of the collision in the Corning, N. Y., locality. In conducting the flagmen, the freight train were guilty of criminal negligence in not having flagged the express train.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 479, which is 52 more than during the previous week, and 49 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing, 165 were males and 314 females; 105 of age under 10; 50 of consumption; 40 of marasmus; 40 of diseases of the heart; 21 of inanition; 17 of old age; 16 of pneumonia; 14 of diphtheria; 11 of apoplexy; 11 of cancer; 11 of convulsions, and 11 of dysentery.

FOREIGN.—The British Parliament was prorogued on the 5th instant, until Tenth Month 24th. In her closing speech, the Queen said: "I have made proposals to the President of the United States, looking to the submission of the question of the boundary between Great Britain and the United States, in regard to seal fishery in Behring Sea. The negotiations are far advanced, but have not yet been concluded."

An Associated Press despatch from London, on the 8th instant, says: A conference of the leaders of the "Odele" society, held at Barcelona, Tuesday, 20th of September in England of the Count of Paris. The conference added emphasis to what has been known for some time past to observers of the political movement in France, and of the intrigues in other countries, looking to the establishment of the monarchy, with the "Odele" party in the lead, that there is increasing discontent among the Count's adherents. This feeling is due to the refusal of the Count of Paris to adopt a policy characterized by greater activity than the one now followed by him.

A well-known and heavy operator in Government securities was arrested at Barcelona, Spain, on the 7th instant, on a charge of being a party to the recent conspiracy. The police, upon searching the prisoner, found in his possession a number of letters which prove beyond doubt that he was concerned in the attack upon the barracks, and that the affair was not a mere ordinary movement, but simply a novel and desperate scheme to originate startling rumors and thus allow the operators concerned to bear the market.

Advices have been received in London, which give another illustration of the bitter hostility against the Jews in Russia. This last instance of the virulent "Odele" spirit, is the case of a Jew, who has been banished to a fortified town of 58,000 inhabitants, situated on the Ingoul River, 130 miles north of Kherson. Among the inhabitants of the town are quite a number of Jews, who are engaged in the usual vocations of the people of that nationality in Russian cities.

On the 20th of August, some thousands of Jewish yekels descended upon their covering victims. They attacked the Jewish shops and dwellings, driving the owners from them or holding them powerless to defend themselves or their property, and plundered them of everything valuable. What was considered not worth the trouble of carrying home, was thrown into the streets. The owners of the shops and dwellings, driven from their homes, were set upon and severely wounded.

The "North German" has recently decided to invest the only friendly co-operation of France and Russia with any direct intention to disturb the peace. "It was natural," says the Gazette, "for the two nations to give open expression to their latent wishes at the time of the constant receptions. The signs indicate that the Eastern question may soon become the subject of important international discussions, without necessarily menacing the peace."

Auckland advices of 14th to 16th ultimo, received in the Franchise, are to the effect that a great drought, and something like a tidal wave, prevailed at Melbourne on the 13th. Waters in the harbor rose above the level of the surrounding towns, and several small vessels were wrecked. The floods were the most severe since 1862, and the course of the Yarra River very terrific. A number of boats were overturned. Ten persons were drowned, and two thousand rendered homeless. The loss is estimated at $2,500,000.

The extreme drought along the Rio Grande is reported to be causing great suffering among the Mexican population. Scarcely any crops have been raised for the past 18 months, and stock has died by thousands.

The President of the Dominion Millers' Association, in session at Toronto, estimates the wheat crop of the Dominion at 55,160,000 bushels—a reckoning which allows 22,180,000 bushels for export. The Ottawa Dispatch says that the Manitoba and Northwestern Railway will connect the Manitoba system of the Northern Pacific, and will in turn be swallowed up by the Canadian Pacific. This will give the latter corporation every mile of railroad in Manitoba. A direct fusion of the Northern and Canadian Pacific Companies is forbidden by the charter of the former.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Selections from the Journal of William Evans.

1817. The view of a fellow mortal gradually vanishing away, until the earthly tabernacle is no longer able to retain that part which is designed for an eternal duration, is humbling. It shows the weakness of the tenure of all sublunary enjoyments, and calls loudly to those yet left behind to use all diligence in the great business of salvation. But how easily do we suffer ourselves to elude the force of impressions made by such examples. Self-denial of the fleeting gratifications of this world is a work very unwelcome to the natural man; but it must nevertheless be submitted to, if we expect to become conquerors through Him that lived and died for us. "They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh, with the affections and lusts."

1818. At different times in the course of my life I have apprehended that at some period, I should be engaged in publicly laboring in the great cause of Truth, to turn the attention of others, through its constraining power, from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God. Clear and distinct openings have been made upon my mind in a very impressive manner, in relation to the standing and qualification of a Gospel minister. It has appeared to me necessary that through the humbling power of Christ and the baptisms of the cross, his will should be reduced, and a state of childlike reliance on the Leader of Israel, in a good degree attained, that he may be prepared to stand as an instrument through whom the Lord condescends to speak to his people. For several months past the time appeared to be drawing nigh for me to make more public the concern that had been shut up in my own breast. I had many impressive openings which seemed nearly ripe for communicating, but remembering the usefulness and importance of the work, I kept back. Sometimes I rejoiced after meetings in believing they were Divine impressions, and sometimes I felt concerned that by putting off so long I might get into the habit of slighting him, while I was looking for satisfactory evidence of the origin of the concern. But He who knows how to deal with his children did not forsake me, but furnished with a fresh opening this morning [1818, Ninth Month 9th.] in our Fourth-day meeting. As heretofore, I was preparing to set it aside for further confirmation, when a beloved Friend was engaged to call upon some to be faithful—that no sign should be given, but that of the prophet Jonah, who, for his disobedience, was permitted to descend into deep suffering and anguish. This seemed so clearly applicable, that recollecting I had passed through many night seasons, and feeling after she sat down the fresh arisings of the concern, I stood up, and with an audible voice, said, "God is our refuge, in Him will we put our trust. They that trust in the Lord shall never be confounded, but they shall be as Mount Zion, that cannot be removed. Christ Jesus remains to be the eternal rock and foundation; blessed are all they that are built upon Him."

[His gift as a minister was acknowledged in 1822. How noteworthy and instructive is the manifest care William Evans exercised to proceed with deliberation and caution in the very important Christian labor of Gospel ministry! He knew that unless the Minister of ministers bestowed the unction and gave the command, it would be wholly in vain for the poor fallible instrument hopefully to enter upon so serious an engagement, with the avowed purpose of gathering souls to Christ.

How true, that the more any are deeply baptized into an humbling sense of their own insufficiency for the work, and that they are wholly dependent upon the Divine anointing or qualifying power from on high, the more not only will they enter upon their labor of love with filial fear and distrust of self, but the more also will they seek to have their urim and thummim with the Holy One; so that with the ability alone which God giveth they may labor successfully in the church of Christ, and be made instrumental in exalting his name and kingdom in the hearts of the people to his own praise. When entering upon the prophetic office, the prophet Jeremiah testified, "Behold, I cannot speak, for I am a child." And it is such lowly, self-distrustful ones in the present day, as they are faithful to the visitations of his grace and mercy, that the Lord will pour out of his spirit upon, and will put forth and go before, to the building up of the waste places of Zion, and to the honor and renown of his ever-excellent and adorable name.]

I have felt concerned for the lapsed, mixed state of the church. I have seen a spirit at work among us, which aims at drawing the minds of many from a simple dependence upon the internal guidance of the Head of the Church, and is opposed to the administration of sound discipline. As certainly as we forsake the secret sense which the Truth begets in relation to our individual duty, and depend upon the wisdom and the reasoning of man, our ministry will become destitute of the quickening power and virtue of the Holy Spirit, and the Society dwindle into lifeless formality.

1819. There is a material difference between what we call good thoughts and being brought to sit under the teachings of Christ in our own hearts, when assembled for Divine worship.

His words are spirit and they are life to the soul; and the wanderings of the mind in contemplating religious truths, without the influence of his Spirit, must end in barrenness and poverty. Hence it is our chief business to labor to get to a state of humble waiting before Him, that we may be instructed by the gracious words that still proceed from Him in his spiritual appearance in the heart. To be brought into a state of child-like docility and obedience to the leadings of our Heavenly Shepherd, seems to be the principal end of all the dispensations of his wisdom. The haughtiness of man must be laid low, and the Lord alone exalted in that heart which is prepared to be acceptably engaged in his service. In a state of deep humility and patient waiting upon Him, we become prepared to discern the motions of his Spirit, and in simplicity to yield compliance therewith. There is as much need to learn to be still, and to know the active, forward disposition of the human mind reduced to subjection, as there is to experience a willingness wrought to perform the Lord's will when it is manifested. He is a wise Master Builder, and if we abide under his preparing hand, He will fashion us into vessels and instruments for his use.

The instances that have occurred of persons who began well, but afterwards made shipwreck of faith and of a good conscience, are subjects of mournful reflection, both for theirs and the great cause's sake. Under feelings of love to our Heavenly Father, we may at times be ready to conclude, that we are resolved to follow Him and shall no more forsake Him. The power of temptation is often strong and potentially pressing, and although, so far, we have been kept from being cast away, yet unless the watch is maintained, and we are frequently brought to feel our need of daily help, and that of ourselves we cannot stand, and thereby are led to cry unto the Lord for preservation, we may be overtaken in an unwary hour and carried by temptation into a land of pits and snares whence we cannot easily escape, and may bring upon ourselves deep suffering, and reproach upon the holy cause we had espoused. The growth from infancy to manhood is by slow and almost imperceptible gradations; as we advance in religious experience by little and little, so by a gradual neglect of watchfulness and prayer, we may decline and finally lose our standing in the Truth. How important, then, frequently to remember the rock whence we were hewn, and the hole of the pit whence we were digged. It was not our own arm that effected this, but his who saw us in a state of corruption, and in mercy said unto us, live! Oh, let us lie low before Him, and above all things desire, that in heights and in depths He will be pleased to keep us in the hollow of his holy hand, and by the cleansing operation of his baptizing power, qualify us for the performance of our allotted service in his church militant on earth.

1820. For want of keeping the word of the Lord's patience, how are many warming themselves with sparks of their own kindling, and thereby not only reaping the reward of poverty and sorrow, but bringing into disrepute the precious cause and the dignified office of a gospel minister, in which they profess themselves to have a part. Neither the most extensively gifted, nor those of the largest experience, have anything of their own to communicate which can really profit the people. All must reverently wait upon Him, without whom they can do nothing; and it is only as he opens the spring and causes it afresh to flow, that any, the least or the greatest, are authorized and qualified to attempt to minister to the states of others.

Implicit Obedience.

I spoke to a lady the other day of her sister-in-law, who is one of my esteemed neighbors. "How well she is managing her four children, without any nurse!" I exclaimed: "She looks so calm and untroubled, and yet I know she is delicate."

"She is a woman of great decision of character," was the answer. "She has a system about the children. She never allows them to question what she says; and you know that saves a great deal of fret and worry."

The next morning I made a short call on the subject of our remarks. The lady came into the parlor, and, after shaking hands with me, turned to take a chair, and found that the two-year-old baby had followed her. "Why, baby, I did not know you were here. Run out to brother."

"No, me don't want to."

"O, yes!" was the smiling answer. "Brother will play school with you."

The baby retreated slowly, till she reached the middle of the room, and there she stood with her finger in her mouth, eyeing her mother closely. The mother had turned her chair away from me, and was watching the baby smilingly. It was evident that the caller was entirely forgotten for the moment; it was of the first importance that the baby should mind. I made a little note of the fact, too, that there was no "prunes and persimmons" expression on the mother's pretty face. She had simply spoken, and now expected the baby to do as she said.

"No," burst from the baby.

"O, yes," smiled mamma. "Brother is all ready to play school with you."

The baby stood a moment longer, finger in her mouth, studying her mother's face, and then ran from the room. Then, and not until then, did the mother give me her attention.

The incident made such an impression on me that I want to write it for young mothers. I began with the theory that the best way to bring up a child was to reason with him, and in that way teach him obedience. I abandoned that theory long ago, and wish now that I had never held it for a day. When "implicit obedience" was brought to my mind, I rejected it, largely because, under my new responsibility, I was newly conscious of my own fallibility.

"How can I," I would say to myself, "always know the right command to enforce?" Now I say to myself, "Be as near right as you can, but go ahead." Implicit obedience, lovingly enforced, is the only way to bring up a child, and "eternal vigilance" is its price.—Methodist Recorder.

It is a shame for a rich Christian to be like a Christmas box, that receives all, and nothing can be got out of it till it is broken to pieces.—Dr. John Hall.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Way of Life and How it is Found.

When the Lord, as He came in the flesh, began to teach his disciples, from among them he chose twelve whom He named Apostles. At this time "neither did his brethren believe on Him." These, being among what were reputed the common people, had gladly heard John the Baptist, the forerunner of Christ, preaching repentance; and, confessing their sins, had been baptized of him in Jordan; but the learned "Pharisees and lawyers rejected the counsel of God, being not baptized of Him," but the apostles being simple minded men, reputed by the world as "unlearned and ignorant," were accepted of God in the sincerity of their faith. Hereafter, they had sought remission of sins through the rites of the law, and God's appointed sacrifice of the atoning lamb; now they seek it in a new faith and a heartfelt repentance toward God. The Lord did not seek to change the faith of those who had received his word, but by line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little, gently led them into an enlarged faith, greater knowledge, and clearer conceptions of the truth.

Amid the clashing of creeds among the Jews at this period, and the bitterness engendered by the lust for power, the honest seekers after truth were perplexed, and all men's eyes were in expectancy for the coming of a great prophet to deliver them from internal doubts and oppressing enemies. No wonder, then, the message came to John, "Art thou that prophet that should come into the world, or look we for another?" To which he replied, in the words of Isaiah, "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness: prepare ye the way of the Lord." Again, after the resurrection of Jesus, his own disciples, still having an earthly kingdom uppermost in their minds, asked Him, "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" (Acts: 6). He replied to them, "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in his own power." Such queries arose then, as they do in this, our day, from that part in man which delights to tell or to hear some new thing, and were answered by Divine wisdom accordingly. Others there were who, seeing the mighty miracles that Jesus did, were constrained to acknowledge "This is of a truth that prophet that should come into the world." (John vi: 14.) But though their reason was convinced of this truth, we yet read in another part, "But though He had done so many miracles before them, yet they believed not on Him." (John xii: 37.) and the inspired apostle John gives the reason in the words of the prophet Isaiah, "Therefore they could not believe, because He hath blinded their eyes, and hardened their hearts, that they should not see with their eyes, nor understand with their heart, and be converted, and I should heal them." (John xii: 40, Isaiah vi: 9.) Their reason was already convinced, and they sought a direct answer in accordance with that reason. But had either John or Jesus as a man answered in the affirmative, and the Pharisees had believed, they would have been no nearer the true faith than was Pharaoh, who seeing his own utter impotence to retain the Israelites, let them go, and so far believed Moses. The natural man can neither receive nor savingly believe in God, for it is enmity to God, neither does God seek for the testimony of his truth from it.

Had these Pharisees believed, the pride of their heart being yet unsubdued, and no contrition felt for past sins, they would have felt no need of a Saviour such as the poor Israelites did who felt the bitter bondage of the kingdom of sin, or as those who submitted to John's baptism of repentance. These might have confessed to Christ as to his outward coming, and have endeavored to make him a king among them, through his name they might ride to popularity and prestige among the people, but in place of He ruling them, and they being submissive to his will, they would endeavor to war his will to their outward conceptions of truth, and nominally owning Him as King, yet would their own unregenerate heart bear rule, and to suit their own ambitious ends; or, as a matter of expediency, they would not hesitate to deliver Jesus to Pilate. Yea, to clamor for his death, when Pilate, seeing no evil in Him would let Him go. Such as these love not the doctrine of repentance, and if they do receive it they seek to destroy its life, like they would that of the Master who taught it, and in place of a deep searching work of the grace of God on the heart, would substitute for it a mere turning of their own corrupt mind from one notion to another, whereby they flatter themselves that the kingdom will be theirs. When the doctrine of the cross is mentioned, then are their cries the loudest: "Away with him, away with him crucify him." (John xix: 15.) But Jesus taught it as the first stepping-stone in order to be a disciple.

Notwithstanding all this cruelty at the hand of those whom He seeks to save, after He had risen from the dead, ascended on high, and received all power in heaven and earth, He set before them (as He does to all men) an open door of faith, saying by Peter, "Unto you first God having raised up his Son Jesus, sent Him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities." (Acts iii: 26.)

The apparent differences in our respective lots, whether of rank, power, wealth, learning, or ignorance, which to the eye of man appear so widely to separate man from man, do not weigh in the balance of the sanctuary. God's love and power to save flow towards all. "He lifeth the needy out of the dungill; that He may set him with princes, even the princes of his people." (Psalms cxlii: 7.) Or He smiteth the pride of a Herod, so that "He was eaten of worms." But this power of faith is not given, to the natural man, for he could not believe "though one should rise from the dead;" but comes in and through the visitations of God's spirit to the soul. No man can come to Christ except the Father draw him; but God, having given his Son, and the Son having offered up himself, in obedience to the will of the Father, and thus tasted death for every man, which was our due, as the penalty of sin. He who did no sin died for our sins, that we through Him might live; and having laid down his life for us, and taken it up again, He liveth evermore, and now visits us in the quickenings of that life. The way to reconciliation with God is taken away from the natural man, and it is only as our wills are baptized by his Spirit into the likeness of his death, that we can rise through the life and quickening power of the same into a likeness of his resurrection. So shall we die to self, and live to Him who died for us that we may henceforth not live to ourselves alone, but to Him who thus purchased us by his own blood. "For to be carnally minded is death, but to be spiritually minded is life and peace." (Rom. vii: 6.)

The first prerequisite in order to know this teacher and Saviour is to seek such a frame of mind that we may hear the word of God, and as we turn an attentive ear and a willing heart, we shall receive power to keep it. In receiving ven the law the command was, "Hear! O Israel! how much more necessary is this quietness of soul, in order to hear our great Lawgiver, who low "speakeeth from heaven." Like David's, our soul must come to be as "a weaned child." Psalms cxxxi: 2). "In returning and rest shall e be saved, in quietness and in confidence shall e your strength," (Isaiah xxx. 15.) And the ae prophet commands, "Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils," for wherein is he to be accounted of?" (Is. ii: 22.) Oh, let us ot then walk in our own counsels, but hearken o Israel's Shepherd, who will lead us in a way e know not, so shall we be permitted with the aints in light, to be partakers of those things ich as the apostle Paul saith, "Eye hath not een, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath epared for them that love Him." (Isaiah lxi: 4.) But God hath revealed them unto us, (i. e., he Christians including the apostles) "by his pirit, for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God." (1 Cor. ii: 10.) And e apostle further affirms, "We have received he Spirit which is of God." This "Holy Spirit s given to all such as obey Him." We shall hen have entered on a path of holiness, a path of peace, which is "the path of the just that thineeth more and more unto the perfect day" and leads to everlasting rest in the realms of glory.

FROM THE "LONDON FRIEND,"

"Amsterdam's Welvaren."

BY E. ROBINSON.

In an upper room of Devonshire House there hangs over the mantel-piece a drawing representing a house in Amsterdam under two aspects—one view shows it as it stood at the beginning of the century, the other as it now stands. It is a high, narrow house, with a miniature ship erected on the gable point, and the words "Bewaar School, Amsterdam's Welvaren," carved on the front of the building ("Infant School, Amsterdam's Welfare.") Considerable interest attaches to the story of this school, and as I came to Amsterdam almost immediately after the Yearly Meeting, I lost no time in inquiring as to its whereabouts, and my sister and I proceeded to visit it. We had to cross a good part of the town to reach it from my brother's residence, but a walk across Amsterdam is full of interest and pleasure. It is a most picturesque city, with rich coloring, quaint corners, and "artistic bits" everywhere. The houses have their gable ends to the street, and hardly two are alike in height, color, or ornament. The principal streets are wide, with canals in the centre, and fine trees, now in full foliage, border the latter. All is full of life; busy people, in a variety of costume, throng the streets and quays, and barges and boats of all kinds go up and down the water-courses. Perhaps the prettiest scene of all is the flower-market, where for about a quarter of a mile under the trees, along the water's bank, are arranged ferns, and flowers, and plants of all kinds and colors; the boats that brought them from the country lying moored alongside. We crossed no fewer than nine bridges to reach our destination in the Beerenstraat, where we found ourselves standing at the door of the house so faithfully represented by the drawing at Devonshire House. In the room which we first entered there hangs a large chart, with a ship drawn on the top of it, and the following inscription, in English and Dutch, which tells the story of the school better than words of mine can do:—

"Founded, A. D. 1830; rebuilt, A. D. 1864.

"This Infant School, established since 1830, was founded by the religious Society of Friends in London, out of funds arising from the capture of a Dutch East-Indiaman, in 1781, by one of their members, during the war between England and America, when Holland was in alliance with the latter. This religious Society believes war to be forbidden to the Christian, and will not allow its members to take up arms, nor to have any profit whatever from war. So John Warder—who was a Friend that had a share in the English vessel which had captured the Dutch Indiaman, (but without his knowledge or approval)—gave up the money he received for his portion of the prize to his friends, who undertook for him the task of finding out the sufferers by the capture of the vessel, and to make them compensation in money for their losses. But it took many years before this could be done, chiefly from the wars which raged on the Continent, and when the opportunity occurred, the original sum had been so increased by investment, that, after paying to all the sufferers that could be found, both principal and interest up to the time of payment, there still remained a sum of money over.

"This money was again invested, and the Friends who had the care of it let it increase by accumulation of interest, till they became anxious to apply it in some way for the benefit of Holland, and more especially of the city of Amsterdam, which was the port to which the captured ship had belonged.

"It was then that John S. Mollet, himself a member of the religious Society of Friends and a citizen of Amsterdam, saw, when in London on a visit, an Infant School, then first established, and was so pleased with its usefulness as to wish for one in his city; for there were no infant schools then in Holland.

"He found the Friends willing to have the money remaining from the Dutch ship devoted to such a purpose; so a house in the Beerenstraat was bought and the school has been there ever since. It was the first infant school established in Amsterdam, and is now the only one where the education given is without subscriptions. About 120 children attend daily.

"The house became so old, it was feared it would fall in and the school would be closed, because the money held by the Friends was not enough to rebuild the house. But they did not like that an institution, which was doing good and was a proof of their views against all war, should cease to exist, and so have subscribed among themselves and rebuilt the school at their own expense.

"It is to be hoped it will now long remain and be to the neighborhood as the name of the captured ship indicates—an Amsterdam's Welvaren."

We visited this interesting spot more than once. The school is managed by a committee of ladies, some of whom we met, and who very kindly gave us all the information we desired. One lady, who was just inscribing on the books the name of the 7017th little scholar, was the granddaughter of the above mentioned John Mollet, the last Amsterdam Quaker. There are now about 150 children attending the school. Their ages range from three to six. They are not of the poorest class, but are clean and comfortably dressed, bright, bonny little things.

There is a payment of two or three pence a week.

And so there stands, in this busy Dutch city of Amsterdam, a quiet, unpretending, and somewhat hidden monument to the faithfulness of our ancestors to their testimony against war. It is pleasant to come across these fruits of right-doing, and one rejoices that so much good is being done in a quiet way. Yet, as a Friend and a worker in the cause of peace, one comes away with many questionings. John Mollet was the last Friend in Amsterdam. How came it so? From what one knows of religious life in Holland, Quaker principles might well find a place here and satisfy a felt want. With their extinction has departed that Christian testimony against human slaughter so much needed at the present day. "A lamp is not lighted to be put under a bushel, but on the stand; and it shineth unto all that are in the house. Even so let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

AMSTERDAM, Sixth Month 19th, 1891.

PICKING UP.—One of the time-consuming cares of every house-keeper may be described under the general head of picking up. She picks up after her husband, after her girls, after the babies in the nursery. The latter strew the nursery floor with their blocks, toys and picture books: about one baby in a hundred being taught to put its little properties away when done with them, while the other ninety-nine are diligently instructed at an early age in the art of being waited upon by their elders. Girls come in from their pleasant excursions here and there, flushed, dimpled, sweet as the rose that laughs in the hedge; but sweet as they look, they are thoughtless beyond belief in the matter of making work for their mothers. Doubtless their intention is to carry their things to the proper places themselves, after a period of rest; but she who procrastinates in such an affair is lost. It putting away one's out-door clothing, one's letters, one's books, it is the first moment of decision which counts—the primary indecision which is fatal. What the young person lazily or thoughtlessly imposes on somebody who is older, and by reason of her added years less able to bear the strain, may be just the traditional straw, beyond which strength and vigor will endure no more.

For the good man of the house we have always the most elastic toleration; yet we think that too often he binds a burden on the shoulders of his wife, which frets her unwarrantably, though she makes no sign of complaint. "My husband's progress through the house," said a matron recently, "is marked by a litter of hats, coats, slippers, newspapers, pamphlets, books, boots, corkscrews, inkstands, reports, collars, handkerchiefs," etc. He is forever saying:—"Dear, do you remember where you put such or such a thing of mine?" and wondering why his wife has so inconvenient a habit of clearing things up.

It needs only a glance to show, that if everybody were of one mind about putting articles at once where they belong, picking up would be reduced to a minimum, and one labor of the housewife greatly simplified.—Margaret E. Sangster, in "The Home-Maker."

BEFORE you do anything pleasing to the flesh, be sure that you have God's leave; and whatever He commands, though ever so unpleasant to the flesh, be sure to do it. Make a grievance of nothing but sin.—T. Adams.

For "THE FRIEND."

ONE of the early proprietors of Dartmouth, Mass., was Henry Tucker, a Friend, who settled there in 1660, and built a stone house in the north part of the township. His name is mentioned in the journals of Friends from Great Britain, and the road near his house is still known as the "Tucker Road"—in ancient records "Tucker's Lane." The old house was taken down many years ago, and one of wood built in its place. This, a larger and more commodious house, was long the hospitable home of the late Benjamin Tucker, of the fourth generation from said Henry. A Friend is the present owner of the old homestead farm, whose children in the maternal line are descendants of the first settler, as above.

THE FARMER OF TUCKER'S LANE.

Down the long lane, in a far-distand field,
I saw the honest farmer at his till,
A thoughtful man, for whom another yield,
He found, beside the product of the soil.

For while he made his furrows straight and deep,
Or dropped the golden grain from hill to hill,
His thoughts with Him a sweet communion keep,
Who can alone our highest hopes fulfill.

Man sows the seed, but God gives the increase,
Both in the ground, and in the human heart,
And he who tills may truly find that peace
Through faith and hope, the wise man's chosen part.

Most truly he who tills the taming earth,
Perceives the forces that control man's lot,
Walks with his God in plenty or in dearth,
And finds rich lessons in the humblest spot.

His heart is awakened by the early song,
That comes so sweetly from the neighboring wood,
And as he treads the furrowed paths along,
Finds in his work an ever-present good.

And when we assembled at his board,
Well spread with plenty and with wholesome fare,
His faithful wife with him in true accord,
And sweet young faces, all so fresh and fair,

His soul in reverence is oft upraised,
And godly counsel finds a ready ear,
By which for Him, the great adored and praised,
The heart is early taught to love and fear.

Far from the town's disturbing scenes and noise,
He thus is kept in virtue's happier way,
While off his heart is awakened to rejoice,
As he pursues his labors, day by day.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.

D. R.

RECOMPENSE.

BY ADELAIDE ALLISON.

Through the long, toilsome day she went
With quiet sweetness, every-where;
I watched her tender, tireless hands,
Pressing here, relieving there;
No recompense, no answering smile,
No words of cheer were hers the while.

"Tell me, thou patient one," I cried,
"What secret hope sustains thy heart,
That through a thankless ministry
So gentle unto all thou art?"
She turned on me her soft eyes' light:
"I heed them not. He comes to-night,"
Behold an all-repaying love!
What matters, when the day is past,
The burdens others on her laid,
If in his arms she rests at last?
The darkest way to her is bright,
Since He who loves her "comes to-night."

O soul, whose hope is high as heaven,
Cense thine unprofitable pliant!
A watcher, waiting for thy Lord,
How can'st thou grieve, how dar'st thou faint?
Work on, in joy, while yet 'tis light,
Thy Bridegroom's voice may call to-night.

A day of toil—what matters it?
So shut this life of tears and pain.
Lift up thy face! What dost thou fear?
Thou hast not given thine all in vain.
Soon thou shalt walk with Him in white:
Who knoweth? It may be to-night.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

What are the Needs of the Society of Friends.

How often the gentle restraint is unheeded! It is a serious period in life, when we, like Adam, are inwardly convicted and condemned, as in God's own presence, and are forced to acknowledge—"I took of the forbidden fruit."—"I did eat." If one transgression separated Adam from God, has sin a more free scope of allowance now? or is our feeling of consciousness so blunted that we look upon sin as a very little thing: like Saul saving the best of the sheep and oxen for a sacrifice to the Lord? It is in this state of sensible consciousness that the "clearing of ourselves" takes place, that the true knowledge of ourselves is obtained, and the victory which stands in the seed's life is obtained. Here the true learning of bearing and forbearing with one another's burdens becomes our increased experience; but here lies a difficult thing to distinguish between true forbearance and compromise, as our "righteous self" finds a peace and a rest short of that death that empties from vessel to vessel, not with us as "once for all;" but with every new subject and aspect in life, there is a new death to be passed through; because "righteous self," if not self-righteous self, is always alive, wanting to take the uppermost seat in the synagogue; and, indeed, if it were not so, that there was a continually increasing conflict in our Christian warfare, we should not have the experimental knowledge of the judgment of God upon Eve, who is the mother of us all; and, as like begets like, so all according to our several positions in life, most experimentally witness, in our spiritual attitude, the bringing forth of the new birth.

The Apostle Paul shows that the Christian religion was not a mere change in theoretical ideas and perceptions. In Rom. viii: 1, he testifies of a state wherein there is therefore no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, that walk not after the flesh—that is, the lusts of the flesh; for the Spirit of Life has made me free from the law of sin and of death. But in the same chapter he continues, verse 22, &c., "for we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now."—Mark what follows—and "not only they, but ourselves also, which have the first fruits of the Spirit, even we (the chosen 12) even we ourselves groan within ourselves (why this groaning?) waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body."—then, speaking of hope, says "for if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it." Two theories: Paul, the aged, here excludes instantaneity—and peace and joy—apart from daily temptation and conflict; but it were we taught that "him that overcometh" I will make a pillar in the house of my God, to go out no more;" and Jude ascribes praise "to Him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless." God's order in creating and subjecting all mankind to be controlled by unchangeable laws, testifies that the apostolic attainments were the attainments of some of Adam's immediate descendants, called "the chosen of God." Yes, even Enoch himself, the seventh generation from Adam, after so long a lapse of time, is given the appellation, given to no other mortal man in the Bible.—"He walked with God and was not"—whilst the command is expressed, "walk thou before God and be perfect."

Experience teaches that privation is the only way of learning rightly to appreciate past favors and how rightly to use the future. Can we doubt but that our first parents' fall taught them this? There is no reference made but to the one fall, and the one restoration, by the promised seed; yet this one fall changed the whole aspect of their earthly pilgrimage. God was then a jealous and righteous God; so He is now. They were symbolically excluded from a visible Garden, and every son and daughter of Adam that lives to attain to a knowledge of the law is excluded from the spiritual garden of child-like innocence—and the flaming sword turn each way to guard it.

If we could but with open eyes see our Father's guardian care over his created, yet invisible souls and spirits, how the true Light shines in the darkness, repelling the unseen forces from our otherwise unguarded feet, we should often have to exclaim, "the Lord was in it, and I knew it not." This fact arises then prominent to view, that through the whole progress of our first parents' fall, they were not separated from the true Light;—secondly, the true Light did not leave them, but judged and condemned them. Righteousness and justice on God's part demanded, "the soul that sinneth it shall die." Death here indicates separation: Adam was separated—he was afraid, he hid himself; but if the Light had been withdrawn, would he not have been insensible? But he was sensible, and under that, or in that inward-felt sense, God wrought. Christ is both the author and finisher of our faith; and we can gain no advantage by transposing and substituting Christ's outward words, for that which is "implanted;" and the implanted word, if truly believed in, and accepted, will ever with prophetic vision look to Calvary as the place where, in the fulness of time, Christ in the fulness of the Godhead consummated the possibility of our salvation by the sacrifice of himself.

To some it may be profitable now to reconsider our fundamental principle as a Society,—that the two-fold effect of the "flaming sword" must be a realized fact in our own experience. First, the true Light, that enlighteneth every man—gives to every man a true knowledge that there is a God—and is "the Word" preached by God himself in his own created and purchased children. It is the redeeming knowledge; but this word preached did not "profit" some; "although nigh in the heart and in the mouth;" and why?—"not being mixed with faith in them that heard it—but their foolish hearts deceived them," &c. This inward faith is ineradicable; so much so, that the devil believes and trembles. Thomas Paine and Napoleon, when facing death, believed and trembled.

This inward faith, redeeming in its nature as long as it is "held down in iniquity," is the flaming sword that keeps the tree of life. Here is the second point:—Lest man again should return to the tree of life, and eat and live forever. As a kingdom divided against itself cannot stand, the minuteness of the law in delineating a clear distinction between that which is clean and that which is unclean—between them that presumed to be servants in "steading the ark" and offering with unsanctified fire, ought to teach us that Gospel, or fuller dispensation of grace, cannot be any more lenient in morals than the law.

Physicians in the East.

The Sunday School Times some months ago contained an article contributed by George E. Post, M. D., of Beirut, Syria, in which are related some of his own experiences, illustrating the influence which may be acquired in the East by a skillful physician, and the manner in which his profession opens the door for his entrance into social circles which would otherwise be closed against him. From it the following extracts are taken:—

"Twenty-three years ago, I was in the village of Safita, in Northern Syria. The lands of that district were in the possession of a family of nominally Christian tax-gatherers, who had gradually absorbed the little holdings of the peasants, and had come to regard them as serfs. At last, under a complication of miseries, the people had risen and cast off the yoke of their taskmasters, and a considerable number of them declared themselves Protestants. I visited them in my double office of teacher and physician, and strengthened their faith while healing their diseases. The great family was stirred with wrath, and many were the threats of personal harm to me, and warnings to leave the district. But disease is no respecter of persons. Even in the great man's house there were some who needed the physician's care. I was invited to go and see my enemies. The people of the village warned me not to go. When I expressed myself determined to do so, they warned me to eat nothing while in that house, saying that I would surely be poisoned.

I paid no attention to their warning, accepted their hospitality, attended their sick, and was sent back to my tent with all honor, and none the worse for the good meal which I had had in the publican's house. I have lived to see that family warm friends to the missionaries personally; and they have again and again placed members of their households under our professional care, and have sent their children to our schools, while the Gospel has taken a firm, and, I trust, permanent hold in their neighborhood.

"On a spur of Hermon, overlooking the olive orchards of Hasbeyah and the mountain torrent which swells the Hashāni, the northernmost source of the Jordan, is the picturesque castle, no longer used as a fortress, but still inhabited by one branch of a family which boasts a pedigree perhaps the most ancient on the earth,—the famous house of Shehāb (the Mevors). The total population of the castle is but sixty souls of the princely line, with their dependants. This branch of the Emirs is entirely Mohammedan, and for long centuries held sway over the regions watered by the Hashāni and its tributaries. They have held their own against sultans and crusaders; and so proud are they of their lineage and rank, which they trace back through Mohammed and Noah to the antediluvian patriarchs, that they will not intermarry with any except their own race. And so it happens that they have undergone the physical deterioration which is the sure result of such close alliances. Into this household I was invited some years ago, and in their princely castle I spent a week of enjoyment of their rich hospitality. In the freedom begotten by confidence and gratitude, we talked over very topic of morals and religion, and the friendships contracted during that week of medical care and personal kindness have never grown cold. The very day on which these lines are written, the writer has visited two of this family who are under his care, in Beirut, having come down for treatment. It is quite certain that no missionary nor a medical man could obtain such a hold, nor use it with such freedom and fearlessness, as is quite easy and natural to the physician.

"Centuries ago, another branch of this same family took refuge in Lebanon, after military reverses. In process of time they became rulers of the country, and embraced the Christian faith, connecting themselves with the Maronites. From this branch was descended the Emir Beshir, the 'old man of the mountains,' whose name was a terror to his enemies and a tower of strength to his adherents. A numerous line of these emirs seized the most important strategic points of the Lebanon, and long held the reins of government; and although their political power has been broken under the new system of government inaugurated in 1861, they still stand at the head of the nobility of the East. Of this family, the writer and other medical missionaries have had many members under their professional care, and large numbers have been in various mission schools. Four of the young princes have studied medicine in the college at Beirut. It is safe to say that the influence acquired over this branch of the Shehāb family, is almost wholly due to medical care.

"A few years ago the illustrious Abd-el-Kadir, the Algerine hero who saved thousands of Christian lives in Damascus at the time of the massacres, was taken ill. I was sent for to attend him, and succeeded, by a surgical operation, in relieving his sufferings and prolonging his life. Since that time his eldest son has been under my care, and thus an influence secured in one of the most powerful families of the East. I shall never forget the evening when the success of the operation gave relief to the obstruction under which he was sinking. His large harem was assembled under the windows of his suburban home near Damascus. It was an early evening hour, and, by the faint moonlight, their sheeted forms could be seen, like ghosts, among the trees of the garden. When the news of the relief experienced by the aged prince was sent down to them, they set up a shout of triumph and thanksgiving which echoed far away among the chalk cliffs of the Abana valley, and then crowded around the door to catch up and transmit each item of encouragement, while the noble sufferer threw his arms around my neck, and kissed both cheeks, in token of his gratitude.

"A commodore of the United States Navy, who did not believe in missions, once told the writer that there was one sight which impressed him as the most Christ-like he had ever witnessed. It was a medical missionary, in his dispensary at Singapore, toiling all the morning long with those wretched outcasts, in the stifling air of a pest-stricken city, and all for the love of Christ. Against such an exhibition of unselfish benevolence, no cavil can be brought. And the same effect is produced on the native mind. Such a service, so above all that their religions can match—so without precedent or basis in their own experience, is from another world. They are accustomed to see Europeans and Americans as conquerors, as seekers after commercial gain, as travellers searching for knowledge or pleasure—but here are persons who offer them a living demonstration of the Golden Rule; and although using science and art, yet using them under the inspiration of a purpose from on high."

The Praying Children.

Not far from a quarter of a century since, there lived a man and his family in one of the new settlements on the American Continent, their humble cabin being just on the confines of a deep forest. The children of whom our truthful record speaks were, Mary, six years of age, and James, four. The mother had long ere this known and loved her Saviour, but her husband up to this time knew Him not.

As it is not uncommon in every new country, the one cow of this family ranged the adjacent forest at will as her pasture ground, and it was the duty of Mary and James to go for her toward evening and bring her in. It happened one evening after spring had somewhat opened, that Mary and James returned from their search with no cow, but with their little aprons full of flowers. The mother said, "I am delighted with your pretty flowers, but I am sorry you spent the time to gather them, when you should have been finding our cow." The father said they had done very wrong, and must go immediately back into the woods and find the cow. It would be a bad precedent, he said, to let them off, and that then was the time to teach them effectually that duty must be regarded before pleasure. So Mary and James turned towards the woods again. When they had gone, the careful mother said to her husband, "My dear, it will soon be dark; our Mary and Jamie will naturally be frightened, and may lose their way and never return." "I will follow on," replied the father, "keeping out of sight, but having my eye and ear on them." This was the plan.

The little ones plunged into the forest and wandered on round and round—cheerful for the most part while daylight lasted: but growing timid and anxious as it gradually wore away. "How far have we gone?" said James. "It seems to me it must be ten miles," said Mary. "I wonder," said James, "if there are any bears in these woods?" "I think not," replied Mary, "but I heard a man say that there were wolves in here that came out and caught sheep." They felt bitterly sad, and began to cry aloud, alternating their outbursts of grief with cries of Pa! Pa! He had drawn near enough to hear all they said, but still thought it best to let things take their course a while longer. At length Mary thought what she could do, and said: "Come, James, we must pray to Jesus;—that is what Ma always does when she is in trouble;—I have seen her do it a great many times, and she says Jesus always hears her prayer if she is humble and only believes. Nobody else can save us; I am sure Jesus can. Come, James, and kneel down with me by this log, and we will pray to Jesus." She began with a very humble confession of her sin—how she had not always obeyed her ma cheerfully, (although she had never been known to disobey); she said over and over, "Lord, we are not worthy of anything"; but Thos had heard mother in her trouble, and now we come to Thee to help us. Wilt Thou not send pa to find us, or if he cannot, then let one of Thine angels come and stay with us till morning. We know he can shut the mouths of the wolves so tight, for he once shut the mouths of lions. O, Jesus, Thos didst put Thine hand on little children, and I am sure thou wilt hear our prayer in our distress. Amen." "Now, James, you pray too," James prayed a short prayer; "O, my Heavenly Father, I have been naughty to my sister; I have been naughty to my mother; and have cried when I ought not to; but O my Father, save us and send pa. O Amen."

Then the sister wiped away her brother's tears, saying, "I know God will hear our prayer, —don't you think He will?"

Her tone of voice was calm and cheerful, and her countenance radiant with peaceful trust.

Her father was near enough, undiscovered, to hear these affecting words. Never before had anything ever fallen on his heart like those confessions of sin, and that simple earnest trust in Jesus. It was all new to him. He had never known that his children prayed, and such prayer as this gave him new ideas of a present Jesus, and of the heart's living trust in Him. It led him to think that he too had sins to confess, and needed such a Saviour to go to in his troubles. While these thoughts crowded on his mind, he had unconsciously suffered time to glide away, until now the light of day was wholly gone, and only the dim moon sent struggling rays through the tree-tops of the forest. Starting, as if he had already waited too long, he called: "Mary!" She heard, shouted once, "Pa's come!" clapped her hands and cried:— "Jamie, God has heard our prayer; I knew He would; praise God—praise Jesus!"

Their little hearts did praise. God had answered their humble, truthful prayer, and taught them lessons of trust which they could never forget. And not least among the blessings which came from this transient discipline was the portion that fell to the father. He could not cast off the conviction that there was more in having such a faith in Jesus, coupled with a deep sense of unworthiness, than he had ever thought of before. He saw he needed such a Saviour and such a trust in Him, and these convictions led him to forsake every other refuge for one so perfect and so precious. "No sermon," said he, "ever preached to me like that scene in the woods—the prayers, confessions, and faith of my little children!"

The sequel to this history bears its testimony to the preciousness of that early faith. James died just on the verge of manhood, his faith from four years old and upward evincing itself a living power. The father lived thereafter a good life, and has gone to his eternal rest. The mother, from whose lips we received the narrative, gives the following sequel. Mary is a mother, and has a little Jamie near the age of that other Jamie when he offered his prayer in the forest. His grandmother, some little time since, was entertaining him with the particulars of this narrative. His eyes glistened as the story slowly unfolded itself to his mind. When it was told, he noticed that his mother was bathed in tears. "Ma," said he, "what is the matter?" "I am thinking of that Mary." "Ma, do you know who Mary is?" "Yes." "Who is she, ma?" "My child, she is your own dear mother." "Ma, did you pray as young as that?" "Yes, my son," said she, quietly; "I always prayed." "Did you?" said he, very thoughtfully; "then I will begin now!"

And so it proved. This was to him, hopefully, the beginning of a prayerful life.

So may it be to the youthful readers of this narrative.—Oberlin Evangelist.

A Warning Against Needlessly Frightening Children.—The death of George B. Geurin, a little boy, occurred at his home in Broad Street from what is supposed to have been the result of a fright. The boy had been in delicate health, and about a month ago was so badly frightened by the thrusting of a dead snake in his face by mischievous companions that he was at once prostrated, and died from the shock.

What a Drop of Oil Did.

BY MINNIE E. KENNEY.

Bang! slam! Every time any one went out the front door, they had to pull it shut with such energy that the house would shake from cellar to garret. Grandma would jump up and drop the stitches from her knitting-needles; Aunt Tina's nerves would quiver; and even mother would put her hands over her ears to shut out the deafening noise. We had moved into the house but two months ago, and, singularly enough, it had never occurred to any of us, that perhaps the spring-lock on the front door might be persuaded to shut more unobtrusively. We had accepted it as a part of our new conditions, and prepared ourselves to endure the banging as patiently as we might. If the doctor came to the house to see a patient, he would leave the door unatched rather than make the noise that would be necessary to shut it, and shy boy-visitors who might be left to let themselves out, would bang it gently a dozen times before they would be brave enough to give it one conclusive slam.

Perhaps we should have been banging that door yet, if Uncle Edward had not come to make us a visit. He heard the door bang twice, and then he sprang to his feet: "That lock needs a drop of oil about as bad as anything I ever saw. Fred, my boy, go get your mother's oil-can for me."

I obeyed, and followed him into the hall, curious to see what he was going to do. A drop of oil in the lock, a little working backward and forward to be sure that the oil had reached every part, and then Uncle Edward closed the door. It closed so gently that I had to open and shut the door myself to be fully convinced that the lock really worked. The family took turns in going out for the purpose of noiselessly closing the door after them. Surely no single drop of oil had ever before wrought such a change.

"Always try oil, Fred, and it will make every thing work smoothly," said Uncle Edward, as he handed me back the can. "Did it ever strike you that persons as well as things sometimes need oiling?"

I stared at Uncle Edward in bewilderment. He was always saying things that I did not understand.

"Yes, I mean it,"—and he smiled kindly down into my inquiring eyes. "Very often in a household one member will be ill-tempered or fretful, and this failing in one will disturb every one else's comfort as much as the refractory lock did. The only thing to preserve peace and harmony is to use the oil of kindness. One bright, pleasant remark can dispel a whole cloud of ill temper and restore good nature. Try it some time, and see if it does not work like a charm. A small boy like yourself can use this oil just as effectually as any of the older members of the family, and sometimes you may have an opportunity to use it to better advantage. Don't forget the lesson of this lock."

As I put the oil-can away, I laid Uncle Edward's words to heart, and I made up my mind that he was a regular human oil-can, and that it was because he always knew just what to say to soothe every man's hurt feelings or sore temper that he was universally welcomed and beloved.

It was not many hours before I found an opportunity to follow his advice, and I found that a drop of oil could indeed work wonders. Just try it for yourselves, boys, and you will always use it.—The Little Christian.

The Shepherd's Care.

I remember watching a shepherd driving his flock from the Piedmont mountains to the plains of Italy, along a road white with pulverized limestone, and glaring beneath the beams of a southern sun, blazing in its meridian force.—He was a tall and stately man, in the costume of the country; his large hat shadowed a face round and intelligent; his purple jacket, slung around his neck, formed a cradle for a new-born lamb, while two others, but little older, were fastened in his rough hand plaid behind his shoulders. In one hand he held the shepherd's rod, a long light rod, by which he guided the flock, gently touching them when they wandered or were heedless of his call. He carefully led them on, occasionally pausing and leaning on his staff until some straggler joined her companions, or while carefully adjusting the helpless creature he carried in his bosom.

The hungry sheep strove to crop the withered weeds and dusty herbage on the borders of the road, but the shepherd would neither let them eat nor rest; he urged them forward, and bleating and discontented, they were obliged to leave their self-chosen food, and obey his voice, and follow him.

The roadway branched off in another direction; the poor sheep saw nothing before them but the dusty path and the withered weeds, but the shepherd looked beyond. Sloping down from the direct road was a green nook, overhung by an acacia hedge, protected from the heat by the high bank above it, and water from an unfauling spring ran into a pool beneath. Bleating with delight, the weary sheep seemed to find life and vigor at once, and entering on their pleasant pasture, forgot the troubles of the way. The shepherd watched their enjoyment with evident satisfaction. As he walked amongst them, examining them individually, he counted them over; not one of them was missing. He had something better for them than they would have chosen for themselves. Yet how they had murmured all the way.

It was a picture and parable of Oriental life and beauty, which left an indelible impression on my memory.

The following evening, before the sun had set, we drove up a steep hill about a mile from the place where I had left the shepherd. We waited on the summit to rest the horse. I looked down upon the plain, and saw some of the beautiful gardens of the villas below. One was closed on account of the death of the proprietor, and all was in wild luxuriance. It had a large and fruitful orange grove, with refreshing verdure beneath, and in the centre was a fountain, sending forth its sparkling waters, which fell into the marble basins and troughs below.

The sunset gleamed on the golden fur, and tinted the green shadows of the glossy leaves of the orange; but it was neither the gorgeous sunset nor the orange grove that filled my heart. Here rested the flock,—no more weary and dusty; the lambs lay by their mother's side and here the shepherd himself reposed beneath the trees. My thoughts were on our Shepherd King, who maketh his flock to lie down a noon; and then on the day when the tabernacle of God shall be with men, "and He will dwell with them,"—then we shall know, even as we are known, and adore the wisdom of Him who has fed his flock "according to the integrity o his heart, and guided them by the skillfulness of his hands." (Psalm lxxviii: 72.)

Pastures in the wilderness

My Shepherd keeps for me;
And rivulets among the rocks
My blind eyes cannot see.

Wearily and faint I travel on
The road to home and rest;
So let me cast my care on Him:
(My Father knoweth best.)

Yea, Heavenly Shepherd, all my care
I fain to Thee would bring:
For in the wilderness I walk,
Thou seest the secret spring.

The quiet halting-place in view,
The little verdant spot,
Where Thou wilt whisper to my heart
"Thou hast not been forgot."

Natural History, Science, &c.

The Cactus.—There are several hundred varieties known to botanists, most of which can be identified on Mexican soil, this being their native climate. No matter how dry the season, they are always juicy. It is said that when cattle can get no water to drink, they will break down the cacti with their horns and chew the thick leaves and stalks to quench their thirst. The variety of shapes assumed by this peculiar growth, almost exceeds belief; some seen in Mexico assumed the form of trees from forty to fifty feet in height, while others, vine-like, run along the ground, bearing leaves as round as cannon balls. Another variety, closely joining the earth, twists about like a vegetable serpent. The great marvel relating to this plant has been, how it could keep alive and remain full of sap and moisture, when other neighboring vegetation was killed by drought. But this is easily explained. It is protected by a thick epidermis which prevents evaporation, so that the store of moisture which it absorbs during the wet season is retained within its circulation. One sort of the cactus, known as the cereus grandiflorus, blooms only in the night; the frail flower that it bears dies at the coming of morning. The cochineal insect of Mexico and Central America is solely nurtured by the native growth of cacti.

Burros vs. Locomotives.—We expressed surprise to an intelligent citizen, at seeing long lines of burros laden with freight beside the railroad, and going in the same direction, remarking to him that the railway ought to be able to compete with the jackasses. "You must take into consideration," said our informant, "that a man who owns a score of these cheap animals, can himself drive them all to market or any given point. His time he counts as nothing; his burros feed beside the way, and their sustenance costs him nothing. Wages verage throughout the country something less than thirty cents per day, and the cost of living upon the peons is proportionately low. A railway is an expensive system to support, and just charge accordingly; consequently the burros, as a means of transportation for a certain class of goods, are quite able to compete with the locomotive and the rail." Of course, so other avenues for remunerative employment re opened to the common people, this antiquated style of transportation will gradually go out of use, and the locomotive will take the goods which are now carried by these patient and economical animals.

A Mexican Sand-Storm.—While at Silao, a Mexican sand-storm, a visitant which is very liable to appear on the open plains during the dry season, struck in our immediate vicinity, followed by a fierce dust storm, which lasted for about an hour, darkening the atmosphere to a night-bue for miles around, and covering every exposed article or person with a thick layer of fine sand. It was necessary promptly to close all doors and windows. Indeed a person could move easily face a furious hailstorm than one of these dry gales; men and animals alike sought shelter from its blinding fierceness. So men, horses and camels composing the caravans which cross the desert of Sahara, when struck by a sand-storm, are obliged to throw themselves flat upon the ground, and there remain until it has exhausted its fury. The condition of the soil at Silao may be easily imagined, when it is remembered that rain had not fallen for several months.

German Churches in America.—There is always a crisis befalling those churches in the United States which perpetuate there the various religious divisions of Germany. The question how to keep the young people disturbs them all. They grow up in the midst of an English-speaking people, and they insensibly acquire that language. They ask then for the use of English in the services of religion, and if they do not obtain it, go off to the English churches. The ministers and elders are in sore perplexity about the matter. They resist, but resistance avails little. As a journalist who knows the situation, says: "Those that have been slowest to learn, have suffered most. Those that have been greatest among the Lutherans and the Reformed German; but we are surprised to find that the small body of Moravians has also this trouble to contend with. The 'Moravian' advises its congregations to hold its services in both tongues, but not to refuse the use of the English language. It exhorts the old to sacrifice their attachment to and forego their mother tongue for the sake of the youth, who must soon be the supporters and leaders of the Church.—Good counsel."

Military Obedience.—He who commands the army is the one to whom the highest deference must be paid. He is to be obeyed rather than God. His edicts none may disregard with impunity; it matters not how grossly these edicts may violate the humane feelings of the soldier, or his sense of right, they must be implicitly obeyed. Thus are the rights of conscience ruthlessly trampled under foot. Insubordination to the will of the military authorities is the highest crime a soldier can commit. He may more safely disobey all the commandments of the Decalogue than refuse submission to his superiors. A soldier is required to merge himself, body and soul, in the plans of his human masters; clearly seeing the thing commanded to be done, he must, nevertheless, do it. Such is the doctrine upon which the military system rests. Such the doctrine that is accepted throughout Christendom. The Bible from Madam Teneach, the founder of the sect, is so explicitly as does the military department of every human government. How wicked, how impious, then, is it for any man to become a soldier. He ought to refuse to submit to the degradation, as did the primitive Christians. He ought to refuse, though it should cost him his life. Better to die a martyr at the stake to principle than to be a soldier.—Samuel J. May.

The Hinchists.—There exists in the South of France, especially in the two departments of Gard and Hérault, near the lower Rhone, a religious body called the White Church, or the Hinchists, so named from Madam Hinch, the founder of the sect. Its members absolutely refuse to bear arms. The military authorities have hitherto allowed such of them as have been drawn for the Conscription to serve as attendants in the army hospitals, or in similar occupations. But inasmuch as the number of Hinchists is increasing, it is very doubtful whether this consideration can any longer be extended to them.—Herald of Peace.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 22, 1891.

In the interesting testimony borne by James Dickinson to the character and services of his beloved friend and fellow-laborer in the Gospel, Thomas Wilson, who, Thomas Story says, was to him "the most eminent" minister of the Gospel in these days, occurs the following paragraph: "I know there was not anything more delightful to my dear companion, than to be under the influence of God's holy spirit, where-with he was often filled, not only for his own good, but for the good of others, he having a dispensation of the everlasting Gospel committed to him of God, which he preached freely; and it was his care to keep it without charge. Though he had a large gift, beyond many, yet was glad of the least child who spoke from the motion of God's spirit, he having learned to cast down his crown at the feet of the Lamb."

May the revival of this testimony stimulate those who read it, to seek more and more to come under and abide under the influence of this Holy Spirit, so that they may increasingly partake in that blessed communion with the Father and the Son, and that knowledge of them which our Saviour declared was "life eternal!" What a happy condition would it be for all of us, if it could be truly said, that our greatest delight was to feel these heavenly influences, and to be brought under the operation of the Divine hand.

And how instructive is the declaration, that notwithstanding his own eminent gift in the ministry, he "was glad of the least child, who spoke from the motion of God's Spirit. We believe it is right to feel sympathy with those who as yet have had but little experience in the work of the ministry, yet are at times concerned by the fresh extensions of Divine Grace to utter a few words in weakness it may be, and as with a stammering tongue.

John Richardson relates that "after a large Yearly Meeting, where there were many able ministers, worthy William Penn, who was one of them, taking me aside, said, 'The main part of the service of this day's work went on thy side, and we saw it and were willing and easy to give way to the Truth, though it was through thee, who appears but like a shrub; and it is but reasonable the Lord should make use of whom He pleases.'

"This worthy man, and minister of the Gospel, notwithstanding his great endowments and excellent qualifications, yet thought it his place to give way to the Truth, and let the holy testimony go through whom it might please the Lord to empower and employ in his work, although it might be through contemptible instruments."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A letter was received in this city on the 10th inst., from Dr. William H. Burk, a member of the North Greenland Expedition of the Academy of Natural Sciences. Dr. Burk writes, that for about four days the Kite was engaged in a struggle to get through the ice pack in the Straits of Belle Isle, Sixth Month 16-20, but that she reached God Haven, Island of Disco, Greenland, on the 27th.

A despatch received from Arduore, Indian Territory, on the 11th inst., says that, under a recent decision of Judge Bryant, of the United States Court, at Paris, Texas, to the effect that it is not a violation of the law to sell or bring beer into the Territory, several saloons have been opened in Arlington, and that a great number of saloons which started in that country in less than three months if the United States Government does not take some action to stop it.

More recently, a despatch from Muskogee, Indian Territory, says that Indian Agent Bennett went to Ardmore to confiscate and destroy a carload of beer received at that place by a saloon keeper, following Judge Bryant's decision that the sale of beer was not prohibited in the Territory. Judge Shackelford, whose Court has been concurrent jurisdiction with Judge Bryant's, holds that beer is not excepted from the prohibition.

Minnesota Park Commissioner Brower, of Minnesota, has made a special report to the Governor upon the source of the Mississippi, showing that, instead of its being Lake Itaska, the true source "is in a great ultimate reservoir nine miles above Lake Itaska, making the longest surface channel of the Mississippi River, from the Gulf of Mexico to the extreme limit of this reservoir, 2555 miles."

A thick vein of high grade silver has been struck at Leadville, Colorado, within one block of the city's main business street.

The people of Ohio voted on the 11th inst., on five constitutional amendments, and a despatch from San Antonio says the returns indicate that all have been adopted. The amendments relate to ballot reform, the administration of school funds, limit the legal rate of interest to 10 per cent, or less, facilitate local prohibition, and provide additional courts and criminal trials.

The heavy hailstorm in Minnesota on the night of the 13th inst., covered an area about 10 miles long and from a half mile to a mile and a half in width, from Saug Rapids to Elk River, destroying all corn and standing grain in its path, and leveling the ground to a depth of two inches in some places.

The widow of James Knox Polk, the tenth President of the United States, died on the morning of the 14th inst., at her home in Nashville, Tenn., in the 88th year of her age.

James Russell, well known poet, writer and diplomatist, died early on the morning of the 12th inst., at his home, at Cambridge, Massachusetts, aged 72 years. Though he had been in failing health for a long time, his last illness was but of five weeks' duration.

George Jones, proprietor of the New York Travler, who had been seen in the city several times in the morning of the 12th inst., at Poland Springs, Maine, in the 50th year of his age. Through the exposures made in his paper, the famous Tweed ring in New York was broken up. It is alleged that George Jones refused one million of dollars offered him, if he would not make the exposure.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 532, which is 53 more than during the previous week, and 195 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing, 189 were under one year of age; 268 were males and 264 females; 87 died of cholera infantum; 43 of consumption; 42 of marasmus; 24 of typhoid; 26 of convulsions; 24 of inflammation of the brain; 21 of old age; 19 of casualties; 15 of pneumonia; 15 of inflammation of stomach and bowels; 15 of congestion of the brain; 14 of inanition; 11 of diphtheria; 10 of typhoid fever; 10 of cholera nostras; and 10 of hemorrhage.

Markets.—U. S. 4½, 100; 4's, 117½; currency 6½, 110 to 120.

COTTON was quiet and weak, on a basis of 5½ cts. per pound for middling uplands.

FEED.—Winter bran, in bulk, $17.00 a $17.50; spring, in do., $16.00 a $16.50.

FLOUR.—Western and Pennsylvania super, $3.75 a $3.90; do. do., extras, $4.00 a $4.25; No. 2 winter family, $4.25 a $4.50; Pennsylvania, roller, straight, $1.60 a $1.90; Western winter, clear, $1.50 a $1.75; do. do., straight, $1.75 a $1.15; winter patent, $5.00 a $5.40; do. do., $3.40; do. do., straight, $5.00 a $5.25; do. do., patent, $5.20 a $5.75. Rye flour was strong, and advanced in sympathy with the grain. Prices ranged from $1.50 to $4.76 per barrel, as to quality.

HONEY.—No. 2 red wood, $1.12½ a $1.13; do. No. 1, do. do., $1.13 a $1.14; No. 2 mixed cream, $1.13 a $1.14; No. 2 white, extra, 39 a 39½ cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extras, none here; good, 5½ a 5½ cts.; medium, 4½ a 5½ cts.; fair, 4½ a 4½ cts.; common, 3½ a 4½ cts.; culls, 3 a 3½ cts.; Texans, 3 a 4 cts.; fat cows, 2½ a 3½ cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extras, 5 a 5½ cts.; good, 4 a 4½ cts.; medium, 4 a 4½ cts.; common, 3½ a 3½ cts.; culls, 2½ a 3 cts.; lambs, 4½ a 5 cts.

HOGS.—Choice Western, 5½ a 5½ cts.; Com. Western, 5½ a 5 cts.

FOREIGN.—A London correspondent of the New York Herald says: "There is considerable cause for alarm over the enormous death rate of last year. Influenza seems to have left its mark of poison upon the world, and the death rate in London for the last six months is higher than was ever known since vital statistics have been officially recorded."

Enormous forest fires have been raging in the forests in the vicinity of Toulon, and a great quantity of valuable timber has been destroyed. A strong wind from the west has blown the water inland near the vicinity of the forests, though it is not believed that if great quantities were obtainable, it would have been of any use, as it was impossible for any human being to get anywhere near the conflagration, owing to the intense heat. The authorities were called upon to aid the residents in fighting the fires, and thousands of soldiers and sailors were employed in digging a trench around the burning section in order to stop them, which was ultimately successful.

A despatch from Brussels says: The Government of the Congo Free State intends to abolish the license tax on the sale of alcoholic liquor after December 1st.

On the 11th inst., a ukase was issued by Russia, prohibiting after the 27th inst., the exportation from that country of rye and rye meal of all kinds and brands.

The Ministry of Finance announces that the yield of rye is estimated at 711,000,000 poods, but that, owing to the present supplies being nearly exhausted, 924,000,000 poods will be required to supply the wants of the people and for sowing purposes. The deficit must be supplied by potatoes and maize.

A ukase has been issued directing the railroad officials throughout the country to give precedence over all other trains, passing to and from the distressed provinces.

Rye has risen eight shillings in Amsterdam, and both there and in Berlin it is decidedly dearer than wheat. On an average Germany imports 3,500,000 quarters from Russia, Holland 1,000,000 quarters, Italy 900,000 quarters, and Norway 200,000 quarters. A despatch from Shanghai, dated 17th inst., states that the foreign Ministers have been compelled to inform the Chinese Government that a joint naval demonstration of an effective nature, in which the French, American, British and German squadrons were to participate, will be ordered, unless speedy reparation is made for the injuries, outrages and abuses upon foreign residents in China.

Japan has built its "first" factory for the manufacture of woollen goods.

A despatch from the City of Mexico says that the eruption of the volcano at Colima is on a scale of magnitude never before observed. Ashes have fallen in Colima to a depth of from three to six inches, and streams of lava are flowing down the mountain, burning everything in their course.

A Halifax despatch says that advices from Labrador which state that the fishermen at Newfoundland had a catch of fish, say that the season so far has been a successful one.

Reports from all parts of the Province of Ontario state that the crops are the best in many years.

1820.—"Several weeks past have been a time of much stripping of all qualification for religious service. Such seasons are abundantly necessary for me, in order that I may, from real experience and feeling, become effectually convinced that He who puts forth his own sheep and goeth before them, is the only Source whence ability can be derived for any good word or work. Nothing so indelibly stamps the conviction of this, as the withdrawal of his sensible presence. When this is the case, our situation resembles Mount Gilboa, where David wished here might be neither dew nor rain, nor fields of offering. Those seasons would no doubt be hortened if we adhered faithfully to the Captain of our salvation. But how apt are we to become weary of a state in which all our building seems to be taken down, and all capacity that was heretofore furnished for the work seems to be almost lost. Were it not for a secret confidence in the Lord's unfailling goodness, the hope of its restoration must be entirely abandoned. He that walketh about as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour, is also not wanting in attempts, through his subtle insinuations, to destroy the love and unity which has been felt with the brethren, and which seems the only remaining ray to the tossed mind. But all bitterness and evil surmising must be purged out, and we brought to dwell under the covering of that charity which thinketh no evil, and enables to bear patiently the reproaches or unfavorable opinions of others.

"Until yesterday I had been silent in our meetings, nearly three months. My mind has not, through that period, been without encouraging and instructive openings, but I did not feel authorized to communicate them; although sometimes almost ready to conclude they were designed for others as well as myself. But carefully waiting for a satisfactory evidence of his, they have been gradually withdrawn, and the persuasion has generally remained that silence was properly my duty."

1821.—"Several days ago, I had some instructive conversation with my beloved father respecting the ministry, and the present very depressed state of our religious Society. The falling away among us of many, who have been divinely favored with gifts for the edification of the church, and perfecting the work assigned them, appeared to me to have produced a slight estimation of these gifts, and to create the opinion that very little dependence was to be placed upon those occupying this station; as such sorrowful evidence had been given of great instability in some who had made high profession, and preached much against the defects of others. He remarked that the degeneracy was not greater than among the Jews; and yet the prophets, by faithfulness to the Heavenly Leader, were enabled to stand their ground, and boldly declare against the corruptions of that day. That a gift in the ministry was more important than any other. By living in the gift, keeping daily under religious exercise, so as to be prepared to act whenever the gift opens any service, and in simplicity, without creaturely contrivance or adorning, yielding obedience thereto, we may experience a growth, and be instrumental in building up the waste places of Zion. On the other hand, if we keep not close to our gifts, we may miss a growth, and become the means of introducing a lifeless, windy ministry into the church, which may bring people into a form of godliness, but without the power."

1824.—"A woman Friend,* who came into our meeting [Yearly] in the afternoon, was extensively engaged in speaking to those members who had partaken, or were in danger of eating, of the fruit of the tree of unbelief. She related the case of a young man of very superior talents and advantages, who spent much time to ascertain and decide upon the religious principles he should adopt; when before he was aware, he had so imbibed the spirit of unbelief, that he became darkened and bewildered to that degree, his mind could settle upon no fixed principles. He adopted the infidel opinion that we are not bound to believe what we cannot comprehend; and then rejected the plain testimony of the Holy Scriptures, to the sacred, mysterious truths of the gospel of salvation, by our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. It pleased the Lord to lay him upon a bed of languishing. He lingered long, and finding himself destitute of all foundation for the hope of future happiness in the world to come, his state of mind became awful. Ardently desirous of some evidence upon which he could rest his hope of salvation, and yet utterly incapable of believing the unutterable truths he had so long accustomed himself to doubt or call in question, he was led at last fervently to pray, that the Lord would be pleased to grant him some assurance of his reality. After a long season of bitter conflict, his prayer was heard; his mind was furnished with a degree of the true faith, which is of the operation of the Spirit of God in the heart; which had once been tendered by it, and long since lost. Now he could receive the doctrines of the Scriptures, which had been to him as sealed with seven seals; and at his desire, they were frequently read to him, with some other religious books, I think she said, sometimes in the middle of the night. He became like a weaned child; all dependence upon reason, or any other power of his own, was utterly renounced, and as a newborn babe, he now received, with meekness, the engrafed Word, which is able to save the soul; rejoicing in the means which a gracious Creator has provided, as helps in the way and work of salvation, through faith in our Lord Jesus Christ.

"The false position which the young man had unwisely adopted, was controverted at large; and individuals in the meeting were feelingly and fervently labored with, to guard them against an evil heart of unbelief, and to convince them of the dangerous consequence of attempting to weaken the testimony of the Holy Scriptures, and thus destroy the faith of others, in the doctrines of life and salvation by Jesus Christ."

[In a letter to his brother Thomas, then absent from home, and which also contained an exercise he had felt on account of all his brothers and sisters, W. E. thus wrote:]

"I have been often led to reflect upon the many favors which have been conferred upon our family by a merciful and beneficent Creator. Although temporal riches have not fallen to our trust, yet a plentiful supply of the necessaries and comforts of life has been within our reach; and while these have been thus bestowed for our own accommodation, we have also possessed the means to fulfil the duties of social life, and to contribute to ameliorate the distressed condition of others. But above all these, are to be acknowledged the gifts of the Holy Spirit. Our parents being visited in early life by the Day-Spring from on high, and with sincerity of heart faithfully yielding to these visitations, were entrusted with precious gifts, not only designed for their blessing, but fitting them for exemplary usefulness in the Church of Christ. Through their faithfulness, in bearing the cross, and suffering with the despised followers of the Lamb, they have obtained an honorable station in the church; ruled well in their own family, and by their example and precepts, have placed a weight of religious obligations upon us, their children. Where much is given much will be required. He who has thus signally favored us with such valuable parents, as well as with spiritual gifts, will look for fruits in their season; and if we are not found in the footsteps of Christ's companions, no natural connections, nor descent from virtuous parents, will remedy the defect, or be admitted as an excuse. It will be useless to imagine that the faithfulness of dedicated parents will preserve us from the evils that abound in the world, or shield us from neglect of the means put into our hands, from the just and awful inquisition for the use we have made of our Lord's goods. I often feel desirous we may lay these things deeply to heart; that being convinced of the indispensable necessity of dedicating ourselves wholly to the Lord's service; and under the sense of our continued need of Divine preservation, we may in humility and reverence, implore Him from day to day, for fresh supplies of his Holy Spirit, to enable us to follow Him in the regeneration, and to fill with propriety whatever station He may design for us in his church. Being thoroughly washed and purged from every defilement, we should thus become living, experimental witnesses of the efficacy of his Grace; and prepared in truth to declare to others, what our eyes had seen and our hands had handled of the good Word of life. May we then, my dear brother, not seeking to adorn ourselves in any manner with what has been dispensed for our stewardship, but in true humility of heart, seek the Lord's honor above everything else; and then He will continue the blessing which rested upon the head of Joseph, unto the utmost bound of the everlasting hills."

"After the decease of my dear wife, I continued unmarried between nine and ten years; during which I passed through many dispensations, designed, I trust, to promote my growth in the work of salvation, and prepare me for the service to which the Lord would call me in his church."

"My thoughts having been drawn towards my beloved friend, Elizabeth Barton, a minister, daughter of John and Rebecca Barton, with a view of proposing our marriage, the prospect of entering again into the marriage covenant, was not less serious than in the former union; and brought me into strong desire to do nothing but what was according to the Lord's will; often looking to Him for evidence of the propriety of such a movement; which I believe was also her sincere concern."

[He was married to the aforesaid Elizabeth Barton, on the twenty-third day of the Twelfth Month, 1824; upon which he records: "We were favored with a solid satisfactory meeting, under a sense of the owing presence of our blessed Lord and Master."

1826.—[In the Yearly Meeting of this year W. E. thus spoke on the character, value and place of the Holy Scriptures:]

"There was no religious Society that had a more just estimate of the character and value of the Scriptures than the Society of Friends. That although we did not call them the Word of God, because that title belonged to our Lord Jesus Christ, yet we believed that holy men of God wrote and spoke them as they were moved by the Holy Ghost; and the more we were under the influence and government of that Grace and Truth, which came and comes by Jesus Christ, the more we should value them. I stated, as an evidence of the high estimate set upon them by our Society, that we had a rule of discipline, that any one denying the Divine authority of the Holy Scriptures, was subject to disownment, if he could not be brought to acknowledge his error." "They are profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction and instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works; being able to make wise unto salvation, through faith, which is in Christ Jesus. In proportion to the various means dispensed in inscrutable wisdom and unmerited mercy, for our aid in the work of salvation, through the Holy Spirit, would be our responsibility; and at some period, an awful account must be rendered for the use of them."

[The following Article, published in The Evening Standard, of New Bedford, has been sent us by a correspondent. The "Summary of doctrines" which it quotes from William Howitt, cannot be regarded as a complete list, although correct so far as it goes.—Ed.]

The Society of Friends.

"Remove not the ancient landmark which thy fathers have set."

It is now quite generally known that a serious innovation is being made upon the ancient order of this branch of the Christian Church, having begun several years ago in the western portion of the society, but to some extent it has already found an acceptance in some of the smaller meetings in New England. The attention of the writer has been particularly called to this subject from a letter published in THE FRIEND, Philadelphia, for Fifth Mo. 30th, from an aged member of the old order, such as was established by George Fox and William Penn, and their faithful representatives of later days, wherein he says: "It is very hard for me to give up the assembling of myself at the old house of worship where for many years I have been wont to go; but I must either listen to a man-made minister, or remain at home in my humble cottage."

He adds, among other grievances, that "some of the members are desirous of having an organ, and a part of the meeting has engaged a minister to preside over them as a pastor."

It is plain to be seen how subversive this is of the long established simplicity of the society.

The following is a summary of the doctrines of the early Friends, as given by the late William Howitt, in an article on "George Fox and his contemporaries."

"The living influence of the Divine Spirit on the spirit of his creatures."

"The spirituality of Christianity; consequently the non-essentiality of ceremonies."

"The civil and religious freedom of all men; and consequently, an abhorrence of all tyranny—political or ecclesiastical; in the shape of the despot or the priest."

"The anti-Christianity of war."

"The free gift of the gospel; consequently an abhorrence of hirelings."

"The equality of the sexes; no sex in souls—all are one in Christ Jesus; consequently elevating woman to the highest sphere of honor, usefulness and felicity."

"Simplicity in language, in manners and in dress."

In a strict adherence to these principles, the early Friends wearied out oppression, suffering greatly for conscience's sake until they established themselves in the confidence of their native land, and subsequently in our own. It must also be plain to be seen how great will be the loss when a successful introduction of principles and customs which so militate with these fundamental doctrines shall take place. The true way as it appears to others who have expressed their opinions on the subject, as well as Friends, would be, for those who are desirous of having the ordinances and a paid ministry, to join some denomination where these are established, and far more perfect in their execution than the humble attempts already made. A greater objection even, is, the want of a proper regard for the conscientious adherence to the ancient order in the society by those who suffer in consequence of these intrusions. When it comes to a question of property, it is doubtless that the title to it must remain with those who maintain the doctrines and principles of Friends in their primitive simplicity.

D. R.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Visit to Arizona by a Travelling Ornithologist.

On the afternoon of Sixth Month 9th, I took train from El Paso, and after a quick climb of a mile or two up the Rio Grande, suddenly swerved to the left, and crossing a high iron bridge, began to thread the devious mazes of that far-famed river, where it strikes westward into New Mexico.

We continued to do this, with frequent short cuts across some lofty mesa, among the mountains, now rising, now descending, yet never abandoning the general trend of the great water course until it could avail us no longer, and then across the plains and low-lying mesas of New Mexico till sun setting. We were not permitted to see Arizona by the light of that day and ere the train reached Lordsburg, had severally settled down for the long and troublous night.

It was scarce dawn when the train stopped at Tucson, and I who had been for an hour passing to compare this new country with the one so lately left, from platform and car window stepped out on the front porch of the San Xavier Hotel. That seems to be the way in these lands, and the transition from train to hotel, where they charge in proportion to convenience is so easy, that poverty alone prevents the jaded traveller from accepting anything they have on any terms. The sleepy office clerk opens the yawning front doors, the retiring hackman and runner raise their voices there is a low shuffling of steps, banging of baggage and slamming of the bus door, and as I listen to the roll of wheels and distant puff of the departing train, I am again mindful that this is Tucson, that it is nearly four o'clock, and that I am sitting alone on the San Xavier porch waiting for day.

As the colors brightened in the mountainous east, defining against a glorious background the serried peaks and undulations of a hundred mile semicircle, I forgot every discomfort in the wish that some friend could share with me the scene and all its accompaniments. By this time it was daylight enough to see that the Southern Pacific railroad just grazed the eastern edge of the city, and that I had been looking across an immense plain, treeless, scantily covered with desert plants and low mesquite, stretching endlessly north and south, and abruptly terminating in the east at the foot of the mountains. Here, as if protected by the railroad, were crowded quite a little hamlet of adobe houses, dug outs, and bough huts of the Mexicans and Chinese.

West of the railroad the plain descends by easy gradients and terraces to the valley of the Santa Cruz River, and here reposes and stretches lengthly the city, the suburbs, the ranches and gardens of wicked Tucson. The Santa Cruz in its best estate, which means at this time of the year, is equivalent to a smaller Eastern Creek, yet, nevertheless, it is put to such good use by the Chinamen and Mexicans, and is so cleverly manipulated by every lover of water in and out of town, that to it, more than everything put together, and the railroad thrown in beside, does Tucson owe her existence. This means, of course, that it don't rain in Tucson very often. A ranchman near the city said, "it generally rained, 'sure,' twice in the year."

One of these "sure" rains occurred last year, and the Santa Cruz behaved itself like a maniac, widening its traditional river bed from an average of ten and twenty feet to over a hundred, and cutting a gorge that wide and ten feet deep straight through the fertile plantations and

ERRATA.—In the piece headed "The Farmer of Tucker's Lane," published on p. 28 of the last number of THE FRIEND, there was a misprint on the first line of the sixth stanza. Instead of saying, "And when we assembled," &c., it should have read, "And when we assembled," &c.

gardens of the valley. This, of course, transcends the memory of Tucson's oldest squatter, but is a very little thing compared with the ragaries of the Rio Grande and Colorado this year. Altogether, rain in these arid regions is not the beautiful, blessed gift we would naturally think it to be. The people here dread a thunder-storm, not because of lightning, but because it means suffocating heat; for the same reason they deplore a cloudy sky, preferring to be fried in an open sunshine than roasted in a slow oven, and I know from experience, how rational their judgments are.

The eastern migration of Chinese along the northern borders of the United States makes quite a pause at Tucson, and it is not till he gets here that the Southern Pacific traveller begins to find "John" in his role par excellence, the agriculturist, or rather, as applied to this country, horticulturist and trucker. Possibly one-third of the ten and twenty acre gardens of Santa Cruz Valley are owned and worked by Chinamen either individually, or in communities of five to ten persons. What is most interesting to the stranger is the fact that they till these grounds in true oriental style, and with such implements, and in such costumes as we often see depicted on the fans and other wares that come to us from China and Japan. Here can be seen the great wide hoses wielded by men in scanty clothing, shaded by those strange basin-shaped hats, others carrying in double wicker baskets slung across the shoulder from a pole the newly gathered vegetables, and others with great dexterity and concerted movements, hand-weeding the crowded rows of cabbages, celery, onions, beets, peas and what-not that grow here with such luxuriance and threefold productiveness as compared with ours. Side by side with these are the Mexican farmers, some of them in the same business, others raising alfalfa, oats, corn and wheat, with which to feed their stock in a time when pasture fails. These present another realistic picture, that of agriculture as practised by the ancients in Egypt and Palestine. As one views this valley scene from some point of vantage in the surrounding mountains, it suggests a thousand bible texts relating to the every day life and pastoral joys and customs of the Hebrews. Despite the march and conflict of centuries of conquest, civilization, science and the myriad forces which man has called to his aid since then, behold here in this New World of ours on the verge of this new century of ours, an American city fed by the products of an husbandry and herdsmanship such as David saw and sang about from the walls of Zion, and the time-honored Confucius taught his people five centuries before the Christian era! Tucson, with the exception of a few brick buildings, is mainly built of adobe one-story houses of the severe rectangular pattern, wearisome enough to the sight-seeing traveller, but, as I have proved, wonderfully cool and comfortable within, and singularly adapted to people's needs in such a climate. In one of these I spent ten days' of my stay in Arizona, while collecting birds in that vicinity. From here I took stage for Oracle, forty miles distant, the site of an abandoned gold mine in the live-oak foothills of the Carolina mountains. Oracle is now a post-hamlet of four or five families, whose ranches are so far apart that it seems ludicrous to call it by any name at all. However, at Dodge's Ranch, where I made a fortnight's stay, there was a bona-fide post-office, where the stage daily exchanged mail bags to the no small interest of the dozen boarders who had come up here to breathe the rare dry air of a 4,000 feet elevation. The stage ride to Oracle takes you over a country very similar to that passed through in travelling from El Paso to Deming. Vast level tracts stretching away toward the mountains, covered sometimes thickly with chapparal, in the dry water-courses, then rising again into slightly rolling tracts bare of anything green save the cacti of various species, which here attain a variety and magnitude of growth unequalled elsewhere in the United States. Up to three thousand feet elevation the giant cactus here finds its congenial home, often raising its green flower-crested shaft thirty feet into the air without a branch or curvature to mar its symmetry; and again you see them assuming the most fantastic shapes, sending out from the main trunk great fleshy arms a foot through, which rise up in ponderous curves from opposite sides of the shaft, reminding one of huge Roman candlesticks; or again, with horizontal arms like a cross, or with dependent arms, reminding one of some dismantled statue from the ruins of ancient Greece. With the most careless eye one can count ten or fifteen species of cacti on the road from Tucson to Oracle. And if he travels at this time of the year will have the added pleasure of seeing them robed in the most gorgeous yellow, red, purple and white bloom.

The animal life of the arid regions can nowhere be better observed than in cross-country staging, especially if you ride in an open vehicle as I did. Despite the apparent barrenness and lack of food, the ground everywhere is fairly honeycombed with the burrows of myriads of rodents of wonderful variety, including several hundred species of rats, mice, shrews, gophers, squirrels and rabbits; skunks, weazels, foxes and wolves, badgers, armadillos, and racoons, haunt those places in profusion; and when we add to these a list of reptiles, which for beauty, size and form, not only outranks, but outnumber that of any other locality in the States, it is scarce to be wondered at that a naturalist gladly risks so much here in making their acquaintance. The ornithology of Arizona is quite as unique as its mammalian life, there being scarce a score of species found here that go farther north or east of the territory, and many that cannot be found anywhere else than in Mexico. Arizona is the home par-excellence of strictly insectivorous birds. Nowhere else are the wrens and flycatchers found in such great variety, and as may be inferred, insect life is extremely abundant. Indeed we may safely attribute to this fact the reason so much animal life can be supported in a semi-desert country.

The road between Tucson and Oracle is typical of much of the western country roads, hard as a pavement, generally smooth, and unless a very windy day, not even dusty. After a drive of fifteen miles we came to the first watering-place, where was a sheep ranch and some adobe houses, and an engine-house, where the water was being pumped from a two hundred feet well into immense tanks, for the cattle of that district. Over the watering trough a sign telling us that the water here was worth "two bits," or twenty-five cents per barrel, and ten cents a head for stock made me hesitate for a moment as I jumped out the back of the stage and contemplated the overflowing tanks, but seeing the Mexican driver and his companion fall to without paying, I took a free and plentiful drink, and found it very pure and cold. After slow uphill driving for about thirty-seven miles, we reached the first scattering trees of the live oak belt, and found the country more hilly, and with huge conglomerate boulders heaped about the slopes and scattered over the plain, and after two miles more of that sort of country we reached our destination, after an eight hour journey not soon to be forgotten.

SEVENTH PROPOSITION.

The fulfilment of the promise—"This includes the atonement, to be testified in due time, which even the twelve apostles could not understand till after Christ's death, and therefore were not able openly and understandingly to proclaim till after the Holy Spirit was given."

God speaks to us in his Son, whom He appointed heir of all things; through whom also He made the worlds; who, being the effulgence of his glory and the very image of his substance, and upholding all things by the word of his power,—when He had made purification of sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on High, &c. (Heb. 1: 1, 4.)

Whosoever plan the minds of men contrive, the greater its importance, the more needful that the same mind must continue to carry out the object in view, &c. God creating man and placing him in a world like this, with all his susceptibilities and faculties, and with his free will of choice to choose between two potent powers—is it not needful that He, in his omnipresent wisdom, should direct, through Christ, our every progressive step in being prepared for a world from whence no traveller returns?

It was the same that ascended who also descended down into the lower parts of the earth, who is to be the Teacher of his own dispensation; for He hath dispense now even as we are made willing to become renewed or transformed in the spirit of our minds.

No man putteth new wine into old wine-skins, else the new wine will burst the skins and itself will be spilled, and the skins will perish. But new wine must be put into fresh wine-skins.—As the natural man comprehended not the things of the Spirit of God, and cannot understand them (so the natural man is compared to old wine-skins); because they are spiritually discerned. Hence the new wine-skins signify the new birth, wherein righteousness dwells. Wherefore Christ's first ministry was that of repentance and faith. Life must always precede knowledge of its own nature; thus we will find definitely explicated in Christ's own mode of teaching—"who has left us an example that we should follow his steps." His teaching in the beginning was in complete harmony with the moral law and its mode of teaching; He taught in parables, and without a parable did He not teach. These were all natural illustrations, illustrating spiritual realities, whilst his deepest spiritual teaching was personal to a single individual,—the new birth to Nicodemus; true spiritual worship to the woman at Jacob's well; manifesting that He did not cast his pearls broadcast to swine. And finally, when his disciples had been taught both in public, and privately have the parables explained, till his close drew near, He began to tell them that He must suffer many things and be rejected by the Jews and crucified: when Peter answered, such a thing shall not happen unto Thee. We may well query here, did Peter not believe Moses and the prophets? Yes, he did believe, for he could boldly answer when the voice came to him from Heaven, "never has anything common or unclear entered into my mouth." He was in the child's state; his spiritual faculties were not yet developed so as fully to comprehend the Divine mystery; and therefore he spoke as a child. O, how often we do in like manner misjudge that which is yet above and beyond our present developed capacity of judgment to grasp! We do not want to be unclothed, but clothed upon; to be unclothed is a continuous work, "for even we who have the first fruit—even we, grown within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body." What was Paul when in that state, where there was "no condemnation" (Rom. viii) to be delivered from? Why did Christ upon the cross cry out, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" The answer was given by George Fox, "that at that time the sins of the whole world were laid upon Him," and the Apostle says, "He bare our sins in his own body upon the tree."

The susceptibility to temptation which was in Adam, before he fell, is ever found in all the saints till the last breath. Consider it well.—The higher the mark, the greater the rage of the devil; the greater efforts by all manner of subtle, insidious temptations, belittling Divine realities, as if they were but small things—little consequence—whether done or neglected; yet, how shall we escape if we neglect so great a salvation? Friends, how shall we escape, if we continue to let our vineyard remain covered with briars?—living, as it were in our "piled houses" of empty high profession?—The pure life is always fruitful. "If ye abide in me and I in you, ye shall bear much fruit." "Abide" is to have the mind continually centred upon God; it is the casting out of the strong man, the spoiling of all his goods. Attonement in its twofold and its complete meaning, is not complete until the last breath is taken and the soul returns to God who gave it. Attonement in the Christian dispensation, in its outward and strictly literal meaning, is a subject of the greatest interest to the truly enlightened and developed mind, as it has so large a foundation in the sacred writings of Moses and the prophets, of the apostles, and of Christ himself, who declared to the two on the way to Emmaus, "O, foolish men and slow of heart, to believe all that the prophets have spoken! behoved it not that Christ should suffer these things and enter into his glory;" and beginning from Moses and from all the prophets, he interpreted to them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself." How definite and conclusive is the testimony of Jesus to the existing harmony of all the inspired writings. The Old Testament was written by the holy men of old—Christ speaking through them concerning himself; God's commandments to Moses, of the sacrificial law, was but a more definite specification of pre-existing sacrificial laws from Abel's and Cain's offerings. Who but God moved righteous Abel to offer?—while to Cain He said: "If thou dost well, shalt thou not be accepted?" So we may learn that "sacrifice" apart from well doing was never acceptable to God. Therefore sacrifice, in its full sense, definitely includes resisting evil. With every right act, with every good motive, assuredly follows temptation; if the devil cannot wholly hinder a good work, he spares no pains to mar it on the wheels, that it may become a vessel of less usefulness.

That which is complete, must contain the fullness of all it is to represent. Christ, in the fullness of time, was sent from God fully to represent God in his fullness of love and mercy, no less than his righteousness and judgment. If there is no penalty attached to a law, there can be no fear of transgressing the law. Hence, without righteousness and judgment, all would be lawless. Further, if men could themselves atone or make satisfaction for one sin, they could atone for all at any time. Sin would be free without limitation, when man himself could atone at any time; man would be independent. But now, the nearer we approach God's holiness, the clearer is our sight and sense of our entirely dependent, stripped and naked condition: thus bringing the creature into subjection to himself. God is never the author of confusion; but of peace;—but peace is never attained but through sacrifices innumerable. The sacrifice made for us without, was a whole life of sacrifice, exemplifying the continual conflict between light and darkness, culminating in the death upon the cross.

Oh, that this one lesson might be impressed upon the mind of the serious reader; that, believing in God, in the complete meaning of the phrase, is one continual present attitude to God, the mind and spirit in continual felt fellowship with God! As the devil cannot rest, however fruitless his efforts may be, he will tempt, he will afflict; but to be tempted and afflicted, includes, oh, how much work: to subdue, to control, to think, and to pray is work; every mental effort is work. We thus work where we believe;—therefore faith and work are inseparable in the Divine dispensation of grace. Spiritual life depends upon it as much as the natural life and health on food and work. "It is my meat to do, the will of Him who sent me." There is nothing insignificant in the Divine economy of grace; neither is there anything burdensome to the truly awakened soul; every yoke is easy, every burden is light. The burden of the word of the Lord is only against sin—the sacrifice for sin, in its complete sense, brings peace. Therefore Christ's burden is light;—Christ's death upon the cross of Calvary was the completion of his atoning sacrifice for the sins of the whole world—embracing all. Therefore, to as many as receive Him in his completeness, to them He gives power to become the sons of God. This attonement includes his universal enlightenment, He being the true Light, &c.

"God, having of old time spoken to the fathers in the prophets by divers portions and in divers manners, hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in his Son." This language has its two-fold application. First, its literal outward fulfilment, as testified of by the Apostle. Second, its spiritual, progressive development in our individual experience of knowing "sin to rule from Adam to Moses"—the age of childhood; and oh, with how many that kind of childhood lasts through life, that our natural likes and dislikes are judge supreme in all our acts, even in Church discipline—the true Light all the time shining in the darkness with its unseen powerful effect in constraining and restraining, although we be ignorant of it, unbelieving, disobedient to Him that worketh all and in all. "All that makes manifest is light;" it is Christ, the mediator between God and man, that acts and moves; the second Adam became a life-giving Spirit, as all things are not only created by Him, but exist by Him. Man can never become anything beyond what his god-given faculties can be developed to attain to. The performance of the sacrificial law, under its own dispensation and in its strictest rigor, could not give peace even to David when he sinned; for, in his 51st Psalm, he cries out, "Create in me a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within me," &c.

If this was the experience of him who looked forward to Christ's death and suffering with prophetic vision, is there more leniency toward sin now? "The law could not make the comers unto it perfect; but what the law could not do, being weak," (as continually exemplified even by David committing actual sin to-day and repenting to-morrow,) God did, by sending his own Son, whom it behooved to be made like unto his brethren, that He might be a merciful and faithful High Priest in things pertaining to God, to make propitiation for the sins of the people.

A TWILIGHT STORY.

"Auntie, will you tell a story?" said my little niece of three,
As the early winter twilight fell around us silently,
So I answered to her pleading: "Once, when I was very small,
With my papa and my mamma I went out to make a call;
And a lady, pleased to see us, gave me quite a large bouquet,
Which I carried homeward proudly, smiling all along the way.
"Soon I met two other children, clad in rags and sad of face,
Who grew strangely, wildly joyous, as I neared their standing-place.
'Twas so good to see the flowers! 'Give us one,—oh, one!' they cried,
But I passed them without speaking; left them with their wish denied.
Yet the memory of their asking haunted me by night and day.
'Give us one!' I heard them saying, even in my mirthful play.
"Still I mourn, because in childhood I refused to give a flower;
Did not make those others happy when I had it in my power."
Suddenly I ceased my story. Tears were in my niece's Tears of tenderness and pity—while she planned a sweet surprise:
"I will send a flower to-morrow to those little children dear."
Could I tell her that their childhood had been gone this many a year?

HE CHOSE THIS PATH FOR THEE.

T. H. WILLSON.

He chose this path for thee,
No feeble chance, no hard, relentless fate,
But love, his love, hath placed thy footsteps here.
He knew the way was rough and desolate,
Knew how thy heart would often sink with fear;
Yet tenderly He whispered, "Child, I see
This path is best for thee."
He chose this path for thee,
Though well He knew sharp thorns would tear thy feet;
Knew how the brambles would obstruct the way;
Knew all the hidden dangers thou wouldst meet;
Knew how thy faith would falter day by day,
And still the whisper echoed, "Yes, I see
This path is best for thee."
He chose this path for thee,
And well he knew that thou must tread alone
His gloomy vales and ford each flowing stream;
Knew how thy bleeding heart would sobbing moan,
"Dear Lord, to wake and find it all a dream."
Love scanned it all, yet still could say, "I see
This path is best for thee."

He chose this path for thee,
What need'st thou more? This sweeter truth to know
That all along these strange bewildering ways,
O'er rocky slopes, and where dark rivers flow,
His loving arms will bear thee "all the days."
A few steps more and thou thyself shalt see
This path is best for thee.

The Proper Use of Wealth.

The article from the pen of Andrew Carnegie under the caption "Gospel of Wealth," has attracted attention on both sides of the Atlantic, and elicited criticisms, generally favorable, from some of the most eminent statesmen, divines and philanthropists of the world.

Some of A. Carnegie's positions will be briefly stated. They are intended to apply to millionaires who control a large surplus, and only in a limited degree to those who possess a mere competence.

"There are but three modes in which surplus wealth can be disposed of. It can be left to heirs, or bequeathed for public purposes, or administered by its possessor during life." The first is pronounced to be most injudicious. When left to the eldest son it is that the vanity of the parents may be gratified by the thought that his name and title may be transmitted to succeeding generations. "If great fortunes are left to children from affection it is misguided affection. Children should not be so burdened. Moderate sources of income may be provided for the wife and daughters, and very moderate allowances, if any, for the sons. It is no longer questionable that great sums bequeathed often work more for the injury than the good of the recipients."

As an illustration that appears pertinent, the writer will state that some years ago he was in company with a number of the old residents of Pittsburgh who had been canvassing the history of the wealthy families of that city, and the conclusion was that only an average of one in thirty of the sons of such families who inherited wealth were able to retain it and become useful members of society. Most of them became idle drones addicted to vicious habits. This result is not surprising, for the most powerful stimulus to industry, sobriety and economy is removed from the sons of the rich.

Carnegie's second mode of disposing of wealth by bequests for public uses, is considered applicable to those who are contented to wait until they are dead before becoming of any use to the world. "No man is to be extolled for doing that which he cannot help doing. He would not have left it at all, if he could have taken it with him."

It is recommended that the State should tax estates heavily at death to mark its condemnation of the selfish millionaire's unworthy life; beginning at nothing upon moderate sums and increasing even to fifty per cent. on the millionaire's hoard.

The last and best use of wealth is for the possessor to administer it himself during his life, and the duty of the man of wealth is tersely expressed by Carnegie.

"First, to set an example of modest, unostentatious living, shunning display or extravagance; or provide moderately for the legitimate wants of those dependent upon him; and after doing so, to consider all surplus revenues which come to him simply as trust funds, which he is called upon to administer, and strictly bound as a matter of duty to administer in the manner which, in his judgment, is best calculated to reduce the most beneficial results for the community; the man of wealth thus becoming the mere trustee and agent for his poorer brethren, bringing to their service his superior wisdom, experience, and ability to administer, doing for them better than they could do for themselves."

The practice of indiscriminate charity is strongly condemned, and the assertion made that it were better for mankind that the millions of the rich were thrown into the sea than so spent as to encourage the drunken, the slothful and the unworthy; also that one hundred and fifty dollars out of every one thousand usually expended in charity is spent unwisely. The only proper charity is to help those who will help themselves, to assist but never to do all, "alms-giving more frequently rewards vice than relieves virtue."

"The day is not far distant when the man who dies leaving behind him millions of available wealth, which was free for him to administer during his life, will pass away unwept, unhonored and unsung, no matter to what use he leaves the dross which he cannot take with him. Of such as these the public verities will then be: The man who dies thus rich, dies disgraced."—Church Union.

The Christian Cynosure in a recent number publishes a letter written by Dr. James C. Jackson, of North Adams, Mass., to his friend Grace W. Clark, of Detroit, which contains some sentiments that may suggest profitable reflection to our readers. We copy from it the following paragraph:—

"I am glad whenever I think of it that I have lived, and that by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ I have been able to live for others. I have not a consciousness in a single instance of having sought to live at the expense of another person. It has always given me more delight and greater comfort to live for others than to live for myself, and to give my time and strength to others at my own expense, rather than to save my strength to others' loss. Still under a close review of my life of the way in which I have spent it and the results which visibly have come from it, were I able to begin it over again with the benefits of my past experience, I would never live as I have lived. I would start out on and after a plan marked by a very much greater simplicity of personal habits and associations. I would make my body to hold a subjected relation to my spirit; I would eat, drink, work, sleep after such form and manner as would give me freedom of action. I would have time and place and opportunity for communion with Jesus Christ, and through him, and through him alone, with God, and through him intermediately with his Saints in Light, and through him communally with my fellow-men. To do this I might have to wear clothes as plain and unfashionable as he wore; and I might have to become a wandering evangelist, going about and proclaiming glad tidings; or I might be located in a house and very comfortably situated; or I might be like a hermit in his cave or cell. How my conditions might be would have to be determined by the effects which they would be likely to have on my liberty of person, and the influence upon my growth in the Divine life, for in my present conceptions of life, a life of bodily indulgence, of large worldly mindedness, of intense personal selfishness, is not worth the having. When one has enjoyed it and it has passed, there is no pleasure in its recollections nor no comfort in its memory. It is a cheat, a falsity, a wretched dream. It gives no satisfaction. Human experience in this direction is uniform in its testimony. So were I to begin life over again, knowing what I know, I would start out to win my crown on a basis of endeavor originating in entirely different conceptions of what life to a human spirit ought to be, might be, can be.

I am glad to be able to tell you that I am living in very rich conceptions of heaven, of its blessedness, of the happiness of its people, and of Christ their living head."

My Protege.—A True Incident.

BY LEIGH YOUNG.

My wanderings not long ago led me to a certain State capital, where I spent some time visiting under the shadow of the prison walls. The great, high stone building obstructed the sunlight from house and garden, and cast its shadow far and wide over hearts and homes in all parts of the country. A pitiful sight it was to see those inmates passing back and forth at their work, shut in, not by the hand of God, but by their own act.

But, however justice may demand expiation, one's heart must be made of adamant if he does not feel for the sorrow that is inclosed behind those bolts and bars. It was in the spring-time, when the resurrection is everywhere going on, when the earth begins to bud and blossom, and the new life is springing in one's veins, I was walking in the grounds inhaling the sweet breath that the violets bring, when turning a corner of the house I saw a workman busy with his tools. He was setting the steps for the side veranda, and the odor of the freshly-turned earth was sweet and spring-like.

"It is good to work out-of-doors such a day as this, is it not?" I said to him; "it is a shame for one to stay in-doors this delightful weather." But as I spoke my eye fell on the striped garb he wore, which proclaimed that he was come from behind those high stone walls, and I could have bitten my tongue for the want of tact in my address.

Leaning his arm on his axe, and looking up at the blue arch above us, he said, sadly: "Ay, madam, the smell of the fields is sweet, but you can never know how sweet until you are shut away from it. I would that I might be out-of-doors; I should not mind what or how hard the work was;" and with one last glance at the mountains which girt in the little town he turned again to his hammering.

"How much longer have you to serve, my poor fellow?" I asked.

"Ah, madam," he answered, "nine was a life sentence."

"A life sentence!" I gasped in horror, as I looked at the young, strong, firmly-knit figure before me, and thought of his going from youth to middle life, then down to old age, inside those prison walls.

"It is not the work I mind," he continued, as if glad of some one to whom he could speak; "one can bear it through the day-time; but to lie in your cell through the long hours of the night, hear the bells strike for the hours, and know that life holds nothing else for you, that there is no hope until God gives you release at last, after so long years it may be, that is what makes it so hard to bear."

Involuntarily I held out my hand to him, for I could not speak. He grasped it heartily, the dull monotony of his tone changed, while the settled melancholy on his face brightened as he said, in a voice tremulous with emotion:

"God bless you for your kind words, the first I have heard for many a day."

Just then Captain Tyler turned the corner, and the prisoner instantly turned to his work.

"Can nothing be done for him?" I asked the captain in the evening.

"No," he said; "nothing now; it was an aggravated case. The governor may pardon him after a while, but just now there is nothing."

"But is there nothing I can do myself?" I said.

"You may send him some tobacco to smoke if you like," was the answer. "That is what they all crave beyond every thing."

Needless to say, though I am no advocate of smoking, that I procured the tobacco, and sent him a package the next day.

"Do the prisoners have no time off from work?" was my next query.

"O, yes," he replied; "the work-shop closes at 6, but by 6.30 they are locked in for the night; and then they have the Sundays, of course."

"But all these long, hot evenings it seems horrible to be shut up so; it is not dark until after 8; can they see to read?"

"Yes, when they are so fortunate as to have anything to read?"

"Well, may I not send M'Leod a book? Surely there would be no objection to that?"

"None in the world, if you would like to do it; and it would be a real charity."

I had just been reading Mr. Edward Everett Hale's exquisite story, In His Name, and procuring a good print Bible, I gave them to Captain Tyler to deliver for me."

"May I send the lady a note, captain?" he said, when the package was handed to him.

"Better not," said the captain; "I will tell her how you thank her."

"No," said the poor boy, for he was little more; "no one can tell her that; it is like a drop of water to a perishing soul;" and he fairly broke down.

"Has M'Leod any friends?" I asked, the day I was leaving town.

"I don't think so," was the answer; "for I never heard of his receiving any letters or boxes from outside as the other prisoners do."

"Why, can you send them boxes?" I asked.

"Why, certainly, if there is any one who cares enough for them to do it. Why, there is not a day that the express wagon does not drive up to the prison."

"And M'Leod never has had one; well, he shall now, for I will send it; but what shall I put in it?"

"Any thing that you would send to a boy who is away at school—biscuit, ham, etc."

"Biscuit!" I said; "why, I want to send something nice."

"Well," he said, laughing, "if you had ever seen prison fare you would not speak in such a tone of biscuit. Why, they would be nectar and ambrosia to the poor fellow, especially if you put butter on them. But if you want to do the most good to your protegee send him a lamp and some oil, for the winter nights are awfully long in the solitude and the darkness, and your books will do him little good if he cannot see to read them."

"He shall have them all?" I said.

And my first care when I reached my home was my prison box. The substantial part was first attended to; and then the loose magazines that were lying about the house, the illustrated papers which are so plentiful in every family, and which once read are never looked at again—all these I gathered up and packed off to "my protegee," as Captain Tyler called him.

This time the note came in response, and that note is cherished as one of my richest treasures, which nothing could buy from me, and would far more than repay ten times the amount of trouble which I had taken.

From time to time I still have a word from inside those prison walls; for with hard labor my protegee is expiating his crime. Whether pardon will come to him in this life I do not know, but I am hoping and praying that the message of God's love may come home to his heart, and secure him an inheritance where the expiation of One has fulfilled all the law's demands, and where crime and punishment are unknown.—Christian Advocate.

Western Quarterly Meeting.

A beloved Friend having invited me to accompany him on a visit to the Western Quarterly Meeting held at London Grove, in Chester Co., Pa., on the 21st of the Eighth Month, we left West Chester early in the morning. A breeze from the South, and a covering of clouds overhead which sheltered us from the direct rays of the sun, made the day a pleasant one for our journey. The frequent showers had preserved the greenness of the fields, and the rolling country over which we passed gave frequent views that were extensive and refreshing.

By the roadside the Day Flower, (Commelyna Virginica) was in unusual abundance, and its bright, but delicate blue blossoms interested us much, as did also the light yellow flowers of the unspotted Touch-Me-Not, (Impatiens Pallida). This plant is so named because of the nature of its seed vessels, which are formed of five valves, that when ripe separate from each other suddenly, and coil themselves, so as to widely scatter the seeds.

Another showy plant was a species of wild sun-flower, (Helianthus) covered with numerous flowers of a bright yellow color, similar in shape to those of the cultivated plant, but smaller. Scattered along the banks on the roadside were a number of small plants, consisting, as we saw them, of slender stems without leaves, and covered with white blossoms arrayed in a spiral, and reminding one of a cork-screw. Its popular name is Lady's Tresses, (Spiranthes Gracilis).

In our ride, we crossed both branches of the Brandywine, a short distance above the place where they unite; and passed near the patch of serpentine barrens, in which a vein of corundum has been worked for some years. The Old Friends' Meeting-house at Marlborough was situated a little south of the road we travelled. Indeed, much of this, as well as other parts of Chester County, were originally settled by Friends, but the church was sadly devastated by the irroad upon her doctrines attending the preaching and influence of Elias Hicks, so that many of her meetings could no longer be kept up, and those that were, were much diminished in membership.

Western Quarterly Meeting has been much affected by the death and sickness of valuable members, but it still contains a body of well-concerned Friends, some of whom there is reason to believe, are feeling in an increased degree the responsibilities which rest upon them, and are thereby being deepened in religious experience, and becoming increasingly prepared to fill with propriety the vacant places in the church.

The meeting for worship was a solid and favored one, in which there was a good degree of harmonious exercise for the growth of the members in the life of religion. Supplication was offered for the pouring out in more plentiful measure of the Holy Spirit upon the people; and lively exhortations were given, and instruction conveyed from the experience of Saul, both in the manner in which he was originally led to the prophet to be anointed King over Israel, and qualified to defend the Lord's people when threatened with danger; and also in his subsequent rejection, because of his disobedience to the Lord's commands. Under a belief that a fresh extension of Heavenly visitation was that day vouchsafed to some then gathered, earnest desires were felt by some, (we hope by many,) that their future lives might be marked by greater dedication, and a closer walk with the indwelling spirit of God.

The principal points of interest in the meeting for business was a conclusion that hereafter the Monthly Meeting of London Grove should always be held at that place, instead of alternately there and at Fallowfield; and a conclusion to authorize a committee to erect a Meeting-house at Kennett Square, if the funds necessary could be secured.

We dined at the house of our aged Friend, Morris Cope, now in his 92d year, and feeling much the infirmities attendant upon his advanced age. He was sitting in an easy chair in his chamber, and his conversation was pleasant and instructive. He said he often had quiet times to himself, and we did not doubt that he was favored at times with a sense of that heavenly peace which our Saviour promised to his disciples. "Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you." The Master whom he had so long endeavored to serve, did not desert his disciple in the time of old age, when his strength failed.

We reached West Chester in time for me to take an evening train, and to be at my own home by our usual bedtime, after a day which had furnished much, both of interest and instruction. J. W.

Economic Plants.—The Baobab tree (Adansonia digitata), is a native of Africa, and is supposed to furnish some of the oldest living organic objects on the earth. The bark furnishes a fibre which is manufactured into ropes and cloth. The pulp of the fruit is slightly acid, and the juice expressed from it is valued in fevers.

The Cow-tree of South America (Brosimum galeotendron), forms large forests in Venezuela. It yields a milk, obtained by making incisions in its trunk, which so closely resembles that of the cow, both in appearance and quality, that it is commonly used as an article of food. It is wholesome and nourishing, and its only unpleasant quality is a slight stickiness.

Rural Population of Mexico.—Except on the immediate line of the railways, one may travel thirty or forty miles in almost any part of Mexico without seeing a dwelling-house. The people live mostly in towns and cities, and are very little dispersed over the country—that is, compared with our own land. Occasional haciendas or large farm-houses, built of adobe or stone are seen; but isolated dwellings are not common. On these estates there is usually less farming or raising of cereals carried on than there is of stock-raising, which seems to pay better. Large droves of cattle are seen grazing sheep, burros, and mules roam at large, and all seem to be getting food from most unpromising land, such as produces in its normal condition cactus only. It is the true climate and soil for this species of vegetation, of which there are hundreds of varieties—flat, ribbed, and cylindrical. No matter how dry and arid the region the cacti thrive, and are themselves full of moisture. Even these haciendas, rectangular structures forming the headquarters of large landed estates, are semi-fortifications, capable of a stout defence against roving banditti, who have long been the dread and curse of the country, and are not yet obliterated. These structures are sometimes surrounded by a moat, the angles being protected by turrets pierced for musketry.

As in Continental Spain, the population live mostly in villages, for mutual protection, being compelled to walk long distances to work in the fields at seed-time and harvest. The owners of the large haciendas, we were told, seldom live upon them. Like the landlords of Ireland, they are a body of absentees, mostly wealthy men who make their homes with their families in the City of Mexico—some even living in Europe—entrusting the management of their large estates to well paid superintendents.—There are not a few Americans thus employed by Mexican owners, who are prompt to recognize good executive ability in such a position, and value their estates only for the amount of income they can realize from them. A hacienda ten or fifteen miles square, is not considered extraordinary as to size, and there are many twice as large. The proprietorship of these haciendas dates back to the old Spanish times when Mexico was under the viceroys. Little can be hoped for as to improvement in the condition of the poor peons of the country, until these immense estates are broken up and divided into small available farms, which may be owned and operated by them for their sole benefit. Astee Land.

Lottery Playing.—A citizen of Baltimore who held several positions of trust, committed suicide a few days ago. He took his life to escape disgrace, as so many others have recently done. Having excellent credit, he had borrowed money extensively. As secretary of certain building associations he was permitted to have sole charge of their financial affairs, on account of his reputation for integrity. Recent investigation shows that his accounts are short to the amount of $100,000. The money stolen belonged largely to poor people. He was a member of some church and interested in religious organizations. A note addressed to his wife has been found, which contains the following: "Dear Wife and Children: I have made you all unhappy through this horrible lottery playing. I am all God to witness, that I alone am the guilty one, always thought that I would win a few thousand dollars, and thereby be able to pay my liabilities, but be merciful to you—I warn every one against doing this. This is my last word. You and the creditors take everything that is mine and divide it up among yourselves."

Fighting Christians.—A Stumbling-block to the eyes Convincement.—Exception has been taken in our quarters to an article in The Independent, by a good friend of the Indians, Elaine Goodale, before to engagement in war. As many others strive for have done, some of them great fighting men, she characterizes it as "wholesale murder," and she says that the Sea Indians are "the cause of the disparity between the doctrine and action upon this subject of many people who name among them bearing the Christian name. To Jews also this strange disagreement is probably a great stumbling-block. A guest in my house a few days ago, referring to this subject, said that she had heard a widely travelled Christian woman in Georgia had recently told some Jews in a city of the idea of the Jews of Jesus Christ, the Messiah, the Prince of Peace. They lied that since his advent there had been more wars than before; and they felt sure that were He dead the Prince of Peace, his followers would overturn their swords, guns, cannon and other murderous weapons into instruments of husbandry and tools of useful purpose—and war would cease from off the earth. Shall we keep on sighing for that promised age when "war shall be no more," or shall we take up the cross in this regard, and help it on to its righteous fruition? While good men continued to keep their brothers in bondage, and to declare that temperate drinking is safe," drunkards multiplied and slavery remained securely entrenched. Will wars and fighting be banished while Christians continue to vote the supplies of war, and to hotly aver that they will fight to the death against insult and for their asserted rights? "My Kingdom is not of this world; if my Kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight."—Joshua W. Leeds, in The Christian Statesman.

The Kaiser's Peace Speech.—Very gratifying to the friends of peace, everywhere, was the speech delivered by the Emperor of Germany at the Guildhall of London, when he said, amid enthusiastic cheers: "My aim is, above all, the maintenance of peace. For peace alone can give the confidence which is necessary to the healthy development of science, of art, and of trade. Only so long as peace reigns are we at liberty to bestow our earnest thoughts upon the great problems, the solution of which, in fairness and equity, I consider the most prominent duty of our time." You may, therefore, rest assured that I shall continue to do my best to maintain and constantly increase the good relations between Germany and the other nations, and that I shall always be found ready to unite with you and them in a common labor for peaceful progress, friendly intercourse, and the advancement of civilization."—Herald of Peace.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 29, 1891.

The editor has had occasion recently to examine the correspondence between the Yearly Meetings of Philadelphia and Maryland (now Baltimore) during the early and middle portions of last century; and it has been both interesting and instructive. The Friends in Maryland appear to have been sensible of their weak condition, growing out of the decease of some of their prominent members, and the failure of many others to come up in a faithful support of our principles and testimonies. In this situation, those who felt the weight of the burthens of the Church, were glad to avail themselves of the sympathy and moral support of a neighboring Yearly Meeting, much larger in number of members and of individuals baptized into a living concern for the prosperity of Truth. These, on their part, were honestly concerned to strengthen their weaker brethren, and to encourage them to labor for the removal of whatever might hinder the prosperity of the Church.

For many years the laws of the Province of Maryland required the taxpayers to contribute annually forty lbs. of tobacco for every taxable person, for the support of ministers belonging to the Church of England. In the weakened state of our Church, many of its members complied with this regulation, influenced, probably by the desire to avoid trouble, or the penalties which might result from the non-observance of the law.

Frequent references to this subject are contained in these epistles, and Friends of Philadelphia were not wanting in their efforts to stir up their brethren to increased zeal in maintaining their testimony against the antichristian yoke of tithes—a testimony "founded on the precepts of Christ, the doctrine of the apostles, and the nature and tenor of the Gospel dispensation." Yet this was done, not in a fault-finding spirit, but with charity and brotherly love.

The difficulties on the frontiers of the Provinces, growing out of the French and Indian wars, soon after the middle of the century, appears to have awakened a renewed examination as to whether Friends had avoided settling on any lands for which the Indians had not been justly and fully paid; and this subject was one which claimed some space in this correspondence.

The rise of a testimony against slavery among their own members, led the writers of the epistles from the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting to call the attention of these Southern brethren to the essential iniquity of holding their fellow-men in life-long bondage; and for several years, there are many edifying paragraphs on this important subject in the epistles from both of the Yearly Meetings.

The growing disputes with the mother country, which led to the war of the Revolution, called forth cautions against becoming entangled in associations which endangered the faithful support of our peaceful principles.

Thus this series of letters furnishes a bird's-eye view of the principal concerns which pressed on the minds of the burthen-bearers in our Society during that period; and show in a pleasing manner the watchful care that was felt to help each other in the support of our testimonies, and to extend caution as to those points where danger might be approaching. That the correspondence was helpful and useful, we have no doubt; and its perusal awakened the desire that the time might soon arrive when the obstructions which have latterly interfered with the maintenance of such intercourse between our own Yearly Meeting and other bodies holding the same principles, might be so far removed that we might again be helpful to each other in this way.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Census Bureau has issued a bulletin giving the assessed value of real and personal property in the United States. This showed the total assessed value in 1880 was $24,249,589,804, an increase since 1850 of $7,346,996,291, or amount equivalent to the true value of all the property as returned by the census of 1850. The absolute wealth of the nation is estimated at $62,610,000,000, or $1000 per capita, as against $570 per capita in 1850.

The Secretary of the Interior has instructed the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to direct Agent Dermott, of the Union Indian Agency, of the Indian Territory, to seize all packages of beer that may be shipped into the Indian country and turn them over to the United States Marshal to be labelled, as provided in the Revised Statutes. This action was taken upon information that a carload of beer was about to be shipped by McAlester, Choctaw Nation, under a recent decision by Judge Braut, in Texas, that malt liquors may be lawfully introduced and sold in the Indian country.

A despatch from Dr. W. H. Burk, of the Public Ledger, who accompanied the Peary polar expedition, announces the arrival of the Kite at St. John's, Newfoundland, on her return voyage. Lieutenant Peary, whose leg had been broken, was left with his wife and the company in winter quarters at McCormick's Bay, Murchison's Sound. All on board the Kite were well, and the scientists brought home with them large collections of the flora and fauna of Greenland.

A despatch from Midland, Texas, says that the first experiment with General Davenport's rain-making balloon was a complete success. Heavy rain immediately followed the explosion of dynamite in the air.

The New York Voice of the 20th instant, says:—"Week before last, there were over 20 brutal and blood-curdling murders and homicides committed by drunken men in this country. Nine murders a week is the average number due directly to whiskey for the year 1890, as admitted by a leading liquor paper, the Chicago 'Champion.' And yet the Prohibitionists are blamed for 'agitating' the liquor question. It looks as though it didn't require much agitating to keep it before the public." The bill has been formulated at Columbia, South Carolina, and endorsed by the Alliance, for the organization of trusts throughout the cotton belt to hold for one year a third of the crop, and to keep the supply for this year down to about 6,500,000 bales, and consequently bring the price up to 10 cents a pound, instead of 7 cents at present.

"After the most exciting and vituperative campaign ever known" there, Stanton, Virginia, voted last week for license by 92 majority. Four years ago license had a majority of 97.

H. W. Patton has returned to San Diego, California. He has been laboring to determine the source of the overflow, in the desert lake, at Salton. He says the water comes from the Colorado River, through a break in the banks, 17 miles south of Yuma, in Mexican territory, and that the lake will be permanent, bringing under cultivation an immense amount of territory hitherto unproductive.

Heavy falls of rain on the 23d and 24th instants caused disastrous floods in the Schuylkill Valley. Great damage was done to millroad and other property in the vicinity of Reading, and in that city many houses were inundated. The Great Northern and Columbia Railroads. The total loss in Berks County is estimated at $250,000. Much damage was also done by rainstorms in Cumberland, Montgomery, Bucks, Lehigh and Chester Counties.

A most disastrous and terrible accident occurred in Park Hill, near Greenwich Street, New York City, on the afternoon of the 22nd inst. At that time the street was filled with hurrying people and heavily-laden wagons and trucks. Suddenly the walls of a large building collapsed, and the whole structure was soon in ruins, burying a large number of people in a debris which took fire. Up to one o'clock on the morning of the 23d, forty-nine bodies had been removed, thirty-seven of which were identified. The cause of the occurrence is not known, but faulty construction of the building is suspected to have predisposed, and the jar of heavy machinery to have excited.

Deaths reported in this city last week were 429, which is 103 less than last week, and 14 more than the corresponding week last year. Of the foregoing, 217 were males and 212 females; 141 were under one year of age; 51 died of cholera; 45 of consumption; 45 of heart disease; 29 of marasmus; 19 of typhoid fever; 16 of old age; 16 of convulsions; 15 of inanition; 14 of pneumonia; 13 of Bright's disease; 12 of inflammation of the bowels; and 11 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels.

FOREIGN.—Queen Victoria, shortly after reviewing the French fleet at Spithead, on the 21st inst., caused a congratulatory message to be sent to President Carnot in France, and the latter returned a courteous and grateful acknowledgment.

Intelligence was received in Paris on the 20th inst. of a terrible hurricane, which devastated the island of Martinique. Later advices say that 340 persons perished, without counting the shipwreck liabilities. The United States ship "Albatross," on her last voyage, has permitted foreign vessels to engage in coast trade in order to supply the needs of the inhabitants.

Despatches received in Calcutta from Rangoon, the capital of British Burmah, state that the harvest prospects almost throughout Burmah are of the gloomiest description.

The Correspondent, a semi-official German newspaper announced on the 18th inst. that the invention of the Great Northern wheat in making bread for the army is an important advance in a deliberate policy, the object of which is to make Germany more independent than hitherto of foreign countries in regard to economic interests.

The Correspondent adds, significantly: "Although the Russian prohibition was, perhaps, rarely prompted by a bad harvest, it is not impossible that at a future date political reasons might dictate similar measures."

An ancient garment, claimed by Catholics to be the coat of our Saviour, is now on exhibition at Freves, the Great number of invigilators who are visiting the city, expecting to derive benefit, spiritual or physical, from proximity to the supposed sacred garment. A despatch from Freves of the 22d inst. says: "One hundred thousand persons have already arrived to see the Holy Coat. Processions of pilgrims on the 22d inst. continued, and continued through the streets, from four o'clock in the morning until midnight. The varied types of national dress contribute to the striking scene. The authorities have converted every available building into a temporary food and shelter depot, where the lowest possible prices are catering to visitors. The regular hotels complain that they are deprived of business."

At midnight on the 18th inst., a cloudburst occurred near Botzen, Austria. The water loosened an avalanche. The railway was destroyed for many miles. The cloudburst drove the mountains flooded the Jews, and converted a mountain stream into a torrent, which swept through the village of Kollman, carrying away people and cattle, and destroying half the houses in the place. The floods extended over both sides of the mountains. Six hundred cubic metres of stone have been hurled down the mountains a distance of 700 metres.

Three hundred men are employed in diverting the water. Sixty bodies have been recovered, all horribly disfigured, and have been buried in rugs, sacks, &c., owing to a lack of coffins.

A despatch from Samaracand, capital of the province of Zerafshan, Asiatic Russia, says that Captain S. B. Smith, commanding the expedition there from an expedition into Eastern Bokaria. The captain reports that he there discovered large deposits of gold and iron, and says that petroleum springs in abundance are to be met with in the same region.

A Panama despatch says the Venezuelan Congress has passed a reciprocity treaty proposed by the United States.

[1835.—Having obtained a minute to make religious visit to some meetings in parts of the states of New York and New England, he thus orders his services at Creek Meeting, in Dutchess County, of the former State.]

"On First-day we attended their meeting; where we had also the company of a number of belonging with Friends. Here it appeared proper to hold forth the doctrine, that true religion is an inward, silent, progressive work; its beginning is small, being compared to a grain of mustard-seed, the least of all seeds; but as it suffered to take root in the heart, will eradicate all other plants that produce fruit contrary to the Divine nature, and eventually overspread all. The incorruptible seed and Word of God; called by many names: as the Seed; the Light; the manifestation of the Spirit; the race of God that brings salvation, and hath appeared unto all men; and as man is passive, under its operation, it will bring him from under the dominion of his evil passions and propensities, in which Satan holds his rule; and set up and establish the kingdom of heaven in his heart. The subject opened gradually, and the meeting was clothed with much solemnity; furnishing renewed cause for grateful, humble acknowledgment to the Master of assemblies, for his Divine presence and assistance. In the evening, we took tea with Isaac and Ruth Halsck. He is nearly eighty-two years of age; is wife a few years younger, and in the station of a minister." "Dropping into silence, just before we left, the language of sympathy and comfort was extended to these ancient Friends; who have passed through much domestic affliction; and yet to old age, have been favored to old in their way, and grow stronger in faith and confidence in Him, who was with the three children in the furnace, and delivered them, so that the smell of fire was not found upon their garments; and continues to be with his children on in their deepest afflictions."

[On the way to Nine Partners Quarterly Meeting, he notes:]

"We stopped to see Anne Thorne, who was about to embark for Europe, on a religious visit. She seemed quite cheerful. While sitting with them I adverted to the necessity of keeping to the inward guidance of the Holy Spirit in all our movements; it was that which could alone preserve us, whatever might be our stations in the church; whether fathers or mothers, young men or children; and if we were permitted at any time to ride, as upon the king's horse, we must return to the gate; in a lowly dependence upon the Lord. We were not to look on the countenance, or the height of the stature of any, but our eye and expectation must be to the Lord alone, for his guidance and direction. This was the ground on which our early Friends came forth, and a doctrine the Society has ever held; and it is only as we keep in humble reliance on the inward guidance of Christ's spirit, that we can experience preservation."

"Through the help of the Shepherd of Israel, we had a tendering opportunity. The danger of forgetting his mercy, who delivered us in the dark and cloudy day, as out of the paw of the lion, and the paw of the bear, was impressed; and Friends were called on to show forth in life and conversation, and in the weightiness of their spirits, the excellency of those principles which they professed; but if those among whom they dwelt, saw that they were engrossed with the things of the world; its comforts and pleasures; it must tend to the sentiment, that it made but little difference what our profession is. Several very goodly young men and women were present; who appeared to have, in measure, yielded to the convictions of Truth in their minds; and the language of affectionate invitation was extended, to treasure up in their own hearts, the sayings of their Lord to them; to retire frequently, and enter into communion with Him; to take up his cross and follow Him; and they would witness a growth in grace, and come to be preachers of righteousness; by which others would be drawn to unite with them, in walking in the same blessed path. The necessity of a lively travail of spirit, when they assembled for Divine worship, every one for himself, was brought into view; this was the experience of Friends in the beginning; who sat down together in silence, waiting upon the Lord, and not on one another. As they gathered here, He who declared himself to be in the midst of the two or three who meet in his name, broke in upon them, and melted and contrited their spirits, and enabled them to offer praise and thanksgiving to his ever worthy name."

[At Beekman Meeting:]—"The advice of the wise man, not to say that the former days were better than the present, was revived. Notwithstanding it is our duty to commemorate the virtues of holy men, and women, yet it is also needed to remember that the power which made them so, is unchangeable, and as it is yielded to, will produce similar effects in our day. It was by giving heed to the little requisitions of Truth, that they grew in grace from stature to stature; and in the same way must we, if we come to an establishment on the same foundation. They that are faithful in a little, shall be made rulers over more."

"The service to-day seemed to be for the purpose of encouraging those who were favored with a knowledge of their Master's will, to stand faithfully to it, notwithstanding the opposition they may have to meet. 'All that will live godly in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution.' Even the adverse opinions of our most intimate friends are sometimes to be borne, though they inflict great trial upon us; yet it is our duty to keep firm to what is right, and in due time, our opponents may be convinced and brought to unite with us. The Apostle declared that, 'If I yet pleased men I should not be the servant of Christ;' our business is to please Him that hath visited and called us by his grace. A qualification was graciously furnished to show the dignified standing of a true, self-denying follower of Christ, let what may come upon him; and that as he keeps faithful, he will be built up and established on that Rock, which is Christ; against which the powers of darkness cannot prevail. Some advice was also communicated to parents, on the necessity of restraining their children, as well as counselling them. The complaint against Eli was that he had not restrained his sons; and they both died in one day, and the ark fell into the hands of their enemies. Similar danger awaited us. The duty of obedience to all the lawful commands of parents, was also enforced upon the children."

"I was much disappointed in finding very nearly all the children in the school, [under the care of the Yearly Meeting] dressed in a fashionable manner, and that more than one-half of them were not members of the Society of Friends. If the Yearly Meeting admits into its school such a departure from plainness, the children who are placed there receive the impression that the Society regards dress as of little consequence. Being naturally fond of finery, they will expect to be indulged in it; and if a proper restraint is not maintained, the example may spread a disadvantageous influence to other children in the Society. As it is their practice to read in the afternoon, we sat with them, and after several chapters of the Bible had been read, the way opened to hold up the excellency of these inestimable writings, and the advantage of daily reading them. Every one has the gift of Grace, or the manifestation of the Spirit; a reprover and teacher which accompanies us wherever we go, and knows the most secret thought and intention of the heart. They were tenderly invited to mind and obey its convictions, and it would bring them to love their Creator in the days of their youth; and give them that peace which the world could not; nor could it deprive them of it."

[At South Adams Meeting:] "Desires were raised that we might all duly prize our privileges, and be found putting shoulder to shoulder in the work of the Lord. I believe, if the younger members of our Society do heartily devote themselves to his cause, that a noble band will be raised up, from generation to generation, to exalt the testimonies and discipline given us to bear; and that the Lord will still make the place of his feet glorious amongst us. He will glorify the house of his glory, and dignify them that truly and steadfastly honor Him."

[At Danby] "We put up at the house of a Friend. We passed the evening in agreeable conversation. It afforded an opportunity of entering upon some of those points which clash with the doctrines of Friends; particularly in relation to the continuance of immediate revelation in the church of Christ. The Friend recited several instances of those who professed to have it on all occasions, but who afterwards made shipwreck of faith. I told him that I believed those who were most favored with it, would say the least of having it themselves; but endeavoring to keep to its guidance, left it to their friends to feel and decide whether their services originated in that source; that professors carrying any one point to an extreme, or making shipwreck of faith and a good profession, was no argument against the truth; which lay out of all extremes; and we should be on our guard against suffering one error, or extreme, to drive us from the Truth, into another. I disapproved of all unauthorized and unassented pretensions; but, at the same time, the immediate influence and guidance of the Holy Spirit, were the root and foundation of true faith, and the work of religion in the soul. It was to this the primitive believers were gathered; the manifestation of the Spirit which is given to every man to profit withal; and by which alone we can savingly understand the Holy Scriptures. Christ opened the understandings of his immediate disciples to comprehend the Scriptures; and He does the same thing now, by his Spirit in the hearts of his believing children, as He sees fit for them; and if any man hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. It was so in the Apostolic church, and it remains to be the case still, and ever will so remain."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Does not the disordered state of affairs in the church originate in a lack of confidence in the still small voice? That which has ever proved to be the sure word of prophecy, which was to increase? The Apostle Peter describes it as a Light shining in a dark place. Concerning this Light, the sacred Scriptures abundantly testify, not in allegory so much as in characters plain, that he that runs the Heavenly race may read its true meaning. The wise men of the East followed the little star, till they were led to the place where rested the greatest Luminary the World ever knew—in its infancy and simplicity—there at Bethlehem lay the holy child Jesus. Oh, that those who make a profession of believing in the Light, would so walk in it as to prove that they are in very deed "Children of the Light and of the day." Having no confidence in an arm of flesh, not leaning on false dependencies, which at last will prove deceptive.

"Let us early learn to love
Simplicity and truth,
For not the eagle, but the dove Brought peace unto this Earth."

"I will do human nature the justice to say, we are all prone to make other people do their duty."—Sidney Smith.

A Visit to Arizona by a Travelling Ornithologist.

I was given a room in a little adobe near the boarding house, which also sheltered under a common roof, a Chinaman, a Mexican, an English cow-boy, and a consumptive divinity student from Kansas. There were several other inhabitants of this humble dwelling, terrifying, but harmless enough, and between their constant company and frequent visits from wrens, jays, road-runners and woodpeckers by day, and skunks, bats, and owls at nights, there was no lack of excitement. For the next ten days it became my business to thoroughly explore the country within a five mile circle of this place, as I had done at Tucson, for birds. I found live oaks everywhere, not in groves, but profusely scattered, and of varying size, some of them in the enormous attaining splendid size, and spread of foliage, which, owing to their isolation, could be seen to the very best advantage. Cat-claw and mesquite bushes and several kinds of cacti, sparsely cover the soil, while in many places the intervening space is completely filled in with a coarse flag-like grass, with fine saw-tooth edge growing in dense bunches one to three feet across, and four feet high. The bare spaces of ground on close examination will be found thickly studded with grass, or rather stubble, as it appears at this season, on which the immense herds of cattle subsist and grow fat during the late fall and winter months, but which barely keep them alive in summer, with the help of trimmings from almost every species of bush and tree and in the adjacent flora, including the thorny chaparral bushes, the prickly pear leaves and fruit, and the fruit of one or two species of dwarf cacti, and the buds, blossoms, and crown leaves of the yucca, agave, and Spanish bayonet! This country is nowhere level, often covered with boulders massed in picturesque groups on the hill-tops, and cut in every direction by little cañons and dry gulches, where lie exposed the ore-bearing veins of rock, which more than anything else have made Arizona what it is to-day.

One of the first questions a traveller asks himself in going through a mining country is, what are those little conical heaps of stones perched around on ledges and hilltops and out of the way places? I at first thought it the work of children, but noticing some of them in an almost inaccessible ledge as I was climbing the mountain near Tucson, and observing that some one had been using a hammer on the rocks, it dawned upon me that this is what prospectors call "monumenting a claim," thereby securing an option on the locality so designated.

It is amazing how thoroughly adventurers have scoured the country searching for gold and silver indications; sinking shafts here and there, and abandoning them, working for a few months on paying veins that did not hold out, expending fortunes to establish settlements, make roads, erect a smelter, etc., before they discovered the mistake. On my way up the Catalina Mountains from Oracle the guide showed me three abandoned mines, representing losses aggregating nearly a million dollars. In the saw-mill camp, where I stayed a week among men of whom the majority were broken-down prospectors, I saw and heard enough to convince me that on the average every dollar of gold and silver mined in Arizona costs more than it is intrinsically worth in the mere hunting for it.

Having collected most of the birds indigenous to this elevation, and found them, almost without exception distinct from those at Tucson, I now made arrangements with the English cow-boy afore mentioned to guide me up over the intervening peaks to the saw-mill camp located in the pine-belt at 8,000 feet elevation and 2,000 feet below the top of Mount Lemon, the highest peak of the Catalina Range. Having packed only the most absolute necessities for a week's stay in the mountains in two suitably shaped bundles the night before, about five o'clock on the morning of Seventh Mo. 2, found Jack and myself packed and mounted on two broncos striking northward up a little cañon, and after a mile of easy-going wagon trail among the cottonwoods, oaks and junipers, a sudden rise brought us into the new burro trail made last year to pack ore across the mountains by, from one of the abandoned gold mines I spoke of previously. Jack rode a very handsome black high-bred three-year old, that had never been over a steep mountain trail before, but he said: "She'll never learn quicker nor younger than now," and touching her with the spur, in a cow-boy fashion, he dashed recklessly through the bushes and started up the steep incline at a half-gallop, followed closely by me on a trusty bay that had long been used to the business before this trail had even been more than a cow-path. Beside about forty pounds of baggage, I carried my gun, knapsack and cartridge belt, slung in readiness on my person. Jack weighed about 200 pounds, and his saddle and baggage about 100 more, so our horses were well ballasted, to say the least. Having passed over two miles of easy ascent along the mountain side, among considerable undergrowth and trees, we struck a part of the mountain bare of all vegetation save the mescal, and a nearly allied species of agave (?) both of which were found in full towering bloom, the former sending up its candelabra of orange colored tapers sometimes nearly fifteen feet high; here the precipitous trail was scarce visible among the great stretches of loose stones covering the mountain side, and the descent into the depths below so steep that every misstep of my comrade's horse would send some of these fearfully suggestive missiles leaping away farther than I cared to watch or even think, as the faint echo rose out of the cañon below us.

We had now got to a splendid view of the great Cañon de Oro, with its numberless tributaries furrowing the mountain sides to north and east, and west, the whole picture lying outspread like the numberless folds and tentacles of a giant octopus enshained among the mountains. Many a daring prospector and adventurer has seen this golden monster swallow up his capital, and was only too glad to escape with his life among these tortuous cañons.

Long before American eyes had greedily scanned it, the Mexicans had known it as the Golden Cañon, and because of its name more than anything else, is due the fame of which it has never yet proved worthy. Nevertheless, it is a grand piece of nature's making, seen from the dizzy steep where Jack and I stood and rested our horses, and tightened the stock saddle girths preparatory to still severer efforts. Just beyond the crest of the mountain we were climbing nearly overhanging the trail, and as I was gazing at a pair of eagles on the cliffs right above me, Jack suddenly said, "there's the place Mr. Dodge slid down on his back," and looking ahead I saw a steep slide of stones some twenty rods wide, that from its frequent movements had swept away every trace of vegetation in its path; across this lay the trail. Before any trail had been made here this was a dangerous crossing, and on one occasion the fore-said Mr. Dodge, a jolly 200 pound man, thought it safer to dismount and cross on foot, but he had no sooner released his trusty pony than down he came on a ticklish rock, and for nearly a hundred feet accompanied the resulting avalanche before his frantic efforts put a stop to it, and he crawled across in a most dilapidated condition, with scarce enough rags on his back to make a pair of suspenders.

Having safely crossed this and several similar places, and got into a rougher part of the mountain, where huge rocks and trees and bushes continually confronted our course, the trail assumed a zig-zag character and our ascent was very abrupt, which fact, coupled with the elevation, made it very hard work for our horses. The patient, sure-footed intelligence of these mountain bred animals is wonderful, and the dexterity with which they rounded these acute angled turns, where the trail leads to the very edge of a deep chasm, and they slowly right-about as on a pivot, bringing all four feet together, and balancing you a moment over the depths and then with a snort springing forward, you meanwhile closely clinging to everything that can be grasped in the wild endeavor to keep going. This kind of climbing quickly brought us to the top of the ridge along which by many an undulation, as yet unseen, we must travel four or five miles ere we plunged into the pine fastness of Mount Lemon, where the saw-mill was. The tuiy path grew narrower, and often disappeared among the bare rocky stretches; we were 7,000 feet above the sea, on a ridge so bare and narrow that oftentimes a misstep either way would send man and beast on a very unwelcome scramble, to say the least, but one couldn't help forgetting this in view of the impressive scenery that abounded on every side. There right in front were the lofty pine-clad slopes of Mount Lemon stretching away to the east and west; southward lay the bare red and yellow mesa, which gradually sloped for thirty miles to the San Pedro River, whose green banks and silver stream fringed the basis of another long chain of mountains, and so on endlessly and everywhere stretched the mighty ridges, chain beyond chain, till lost in the blue haze. Now the horses descend; the bare rocks are left behind, and reaching a soft soil-covered slope, we enter the scattering pines that mark the lower edge of the coniferous belt.

Here, in a little cañon, is a miner's hat, where, after drinking the purest water I had found since leaving home, we followed the remainder of the trail to the abandoned mine, and struck out by a cow-path in the direction of the mill. It was four miles distant but, owing to Jack's ignorance of any trail leading there, and the labyrinth of impassable cañons, precipices, and rocky hillsides, we had to travel nearly twice that distance. Our horses could not go even under the spur more than five minutes up such slopes without losing wind, so we dismounted, dragging the unwilling animals down hill, through bushes across fallen trees, jumping from rock to rock, now urging, now restraining, until they followed us like dogs, evidently seeing that the only hope of getting out of such a tangle was to trust in us. Even this served to increase our danger, for so closely did they follow, that a misstep on the part of either would be sure collision, but the fates favored, and about three o'clock we struck an old trail and got into camp without a scratch or bruise. Having made arrangements with the cook, who said "he was willing to board me, only they had nothing to eat," Jack, after an hour's stay, took leave, going down the mountain another way, leading my horse behind him, and promising to return for me in a week.

The announcement of the cook was partially verified at supper time. There was bread, raw onions, corned beef and coffee; no salt, sugar, butter, and save the raw onions, no vegetables. But in certain conditions, what we had was all that seemed necessary, until I found the scarcity of salt had played havoc with the beef, and it had come to be bread, onions and coffee, without sugar, milk or cream. To shorten a lengthy tale, let me say, we lived through it. I made a goodly collection of the unique bird fauna and flora of this beautiful spot, ascended to the top of mighty Mount Lemon, saw deer, heard of bears, talked with a lonely dyspeptic ranchman, who came up here to live on air and water, (as indeed I was doing), and discussed, over a pan of milk, the possible whereabouts of a mountain lion which had made him a passing visit in broad daylight a few days before. My return to Oracle was on a mule of great age (in fact my senior), but a wonderfully supple and enduring little beast. Saving her ears, tail and legs, myself and traps nearly obliterated the identity of that mule, but ears, tail and legs are everything in such a case as the sequel proved.

Downhill climbing under a heavy pack required greater skill and sure-footing than the reverse, yet my ancient beast swung corners and paced along the level stretches as blithely as the gay young steed that led the way. Next day the stage took me to Tucson, where I shipped my specimens to Philadelphia, and departed the following morning for Southern California. It was a long and dusty ride through the hottest region, of such extent, in the States. A few days before, the temperature at Tucson was 108°, and at Zuma 115°. It had moderated since then, being about 100° at Zuma, where we dined, but soon after we had crossed the Colorado and plunged into "The Desert," a thermometer on the train indicated 110° for nearly three hours. Reserving my experiences in California for a later date, allow me now to bid adieu to my friends in the far, far East, hoping this sketch can in some measure make them forget that it is not so very far to Arizona after all.

SAM'L N. RHOADS.

SAN FRANCISCO, Cal., Eighth Mo. 6, 91.

To discriminate between our own spirits, and a right zeal, when contending for the faith, requires great singleness of heart and openness to self-conviction, which I have sorrowfully observed too few arrive at or dwell in, and hence we are deprived of an increase in the increase of God, the fruit-bearing branches not being so effectually purged as to enable them to bring forth more good fruit. Oh, the beauty of the living branches when they abide in the vine, draw their sap from the root, and retain only an holy emulation with each other; a preserving canopy will such form in meetings for discipline as well as worship. No boasting; no self-seeking; no spirit that would rend or tear the tender feelings of any feeble traveller could here have any place, because being branches which bring not forth good fruit they are cut off and cast into the fire.—Sarah Grubb.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

What are the Needs of the Society of Friends.

The highpriest's office and position under the law, had their fulfilment in Christ, as the head, whilst every living member must fill up the measure of suffering left behind for the body's sake. Shall the Lord of heaven and earth not be weary of suffering left behind for the body's sake? How then dare any finite creature reason, that the abundant daily sacrifice was of no account? Is God so unreasonable as to emblemize that which is without a reality, or to give a type without its fulfilment.

"Without the shedding of Blood there is no remission of sin," this has its twofold application before we actually realize its saving effect, first on the cross of Calvary, second in actual remission. As abundant as is the actual commission of sin, so abundant is the outpouring of Light and grace to counteract its effect, so that where sin abounded, grace did much more abound. It remains now as much as in any age or generation, even with the first Adam in his state of innocence, to choose by the use of our free will to submit ourselves, for it is God that works in you, both to will and to do of his own good pleasure, so that ye cannot do the things that ye would; but if we cannot do the things that we would, it is ours to choose to be either the slaves of lusts and passions, or servants of righteousness, by crucifying the first nature. There is no such thing as to live without daily dying, for the flesh striveth against the spirit and the spirit against the flesh, the two superior powers to which we are created subjects by choice, are unceasingly at work during this short period of our transition as mortals. All types and emblems become realities as the object itself is seen and attained to; could we but see what we should be, our souls would loose in wonder the hopes of earthly peace and joy, and grasp the unseen yonder.

There is a spirit which under high colors has long worked in the Society of Friends; it calls itself a spirit of freedom and progression from traditional forms, but as it is not subject itself to the living inward daily-felt cross, "abiding in me," it leads into a bondage of the most intricate delusion; believing in all the Scriptural doctrines in the letter, but refraining from striving to enter into the precious life which once adorned the so-called "traditional forms." Let the living Seed, now concealed as it may seem, enter into travail; then there will again be an arising, for God has not left himself without a witness: Has He spoken by our fathers, shall He not bring it to pass? But it ever was individual work, apart in solitary places, the Master's footsteps I trace.

May there arise of the descendants of a once highly favored Society, men and women, willing freely to choose to wrestle in hope and not cease; for the true Quaker must ever, like Anna of old, remain in the temple both day and night, looking for an increased measure of the spirit of Christ, who has yet many things to tell which we cannot bear now, but the wrestling seed of Jacob always realizes God to be true. Remember "that if any man draweth back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him."

As far as the Gospel dispensation is to excel the dispensation of the law, so far must the ministry and sacrifices, even the "daily offerings," in nature and character excel those of the law. As long as we live in the commission of actual sin we are under the condemnation of the "letter which killeth" in that God has said thou shalt not commit, &c. The quickened soul, that has come into Christ's Gospel dispensation, abides in the light. The life is in Christ, the light in man, and in his own light we see Him and are drawn to Him. In his light we see the temptations in their first arising, and die to sin before it becomes sin: "ye have not yet withstood unto Blood striving against sin." Blood under the spiritual dispensation signifies life, so the life of the animal nature is the Blood, so the unseen life is spoken of by Christ as the Blood: "except ye drink my blood." Where there is a temptation, there is life, life of its kind, that temptation withstood includes the shedding of blood of its kind. If in the light our whole mind and being are thus guarded, how many would be the "daily sacrifices" which the minister of the "royal priesthood" would offer up daily, and how many the "hours of daily prayer," for we ought always to pray and not to faint. The high profession we as Friends have made, demands that continual inward felt energy of the active Christ Life and spirit co-operating in our "passive clay" form. To be under Christ's dispensation is the daily dying to that for which the daily sacrifices were offered. Then where there is no transgression there is no law. The second and highest rank of the priesthood were the sons of Aaron; the highpriest who was to offer one offering in the year for the sins of the whole nation, signifying the incompleteness of the first, pointing to Christ's death in the flesh when he, a highpriest after the order of Melchisedec went into the holy of holies without Blood, for as all the patterns under the law were sanctified with Blood, and Christ with his own Blood entereth in, once for all, and is sat down at the right hand of God a highpriest, forever and such a highpriest behooves us that is holy, blameless, undefiled and separate from sinners, separate in that He never committed sin, but as a lamb without spot or wrinkle, for the sacrifice for sin. Christ the Son of God doing what the law could not do, forever perfects them that come to God, through his second coming unto salvation without sin; fulfilling all the demands of the law by the sacrifice of his own body upon the tree. From within proceed evil thoughts; defiling the spirit, and therefore our spirit must come into actual contact with the spirit of Christ ere a washing of regeneration is known, and that is ever the cross of Christ which the natural man shivers because it includes the "daily sacrifices."

The apostle Paul to the Hebrew converts in a remarkably clear manner illustrates the use of the whole law, and his implicit reverence and respect, alluding to Christ's superseding it by, "I come to do thy will," taking away the outward sacrifices that He may establish the second, by which we are sanctified, &c. Now as Moses was faithful in his house in all his specified services, so Christ in his house, whose temple we are, if we in loving obedience have entered the threshold of the new dispensation; for Christ's law is not written upon tables of stone, but "I will give you a heart of flesh," and his laws are to be written in the heart, and "in the mind will I write them," and if we are to read them we must ever mind to have the single eye to Him when he writes, lest if we are with us as with some formerly "because I have with us and ye would not hear, I have stretched out my hand and no man regarded, I also will laugh at your calamity, I will mock when your fear cometh,"—Prov. 1, 24-26.

If we are happily brought to an experimental taste of the life itself of the new covenant, we must know Christ to be our daily priest ministering on his own altar, and as the priests were to take the life of all the clean beasts that were offered, so Christ alone cannot only subdue but crucify, that is take the life of the lusts and passions that would crucify Christ and make Him an open shame. After we have had some experimental knowledge of the saving grace of God, we must know his voice and follow Him in an inward felt certainty, for He calls his own sheep by name, we must above all know Him as our high priest; none but He was permitted to enter the holiest, none but He could make an atonement, none can supersede Christ here, for He bare all "our sins in his own body upon the tree," let the graphic language of the prophet Isaiah (53d chap.), reverberate through all ages: "He was wounded for our transgression, he was bruised for our iniquities," &c.

A firm adherence to the literal doctrine of the atonement was exemplified by the first generation of our Society. Were they not of the most pious and respectable, deeply grounded in the principles of all the different denominations to which they formerly belonged? If so, they were in unity with all orthodox Christians on that literal basis of faith and doctrine; except we can find any authority in their writings to show that they renounced their allegiance to this essential part of the Christian's fundamental principles. I find no such renunciation in any of their writings. Atonement for sin is in definite harmony with the righteous justice and judgment of a merciful God: "When faith came, we were no longer under a schoolmaster; faith is the substance of things hoped for, &c.; the essence itself of inward fellowship; the victory that overcomes the world by which the world is crucified to me and I to it." Friends therefore saw that their literal adherence did not give them this victory; consequently holding fast to that form of sound doctrine, as far as it went, wherein they had believed, they pressed forward into the life itself of the new covenant. The law comes from without appealing to reason—the Gospel from within, striking at the root of the corrupt tree. The law regulates moral action, the Gospel brings into subjection every high imagination and everything that raises itself up instead of God, and calls itself God; the law puffs up, the Gospel humbles. The more there is made manifest of our natural depraved state, the clearer we see how far short we have fallen of attaining; so that in deep humility the Gospel believer always says, not that I have already attained nor yet that I am already perfected."

"GOD WAS MANIFEST."
SELECTED.
AN ACTUAL OCCURRENCE.

A hard stern man upon a sick-bed lay,
More and more feeble with each passing day;
No halloving dream of heavenly peace was there,
No way of love divine—no breath of prayer.

Kind christian friends on holiest mission bent,
Came bright and hopeful—sad and earnest went;
Harder and sterner the Atheist grew,
The flinty heart no answering softness knew.

Angry at last with each persistent call,
With firm refusal he denied them all;
The Saviour's sacred name he would not hear,
His loving words could find no listening ear.

"Wife fetch the black-board and a bit of chalk,
One way remains to stop this senseless talk,
I will write something which is truth indeed,
And have it placed where every one can read."

The thin weak hand that scarce the chalk could hold Wrote "God is nowhere," large and bold;
The fearful sentence met his wakening sight,
In wretched mockery; by day and night.

Time crept along—hour after hour passed o'er,
While the death-angel still his touch forbore;
Lower and lower burned the flickering flame,
And slower yet the awful puffs came.

Then happier change repaid the anxious woe—
And hope so long denied sprang forth anew;
Through every vein a fuller current flowed,
And Heaven once more the gift of life bestowed.

Soon the fond father sought his banished child,
Who would with prattle sweet his heart beguile.
Charmed to come back she told her little news,
And showed her "nice new gown and pretty shoes."

"And that's not all"—the tones grew louder now,
"For I can read—my aunts taught me how"
"Nonsense, my dear," the father quick replied,
"You cannot read I'm satisfied."

"Yes father dear! oh yes! I truly can,
For aunts taught me"—and the child began
To look around, perchance to find some way
Of proving what her words had failed to say.

The father smiled and pointing to the wall
Said: "Well read that, if you can read at all!"
She hesitated—and the father spoke—
"I told you so—I knew it was a joke."

But still she kept her deep and earnest eyes
Fixed on the board and soon in glad surprise, Exclaimed "I know it now! Oh yes, I see!
"God-is-now—here—the last word puzzled me."

The conscience-stricken man in mute amazement;
Covered his face to hide his startled gaze,
While from the rocky fount untouched by years
Burst forth a flood of pure and holy tears.

My God! my child, and has my darling learned,
What I with death so near, denied and spurned?
Father, forgive, and fill with love divine,
That life thy mercy spare, now wholly Thine.

THE FIRST SNOW-FALL.

The snow had begun in the gloaming,
And busily all the night
Had been heaping field and highway
With a silence deep and white.
Every pine and fir and hemlock
Wore ermine too dear for an earl;
And the poorest twig on the elm-tree
Was ridged inch-deep with pearl.

From shed new-roofed with Carrara
Came chanticleer's muffled crow,
The stiff rails were softened to swan's-down,
And still fluttered down the snow.

I stood and watched by the window
The noiseless work of the sky,
And the sudden flurries of snow-birds,
Like brown leaves whirling by.

And I thought of a mound in sweet Auburn,
Where a little bird had come stood,
How the flakes were flogging it gently,
As did robins the Babes in the Wood.

Up spoke our own little Mabel,
Saying, "Father who makes it snow?"
And I told her the good All-Father
Who cares for us all below.

Again I looked at the snow-fall,
And thought of the leaden sky,
That arched o'er our first great sorrow,
When that mound was heaped so high.

I remembered the gradual patience
That fell from that cloud like snow,
Flake by flake, healing and hiding
The scar of our deep-plunged woe.

And again to the child I whispered:
"The snow that has buried me dead,
Darling, the merciful Father
Alone can make it fall!"

Then, with eyes that saw not, I kissed her;
And she, kissiog back, could not know
That my kiss was given to her sister,
Folded close under deepening snow.

Up the Yangtse.

BY BISHOP GOODSELL.

The Yangtse, in some respects, is like the Missouri. Flowing chiefly between alluvial banks, there is a wall of earth on either side from twenty feet in height to nothing when the river rises. Capricious in its behavior, it destroys and builds in about equal proportion. It carries Western and Central China down to enrich the coast.

Below Shanghai a large and immensely fertile and populous island has risen from the river within the memory of the living. One hundred miles and more up the river it has made a promontory of Silver Island. Fine gardens are cultivated where the British men-of-war anchored in 1842. Now on one side, now on the other, this mighty stream builds and destroys. It has no respect for homes, temples, or graves. I saw all falling in. The ship channel often runs within fifty feet of the clay wall, which at low water bends in the river; then crosses diagonally, and is as close to the other side. But unlike the Missouri, the Yangtse has a deep channel for six hundred miles from the sea. The Czarowitz's ships passed up while we were at Kiukiang, which is five hundred miles from Shanghai. It is the avenue of a nightier commerce than the Mississippi ever knew. Far above steamer navigation the junks laboriously work their way through the grand gorges to Chungking and beyond, almost to the borders of Thibet. When the wind favors all sail is set; when ahead the crew climbs the river bank and drags by a mast-head line the heavy craft against the current. Nothing but Chinese patience would ever be equal to that.

After leaving Nanking the mountains occasionally draw near the river, and the scenery becomes more picturesque. Our mission hospital and houses at Wuhu have a noble site, far better for a sanitarium than for work in the city, two miles distant. Here I clambered down the rocks and talked by gesture with a patient fisherman whose little spread-net hung from a bamboo derrick, was raised many weary times without even a two-inch monie to reward him. There, too, I tried to make acquaintance with a water-buffalo, on whose back a child was riding. But having a calf she sniffed, snorted, and half-plunged at me, and I retreated in good order. The next day, however, when her owner was leading her by the ring in her nose, my Kodak caught the group, one of the most characteristic sights on the banks of the Yangtse. Good work is done here, both in our hospital and chapel, but larger results at Taiping-fu, near at hand, have rewarded our missionaries.

On the wharf-bulk at Wuhu, my wife, and I had our most oppressive experiences of Chinese curiosity, which is equal to anything ever dreamed of, and then needs multiplying by four to approximate the truth. We had to wait an hour for the steamer. A crowd of coolies formed around us, examining our clothes, commenting on my avoirdupois and stature with a freedom inconceivable to those who know only home ways. I opened my pocket book, three men walked up and looked in. I took off my overcoat, too tired to investigate the pockets. Two immense Chinese coffins made a barricade, behind which I placed my wife. As many as could sit or stood on the coffins to see what new thing the outside barbarians would do. I think I never have had the fact that I am full-grown so impressed upon me as here. One man asked me: "What is your honorable age?" When I answered, fifty, he said: "You must be a hundred years old." In his thought I had had all that time to grow. There is a curious notion prevalent here that some foreigners are a hundred years old when they are born. I tried to console myself that this is what he meant, but the facts were against me. He only meant that no man ought to be as ponderous as I am at my age, and I quite agree with him. As we had later on a cabin which opened on the Chinese corridor, friends lent us a screen to keep the Paul Prys away. But many holes were punched through that screen. They must see! That is everybody's right in China! The wharf-master invited my wife to his room on the bulk. Instantly every window was darkened by the faces of men and women! Nor did they leave until we did. When the boat came in the din was frightful. One would think a pitched battle was in progress. Universal distrust leads every Chinaman to carry his whole outfit with him. And, as if their lives depended on it, the hundred pushed, screamed, and fought to get on and off the boat at the same time and on the same plank. It is this which makes Chinese mobs a terror, and life in China without a high wall impossible. No moment, no room, is sacred from intrusions. Privacy is a thing unknown, and an outrage on public rights, except in the women's inner apartments. And with all this it is evident that the thought of impertinence does not enter their heads. "What is he doing that he should hide himself?" is the feeling of the Chinaman who is not allowed to see you bathe, dress, and eat.

On the steamer a high mandarin, with two wives, a grown son and daughter, two infant children, and six servants, were our only fellow passengers in the saloon. They were manchus, and not so exclusive as the Chinese whom they rule. My wife did not care to enter the saloon where men and women were alike smoking and drinking tea. But the wives sent out the female servants to ask her to come in, and being in they examined her clothing from head to foot, tried on her hat, her coat, her gloves, and the women would have deuced her if, with mild perceptiveness and the cabin-boy as interpreter, she had not convinced them that there was a limit to curiosity. But it was all well-meant. They offered to permit her the same liberty with them. After awhile they ceased to fear being devoured by me or having the evil eye cast on them, and so far as the old mandarin would let them, they investigated my hat, gloves, and coat, and were evidently meditating my watch and pockets, when a growl from his excellency sent them scurrying to their cabins. I have my revenge in a photograph of the young lady daughter whose finger-nails on the left hand, protected by silver nail-protectors, were four and one-half inches long, and whose back hair, arranged in some incomprehensible manner over a wire frame, projected six inches behind her head, and six inches each side—a fine development of hirsute horns indeed.

Our stay at Kiukiang was enlivened by the arrival of the Czarowitz and Prince George, of Greece, who called there with three ships to purchase some of the famous Kiukiang imperial porcelain, of which the czar's son bought over $1,000 worth. The heir to the Russian throne stepped out from the boat clad in simple grey civilian's dress, in English russet shoes, carrying a ten-wound cane, carved by our boys in the Kiukiang Institute. His suite tried to buy a carved cabinet done by these same boys, which is a marvel of Chinese skill, but I had bought it the day before, and I am unable to see why my children are not as worthy possessors of it as this moderate young man, who has no business to be born to a wealth and power neither he nor his father ever earned.

Our Mission met at Kiukiang, and we had a very interesting session. Good progress had been made in numbers, and our educational facilities largely extended. The brethren have, as is the case everywhere in China, the largest successes in the country work. The vices of the open ports and missionary work are mutually destructive. And this leads me to explain why so many travellers underrate missionary work. They never see it. Entertained at the great establishments of the mercantile houses, conversing with young men whose lives are stained by gross sin which in one direction is regarded as venial by many here, they gather impressions which are as meager as they are false. I have heard of one case of a writer who condemned Missions, who was asked if he personally inspected their work. "No," he answered; "but I have heard enough about them." Some of the steamer captains are notoriously unfriendly to Mission work, and seem to take pleasure in unfriendly comment. Any one who understands the irreligious foreign life of China comprehends the strained relations between some of the members of the foreign communities and missionaries in general.—Christian Advocate.

AN easy and habitual yielding to the passion of anger, is fatal to that coolness of judgment and calmness of temper which are indispensable qualities of strong characters, and truly successful lives. Selected out of any community, the hot-headed men who are frequently heard raving at events and berating their fellow-men and you select the essentially weak men, who neither win great respect nor carry great weight in the community; strong men are men who know how to keep cool, or to restrain themselves when excited. Their coolness or their calmness, is a part of their strength. The man whose temper controls him, incapacitates himself by blind passion for the exercise of that shrewdness and judgment with which a man who keeps a calm and steady mind and manner will surmount difficulties, conquer opposition and defeat injustice.

A child's question that is hard to answer can always be made to lead up to a new train of thought and a new direction of study. "Why do a dog's ears hang over?" said a little boy as he awoke one morning. "Because," replied his father, "they are too long and soft to stand up stiffly, like the ears of a horse." But the child had been co-ordinating many truths before he asked the question. The Creator is wise, he was told; or our ears are made to catch the waves of sound; if we put our hand behind the ear, we catch more sound and hear better. Then why do a dog's ears hang over, and so obstruct the very sound which the ear was made for? This is a deeper "why" than the one the father answered, but it is the one the child had in his own intention.

"A dog," said the father, "depends more upon his nose than upon his ears." Then followed an exposition on the power of canine scent which was a revelation to the child, who asked, "Is that why dogs run along with their noses down on the ground?" Thus, while it could not be said why a dog's ears should be made to obstruct sounds, a new use could be made of the unexplained problem. It is a large part of the teacher's art to make use of whatever material the scholar consciously or unconsciously, furnishes.—Selected.

For "THE FRIEND."

"If Ye Love Me Keep My Commandments."

"God, who at sundry times and in divers manners, spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son."—Hebrews: 1.

Where and how does He, the high and holy One that inhabiteth Eternity speak unto us? How does He condescend to our low estate? He hath showed thee, Oh! man, what is good and what He requireth of thee. "Thine eye shall see thy Teacher, and thine ear hear a voice saying, This is the way, walk thou in it." This is the voice or Word that it is of unpeakable importance for us to heed. "Hear and obey, and thy soul shall live." It is sounded in the ear of the understanding by that prophet, Moses foretold the Lord our God should raise up like unto him, who was to be heard in all things.

It is of vastly more consequence to each child of man to know that Voice in his own heart, obey its dictates, follow its guidance and unflinchingly yield his will to its circumcising knife and crucifying power, than to have the law of Moses by rote. That in its time was for the direction of the children of Israel, but it could not make the comers thereunto perfect. This that is written within is that of the Lord, which is perfect converting the soul, the testimony, that is sure, making wise the simple. The Author of it says: "A new commandment I write unto you that ye love one another." Now, love in other words. What a millennium it would be in our, or any generation, if the best was universally obeyed.

"If a man love not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" It is vain for any one to profess to love Him and call Him "Father," if he has hatred or unkindness ranking in his heart against any one.

Provocation may be great, ingratitude flagrant, the arrows of malice from wounded self, that harm the archer more than the target, may fall thick and fast, yet is there a sure place of safety for those who put their trust and confidence in the arm of everlasting strength—"his place of defence is the munitions of Rocks," where bread shall be given and their waters are sure. Our Heavenly parent never gave any command He would not enable us to perform. An old one tells us "thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and thy neighbor as thyself." If we love Him as directed, we will love the workmanship of his holy hand. Love them but not their evil ways, love the sinner, pity and pray for him while abhorring his wicked doings. We are not to love sin in ourselves, but to turn from it and fight against it till it is overcome. We are not apt to speak ill of ourselves, so must we guard against doing it of others; endeavoring to live in that gracious charity that thinketh none, leaving them to the Omnipotent Judge who doeth all things well, and remembering the Saviour's prayer for those who so despectfully used Him: "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do."

Let each one of us strive to maintain the watch, mind our own steps, heeding the voice that says: "This is the way, walk thou in it." E. S. L.

Quicksand.—An instructive article on quicksand, in the Mechanical News, contains an interesting explanation of this matter, which is little understood. The difference between building-sand and true quicksand is most easily explained by comparing building-sand to road-metal, while the quicksand must be represented by fragments no larger than large buckshot, but shaped like very smooth potatoes. In a word, the quicksand is small and thoroughly waterworn, so that every fragment has been deprived of all its angles and fairly well polished. Its particles are very small as compared with those of the building-sand. The smaller the size and the more complete the rounding, the more nearly will the sand approach a liquid condition when it is moistened. The first glance at a fairly mounted sample of quicksand under a microscope is sufficient to show that the quickness of the sand is amply accounted for by the innumerable friction wheels which the particles themselves furnish. Sharp sand, or building-sand, on the other hand, will show few round corners, many angles, corners, and a general condition that of broken stone. Sea-sand is often unfit for building, even though perfectly deprived of its salt; the reason being that the particles have been worn and polished till they have no more binding powers than so many cobble stones. . . . It is well to remember that quicksand, when dry, if very fine, shows the same properties as a liquid. In holding up the centres of large bridges it is sometimes put into cylinders with a plunger on top of it. It will, when thus confined, hold up the load like a column of water. When it is desired to strike the centres, a plug is drawn out of the side of the cylinders and the sand flows out like so much water. The advantage, of course, is that the sand does not need a packed piston, and does not leak out, though the work is prolonged for years. Quicksand, when dry and confined, forms an admirable foundation, and when wet, can be loaded over its whole surface and give a support if side openings can be avoided. While the word quicksand is usually applied to sand which is very fine, coarse sand is occasionally found which almost deserves the same name. It is rounded and polished, and the particles move with great ease in consequence. This whole class of sands is avoided by the builder, because of their lack of "sharpness." This latter term is strictly accurate, though it commonly means the friction, or grittiness, which is felt when the sand is rubbed in the palm of the hand, or between the thumb and finger. Sharp sand has a sharp, gritty feeling, owing to the angularity of the particles. This is absent in a marked degree in sands of the other class, even when the particles are large.

Stalking the Ostrich.—The manner in which Bushmen Hunt the Big Birds.—This description of an ostrich hunt by bushmen is given by a writer in the Week's Sport.

The birds were sighted about three o'clock one hot December afternoon, and the party of which I was a member was instructed to remain concealed behind a ledge of rocks while the two hunters worked around below the ostriches in order to be able to approach them against the wind. I selected a high point of land where a good view of the feeding birds could be had, and with a powerful field-glass awaited developments.

The two hunters were prepared for the stalk by their companions by having their legs rubbed with a white, chalky kind of clay, then each placed a sort of saddle over his shoulders. This arrangement was for the purpose of spreading an ostrich skin, which was thrown over the head of the hunter.

The neck of the skin was arranged so that a long stick thrust into it up to the head and held in the hunter's left hand made the man look like a full fledged ostrich, with head erect, wings naturally extended, and with the aid of an occasional and quite natural shake and rocking, stately tread, assumed for the occasion, I am free to confess that, at one hundred yards distance, I would have taken a shot at the disguised native, fully expecting to bag a fine bird.

The hunters went down the kloof about eight hundred yards, and then came out on the plain in full view of the feeding birds. Then commenced a series of the most natural manoeuvres I ever had the good fortune to witness.

The Bushman would trot forward a few yards, and then, by clever manipulating the stick supporting the head, cause the beak to dive into the grass as though feeding in a most lifelike manner, then turn and apparently arrange the wing and tail feathers. They would then run together, exchange caresses, feed again, raise the head as though looking around, all the time working carefully up against the wind and very rapidly reducing the distance between themselves and the feeding birds.

The ostriches would occasionally raise their heads, and huddle close together, regarding the strange birds with evident distrust; but as the hunters drew near they would stop more frequently and resume their imitations of the natural actions of the birds, apparently paying no attention whatever to their game. This would evidently reassure the ostriches, as they would separate and begin feeding again.

These movements were continued until the Bushmen were in the midst of the flock, when they suddenly threw off their disguises and commenced to fire poisoned arrows from the short bows they had concealed under the ostrich skins with a rapidity that was truly astonishing. The birds attempted to escape in all directions, but when the raid was ended there were three dead ostriches on the ground, while a fourth was too badly crippled to escape.

Caution of the Mule.—Remounting, after the guide has tightened the girths for safety, we begin to climb a trail that seems impossible up that steep mountain to the top. But we go on, following our guide, ascending steep on steep, by scores and scores of zigzags, picked and dug and blasted out of a region which a chamois goat could hardly attempt to climb, turning sharp angles formed on butting crags and looking down abrupt precipices thousands of feet into the canyon below, where a misstep of the mule or a mistake of the rider would hurl one or both into the shuddering abyss—a shapeless, lifeless mass!

On we go, with no sign of the top, nor of our way out of this mountain prison. And yet the guide knows there is a way, and knows how to conduct us safely to it. "There is no danger," he says, and that is true, barring the improbable. The mule by the instinct of self-preservation will make no misstep. He is as afraid to go over that precipice as the rider. He shrinks from death as much as the most timid on his back. If he does not show as much fear as the rider, it is because the mule knows more than the man. He knows just how to pick his way, balances his load as he swings the corners, and steps so slowly and carefully that he cannot fall. He went go off. You cannot bribe or drive him over. So carefully does he pick his way, heedless of whip or spur plied by foolish or angry rider, that the caution of the mule is the safety of the man. With religious fidelity he treads that trail every day. His experience is better than your theory. Hence throw fear to the winds, throw your reins on his neck, have faith in the mule, and let him have his way. Then there is no danger. With fear gone, the mule will do the rest.—Bishop Peck in Christian Advocate.

Danger of Over-Exertion.—At an athletic contest between representatives of different select schools in this city, a short time ago, several participants fainted from over-exertion. One was so seriously affected as to make necessary a call for a physician. Within a few months the writer visited two celebrated preparatory schools about seventy miles from New York. At one a young man was unconscious and had been for several days as the result of a blow upon the head received in a ball game. He was under the care of two trained nurses and a physician of high rank brought from this city. At the other school, while taking breakfast in the morning, he noticed that the students broke out into applause when a young man came in on crutches. Inquiring the reason, he was told that the young man had broken a limb in one of these match games, and this was his first appearance. Several deaths have occurred among our acquaintances and friends, traced directly to such exertion. A dispatch was published July 1 in the daily papers announcing that JAMES H. CULLY, aged fifteen, died June 30 from the effects of over-exertion in the athletic test at Wappinger's Falls. A broken bone, which can be set and may heal and leave the limb practically as serviceable as before, is much less to be dreaded than a permanent weakness of the heart, or a prostration of nervous energy. Doubtless it is useless to attempt to moderate in any considerable degree the present rage, which is so much in harmony with the impulses of vigorous youth, and so closely related to personal and collegiate vanity. Yet if our caution may deter but one youth not accustomed to violent exercise, and not of a robust constitution, and yet endowed with his clear mind and ability to be of service to his country and an honor and comfort to his kindred, from attempting more than he can stand, it will not be in vain.—Christian Advocate.

Birds Steering.—An interesting account of the flight of oceanic birds appears in Nature. J. R. Speers noticed that the tern very frequently makes use of its feet in steering its course through the air. It was a common thing, he says, for a tern to poise itself on a windy day directly above the taff rail, and to hold that position, regardless of the speed of the vessel, for eight to ten minutes. When about to fly way it would, with a quick motion, lower one of its black-webbed feet down with the web across the line of flight. "The effect of this was exactly like that of a ship's rudder. When the aft foot was dropped, the bird turned to port; when the right, to starboard." If the foot were lowered but a trifle, as sometimes was done, the bird turned but slightly; when lowered straight down and spread wide out, the bird turned as if on a pivot." The wings and tail were, of course, very often used in conjunction with the foot, but he never saw the foot used when the bird was flying by flapping its wings continually.

Lock of Recruits.—The Swansea Liberal remarks:—"We consider the recent debate on the lack of recruits for the army one of the most satisfactory signs of the times—a real herald of Peace. It is pretty safe to reckon that military enthusiasts will find insuperable difficulties in the way of Conscription. Meanwhile, it is an encouraging fact that men fight shy of the army. This is not an age of wars; it is nearly forty years since Britain has engaged in a contest dignified enough to be called war—for we do not count much of the inglorious campaigns either in North or South Africa. And the halo of glory which used to surround the red-coat has less, and will have less, attraction for men who have had the least education enough to read, and can tell you about the historical folly of war.

It is true that the Nation has not yet awoken to the folly of its enormous expenditure for ironclads and hundred ton guns. He is still the luckiest man who invents an engine of destruction, dynamite, torpedo, or Gatling gun. But, happily, the human element for working these machines is getting scarce. Men are learning to value their lives too highly to offer themselves as targets for other men's bullets. In a word, recruits are lacking.

To the military and quasi-military mind this is as distressing as it is to us delightful. Hence the debate which recently arose in the House of Commons on a motion made by Mr. Hanbury, "That the conditions of military service urgently require to be modified so as to provide a more regular and adequate supply of suitable recruits." As a consequence of the compulsory celibacy of the majority of soldiers, barrack towns are hot-beds of vice, and the private soldier who has finished his term of service is thrown upon the world without a trade, and often without a livelihood.

Let the reduction of our armaments proceed apace, so that the income of the country may be reduced, or devoted to more worthy objects than careful preparation for the slaughter of our fellow-men.

The Army Burden in Uruguay.—The Monte Video (Uruguay) Times remarks as follows upon the army of that nation:—"The army has always been, and under the present system is likely always to remain a disturbing factor in politics, whether used by a tyrant to crush the justifiable revolt of the people, or whether used by its officers, as it also has been more than once, to upset constitutional authority obnoxious to their power. The army has been at the bottom of nearly every revolution that has occurred, and the smaller its power the more chance there is of peaceful government by constitutional means. The country has grown beyond the stage when military tyranny could usurp the place of constitutional authority. As a defence against the immense probability of foreign invasion the army is absurd; and a means of preserving internal peace it is unnecessary, because the people are patient and long-suffering, and not likely to revolt so long as the Government is moderately honest and constitutional. Morally, the army has made itself most objectionable on account of the aggressiveness of its officers, the shameful cruelties practised under the name of discipline, and the frequent conflicts with the civil power. Financially, politically, and morally there is every reason for the reduction of the army; none whatever for its maintenance in its present form. Public opinion is daily more disgusted at the sacrifice imposed on the country for the sustenance of this tremendous burden of useless officers, soldiers, and pensioners."

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 5, 1891.

Among the sights which Bunyan represents the Interpreter as showing to his Pilgrim, one was, "a stately palace, beautiful to behold, at the sight of which, Christian was greatly delighted: he saw also upon the top thereof certain persons walking, who were clothed all in gold. At the door of the palace stood a great company of men as desirous to go in, but durst not. In the door-way stood many men in armor to keep it, being resolved to do to the man that would enter what hurt and mischief they could. At last, when every man started back for fear of the armed men, Christian saw a man of a very stout countenance come up to a man that sat there to write, saying, "Set down my name, sir," which when he had done, he saw the man draw his sword, and put a helmet upon his head, and rush toward the door upon the armed men, who laid upon him with deadly force; but the man, not at all discouraged, fell to cutting and hacking most fiercely. So after he had received and given many wounds to those that attempted to keep him out, he cut his way through all, and pressed forward into the palace; at which there was a pleasant voice heard from those that were within, saying:

'Come in, come in;

Eternal glory thou shalt win.'

So he went in, and was clothed with such garments as they."

This allegory gives a lively illustration of the important truth that there is a spiritual fight to be endured, and a warfare waged with sin and temptation, by every one who seeks eternal life. It is not the design of our Father in Heaven that our time and thoughts should be fully occupied with the concerns of this life, and that business, pleasure and amusement should absorb all the faculties of our minds. We must be enlisted as soldiers in his army, and be engaged in deadly conflict with the world, the flesh and the devil. This life is a scene of serious combat, and many have felt, that it was an awful thing to live—to have placed upon them the responsibility of so passing through this life as either to be made a partaker of the joys of heaven, or else to be forever cast away from life and hope.

A sense of this responsibility is calculated to sober the thoughtless, and to keep within proper limits the exuberant buoyancy of the young, whose attention is apt to be too much engrossed with their schemes of recreation and pleasure. Yet it is not inconsistent with a proper degree of cheerfulness, especially in those who have given up their hearts to the service of their Divine Master, and have experienced his guidance and protection, and partaken of the sweet peace which He comforts his obedient disciples.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—It is stated from Washington that the reported rejection by the Government of Venezuela of the reciprocity treaty was incorrect. The treaty was not rejected, but the Government of Venezuela sent it back and asked that certain modifications be made, for the reasons that the concessions contemplated would decrease the national revenues at least 33 per cent. This is more than the Government can afford. The Venezuelan Government is willing to concede about one-half the reduction asked, and the negotiations will be shown.

A census bulletin has been issued on Sixth Month 1st, 1891, there were in the United States, on farms of three or more acres, 14,976,017 horses, 2,246,936 mules, and 49,109 asses.

The census agent sent to Alaska has returned to San Francisco and reports the population of the Territory to be 21,000, of whom 900 are Aleuts, 5000 Indians, 10,000 Esquimaux, and 10,000 whites. These figures indicate a decrease in the native population of 8000, the agent saying that they "have learned the use of liquor from the whalers, and it is killing them off rapidly."

The Census Bureau has issued a bulletin relative to irrigation in the State of Wisconsin, showing that out of 1,000 Esquimaux, 1917 are irrigated, involving a total area of 1,506,550 acres.

Officials of the Interior Department have gone to Arizona Indian Territory, and closed up the 13 beer saloons there. It is claimed that the United States Attorney General concedes the right of the saloon keepers to sell beer, while the Secretary of the Interior takes the opposite view. This difference of opinion is in consequence of the old law which forbids the possession of spirituous liquors, instead of "intoxicating beverages," as it should do.

A despatch from Indianapolis, speaking of the failure of the natural gas supply in Indiana, says that in the beginning the supply for that city was obtained at a point 20 miles distant, but that, owing to the necessity for the opening of new wells, the gas is now brought a distance of nearly 40 miles.

A tornado struck Newark, New Jersey, on the afternoon of the 28th ult., leveling walls, unroofing buildings, and doing other damage in a track one and a quarter miles long by an eighth of a mile wide. Several persons were injured by flying debris, but no fatal casualties are reported.

A "cloud burst" deluged the eastern part of Benselear County, New York, on the night of the 27th ult., causing great destruction of property and interrupting railroad travel. Three lives were lost. A passenger on the Western Railroad near North Carolina Railroad ran off a high stone bridge near Statesville, at 2 o'clock on the morning of the 27th ult., owing to the spreading of the rails. Twenty persons are reported killed and a list of eighteen injured is given. A World special placed the number killed at 28.

Several persons were killed near Troy, Ind., on the morning of Eighth Month, 31st, caused by a broken flange. Four persons were killed and thirty injured, several of the latter will probably die. Sixty-three bodies have been recovered from the Park Place ruins in New York, and it is believed that the remainder will be found there. Twenty-one bodies remain unidentified.

Deaths reported in this city last week were 377, which is 53 less than the previous week, and 13 less than the corresponding week last year. Of the foregoing, 147 were under one year of age; 180 were males and 137 females. The chief causes of death were: cholera, 25; of consumption; 32; of heart disease; 23; of convulsions; 13; of pneumonia; 10; of inanition and 9 of cancer.

FOREIGN.—A cablegram from London, dated Eighth Month, 27th, says: Rain continued in torrents to-day in the midland and southern counties, but ceased at nightfall. Farmers have now lost all hope of a harvest.

Telegrams from all parts of the country contain the same tale of damaged crops. The havoc on fruit plantations is dreadful. The trees are being stripped of both fruit and leaves. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway is blocked by landslides, and there is incessant rain. In the mining districts work has been stopped in many mines owing to fears lest the pits might be flooded. The storm raged with great violence in the North of Wales. Two tourists were drowned while in the crests of their car.

William E. Gladstone has written a letter denouncing gambling as a formidable and growing national evil. Gladstone adds that he is ready to give his aid to any efforts aiming at the extinction or mitigation of gambling.

The Journal of the French Chambers of Commerce state that the Belgian Government proposes to declare Antwerp and other Belgian ports free ports, aiming to make Belgium the warehouse of Europe. Many French and other European firms would not hesitate to transfer their business to Belgium in order to escape the duties on articles to be re-exported.

The Berlin Beichsweiger prints the text of the projected bill to suppress drunkenness. The measure proposes to place habitual drunkards under the restraint of special guardians. The Radicals will oppose the bill as too drastic, declaring that the existing legislation is sufficient to protect the public.

The Freisinnige Zeitung has decided to oppose the main clauses of the Government's bill for the repression of drunkenness. The ultimate fate of the measure may be predicted, as it is modelled after a bill of similar import which was introduced in the Reichstag in 1881, and which was dropped in committee. The leading Ministerialists are the only supporters of the present bill, and their support is due simply to the fact that the Emperor, who is the father of the bill, is in earnest in his efforts to suppress the growing evils of intemperance.

On the 20th of the Eighth Month, a village of Vila, Russia, having been trained by the servants of its wealthy owner to drink whisky, entered a tavern and staved in a keg of whisky. The owner tried to prevent the bear from getting at the whisky, and the bear upset upon him and killed him and three children.

London, 27th ult. The following is the correspondent's say: "The Sultan has yielded to all Russia's demands respecting the Dardanelles, which henceforth will be opened to Russian vessels when closed to others. The Sultan has abjectly apologized for the recent detention of a Russian vessel, has dismissed the officers responsible therefor, and has promised an indemnity for the vessel."

On the 20th of the Eighth Month, the Chilean infantry effect a landing twenty miles above Valparaiso. An engagement followed, and the troops marched toward the city, near which, on the heights of Placida, a battle was fought on the 28th, resulting in a complete and rout of the Chilean army. Valparaiso surrendered to the victors, and Balnaceda made his escape. Later despatches announce the surrender of Santiago to the Congressional party, now no longer the insurgents. The country will probably be governed temporarily by a Junta.

The census returns for the fourth Month last, Balnaceda sent $1,000,000 in silver to Montevideo, from which place it was taken to Europe by a Government British ship. The intention was to pay for arms, ammunition and ships supplied to the Balnaceda government.

A despatch from Bermuda says that a severe storm struck the island on the 27th ult. The wind was from the Trees, walls, and telegraph and telephone wires were prostrated and the sea was very rough. It was said to be the worst storm experienced since 1880.

The census returns for Canada, presented to the Dominion Council, show an increase of 482,344, an increase of 498,534 in ten years.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Selections from the Journal of William Evans.

" Endeavoring to retire in my mind, the language of sympathy and encouragement arrested me; and after a Friend had spoken, I rose with the declaration, 'I will bring the blind by a way which they know not, and lead them in paths they have not known; I will make darkness light before them, and crooked things straight; this will I do unto them, and not forsake them, saith the Lord.' The stream of consolation flowed gently towards some present, and we had cause of thankfulness to the Leader of Israel, for favoring with a little opening of his kind, for our own comfort and strength, as well as that of others. Finding that a Preparative Meeting of Ministers and Elders was to be held next day at Starksborough, and their Monthly Meeting on Sixth-day, we went there.

" Attended the select meeting; in which after the business was nearly finished, way opened to show that every gift was derived from Him, who ascended up on high, led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men; that no man could make himself a minister; nor could he exercise the gift after receiving it, but under the direction of Him who gave it; and for this he must be exercised in patient waiting; and when anything is given him of the Lord, he is not to be hasty in offering it; as George Fox remarked, when a man receiveth anything from the Lord, he keepeth it and waiteth to feel the Lord's power go forth over the assembly. As a minister whose waits, he will be furnished, if the great Master calls upon him to minister to the people, with sufficient clearness to rise, and a word will be put into his mouth; and when he does speak, he should keep calm and deliberate, out of all excitement; communicating that which is opened to his mind by Him, who alone knoweth what's necessary for the states of the people.

" The house of our kind and intelligent friend, where we were entertained, was an agreeable lodging-place to us; the influence of education and suitable reading, in expanding the mind, living it of many illiberal, contracted notions, was visible here. But in too many cases, we find Friends of sufficient means, who have neglected the education of their children very much, or after having given them small portions, do not provide them with suitable books, to employ their leisure hours, in storing their minds with useful and instructive ideas. Labor for our subsistence is unquestionably necessary; but we may slide into the habit of pursuing our worldly concerns with such avidity, as to lose all relish for mental improvement; and for those things which are invisible and eternal. When old age overtakes this description of persons, they have few objects of thought and conversation, but the little round of worldly concerns, which have engrossed their time and attention for many years; but little interest in anything beyond their own affairs; and for want of having been engaged to lay up treasure in heaven, are often destitute of any ability to promote the welfare of religious society, and the advancement of the testimonies of Truth. Their example tends to lead those around them into the same worldly pursuits; and thus, instead of being the salt of the earth, and lights in the world, they prove stumbling-blocks to sincere enquirers after Truth and blind guides to the youth in the Society. Such persons are objects of commiseration and regret."

" If we enter into alliances with others, we may find before we expect it, that some measures will be proposed, which will violate principles that we hold dear; or in their operation land us in circumstances which will not admit of our union with them, if we retain the character of consistent Friends. I believe we had better pursue our own course, under the direction of Divine wisdom, in promoting the spread of the Redeemer's kingdom; and by lives of strict conformity to his benign precepts, we should be lights to others; and offer the most effectual stimulus to them, to go and do likewise. Each denomination would be likely to act according to the light it possesses, and they would mutually stimulate one another to zeal and diligence."

[At the Quarterly Meeting held at Lincoln, he says:]

" The testimony of the Apostle, that 'The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God, to the pulling down strongholds,' &c. had presented; and recurring with some weight, I rose with it, and endeavored to show that the weapons of the Christian's warfare remained the same at this day; and any that man could invent or use, in his own wisdom and strength, would not prove mighty through God, to the pulling down of the strongholds of sin, either in himself or in others; that Christ alone could clothe us with the 'armor of God,' by which we were to make war in righteousness against the man of sin and son of perdition. These weapons were to cast down all imaginations of self-importance, and every high thing, however specious, that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ. In the first place, experiencing this, in measure, effected in ourselves, we should be prepared to be used in his hand to promote it in others; and whatever might have been our attainments, it is necessary to be frequently stripped and searched, that we may be found in a situation to be renewedly clothed with this armor. Satan could transform himself into the appearance of an angel of light; and unless every thought of our own importance and ability was brought into obedience to Christ, we might be deceived and led into things which would not advance the Redeemer's kingdom. Even those who had known the sword of the Spirit unsheathed against the transgressing nature, and in good degree gained the victory over it, may be deceived if they do not abide in lowly watchfulness before the Lord; for the beast had seven heads and ten crowns; and after being wounded, its deadly wound was healed. I was also led to show that the Church of Christ was compared to a body having many members; each of which has its function to perform. As we kept our places in the body, every one eyeing the Head, and receiving direction from Him, we should be preserved from interfering with each other's duties; Ephraim would not envy Judah, nor would Judah vex Ephraim. When any felt the Spirit of the Lord stirring in them, as in the camp of Dan; or as fire shut up in their bowes: after waiting patiently his time, they were to deliver in his fear, what He gave them to communicate; and that which was brought forth under right authority, would raise the life in others, who were keeping their places. There were those whose voices were not frequently heard, but who maintained a steadfast travail of spirit, that all might be preserved in the right exercise of their gifts, and a harmonious action together. These were like ballast in a vessel. Several views were taken of the subject; and the young people encouraged to keep under exercise, and to be faithful to the Lord's requireing. A solemn covering-spread over the meeting. In the second meeting I made a few remarks, in which a Friend united, on the disadvantage of retaining persons in membership, merely because they requested; after they had transgressed the discipline. We often found that such were of very little use to the Society."

[At Montpelier Meeting he writes:]

" It appeared to be my place to hold up the doctrine of the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit; and that those who, through its converting power, became the adopted children of our Heavenly Father, are drawn to pray for his assistance and preservation, day by day; that according to the language of our Saviour, 'If ye being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more shall your Heavenly Father, give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him.' The subject opened in various ways; both in relation to the universality of the gift of Grace; its various operations in baptizing the soul, as fire to purge away its defilements, and render it fit to offer acceptable worship to God; and also as to the mediation of the Lord Jesus, by whom it is communicated."

"There are many goodly, well-concerned Friends in this part of the Society, who are desirous of maintaining our religious principles and discipline; but it appears to me, that there is too much fondness for words; and some, without authority, undertake to exercise the office of the ministry. Wherever there is a fondness for speaking and hearing, there will be danger that a sound judgment will not be exercised, in suppressing forward, active persons, who would intrude themselves into this sacred office. Hence a spurious ministry grows up, and the people love to have it so, rather than endure silence in our religious meetings. By this means, instead of being seasons of solemnity, imparting spiritual strength, the mind is vacant, uneasy and listless. Many seem to be very ignorant of the nature of religious exercise; and the practice of this assembling, is in danger of becoming a mere form. If the habit of public speaking without life is promoted, a multitude of such preachers may be spread over the Society, ministering death; and leading the members away from the place of true waiting and feeding, into a restless desire after words, which will never build any on the most holy faith, nor strengthen them against one sin. Such find that speaking smooth things pleases their hearers, who will cress them for their fair speeches, and extol them as fine preachers; while the true minister, who cannot flinch from speaking the truth, will feel that his testimony is not relished, and a secret prejudice is indulged against him. But there are in almost every meeting, some painful travellers who understand the language of the Spirit, and rejoice to find others speaking the same thing, and walking in the same tribulated path. These will salute each other as brethren and sisters, and rejoice in the fellowship of the Gospel; and a secret satisfaction is felt in having been instrumental in visiting the seed.

"Before leaving our lodgings I had a little opportunity with the family; in which I affectionately pressed the necessity of living loose to the world and its gratifications, and following the Lord Jesus, under the subjecting power of the cross. The general simplicity of their children was a pleasant sight; and they were encouraged to join with their parents in faithfully giving up to the requisitions of Truth, so that they might become lights in the world, and living members of the body of Christ; prepared for usefulness in his Church."

[At Easton and Saratoga Quarterly Meetings:]

"On the subject of education, and the perusal of the Holy Scriptures, I made a few remarks tending to enforce the duty of parents to watch over and rightly educate their offspring; examplifying them in bearing the daily cross, and instructing them to yield to the influences of the Spirit of Christ in their own hearts; which would lead them into self-denial, and to love to read the records of the experiences of holy men of old, and the doctrines of Christ and his Apostles."

"Strong desires prevailed in my mind, that all present might, through submission to the washings of regeneration, and by the precious blood of Christ, be found amongst the multitude that surround the throne of the Lord God, and the Lamb; who shall ascribe blessing and honor, thanksgiving and high renown to Him that hath redeemed them."

A Discourse for the Times.

"He transgresseth by wine, he is a proud man, neither keepeth at home, who enlargeth his desire as hell, and is as death, and cannot be satisfied."—Habakkuk II. 5.

I have seen it related that an English captain in India, sleeping in his tent, waked to find that a favorite young tiger which had hitherto displayed no signs of ferocity had come to him in his sleep and begun to show his wonted affection by licking his hand with his tongue. As he did so that rough member gradually wore through the skin and drew blood to the surface. When at length the sleeper was roused by the growing sharpness of the pain, he beheld his recent pet already transformed—his savage nature inflamed by the first scent and taste of blood. He lapped no longer with the cool and gentle warmth of affection, but with ferocious energy; his eyeballs glared, and the aroused sleeper knew at a glance that in those few moments of sleep the dormant ferocity of the animal had awakened, that a new passion had inflamed him, and spreading through his veins had prepared the gentle pet of an hour ago to kill and devour like all his kind.

Examples like this are found not only in the brute creation. Deep and dangerous passions are imbedded in our nature and link us with the beast. This one advantage we possess, that God has given us the power to control ourselves; to hold desire and impulse under the restraint of reason and of conscience, and thus by harnessing these turbulent agents to the yoke of truth, reason, and law, to transform them into safe and useful servants. This power over ourselves God has bestowed on every man. This glorious power to rise above the brute and be above him, to live superior to the passions that rage in our hearts, to the impulses that seethe in our nature, is the common possession of us all, and the spot of shame that burns on so many foreheads and disturbs so many of our consciences is that we have abused those mighty gifts of self-control, that we have loved better the enjoyment of passion than the rule of conscience and of reason.—Kinsley Twining.

A Universal Teacher.—The principle of the Light of Christ in the heart is a fundamental doctrine of Quakerism; by it they mean that spiritual saving Light, spoken of by the Apostle John: "The Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world."—1 John 1: 9. It is the grace or Spirit of God, or Light of Christ in us, which, as a Divine principle, is acknowledged by all Christians, that the Quakers lay a much greater stress upon, with the varied operations of it as a heavenly guide in the heart. They believe, as before observed, that a measure of this Spirit as a universal teacher is given to every man, and is an efficient and unerring guide for his spiritual concerns; he who resists it quenches it; he who attends to it is in the way of obtaining the redemption purchased by the sacrifice of Christ, our Saviour; by it their ministers are alone qualified for the spiritual office; it is the talent intrusted to each servant, with which he is to "occupy" till his Lord comes; and in proportion to his improvement of this talent, so will be his reward. They consider it, therefore, as "the primary and infallible rule of faith and manners," and the Scriptures, or inspired writings, only as a secondary means of instruction. The Scriptures are only a declaration of the fountain and not the fountain itself, but whatever doctrine is contrary to their testimony must be regarded as false.—One not a member.

For "THE FRIEND."

Letters from a Travelling Ornithologist.

[The letter from Arizona, published in the last two numbers of THE FRIEND, commences with the departure from El Paso, Texas. Since publication was commenced we have received a letter written from El Paso, which gives some interesting particulars not mentioned in the other letter.]

EL PASO, TEXAS.

On the evening of Sixth Mo. 9th, I wound a twenty-four hours journey from San Antonio preceded by an eight hours ride from Corpus Christi, at El Paso. Before going on to Arizona I wished to take this opportunity of going into Mexico, and if the birds and country justified it, to do a couple of days collecting. My first wish was gratified this morning by taking a long drive about the City and suburbs of Paso del Norte; and from what I saw of it, together with an early walk up the near est Peak of the Argosa Mountains, have decided to take the 4.45 train for Tucson this afternoon. Birds are very scarce excepting in the populous irrigated districts, where shooting is out of the question. To give you some idea of El Paso and its surroundings let me take you up the mountain which I ascended this a. m. Striking northward about a quarter of a mile across the sandy level upon which the town is built we pass a few one-story brick and adobe houses and an imposing Public-School building all of quite recent erection; and eluding the number less Mexican dogs, start a slow ascent up the barren foot hills along an old quarry trail that seems to wind in the right direction.

The sand soon merges into stony ridges and a conglomeration of pebbles, limestone, trap and all the debris of the rocky ridge that rises above—grind, and ring, and rattle under one's feet. The dwarf sage, prickly pear, and Chapparral bushes of the sandy tracts, in like manner give place to cacti of many and beautiful forms, and to a small species of agave, which disputes possession with blooming euphorbias, from four to eight feet high. While all these plants are very noticeable to one passing among them, their size and color and comparative scarcity have no effect whatever to relieve the brownish gray monotony of the landscape in this rainless region. As one ascends farther, and gains the southern end of the mountain's ridge proper, and begins to climb with greater care and agility over the rough surfaces of huge rocks with edges tilted against the sky at an angle of sixty degrees terminating in many places in a long ridge so sharp one cannot set foot on it, but must crawl along the side, then one ceases to despise the mountains of Texas, and finds it no child's play to mount one. However we push and scramble on following instinctively the many tiny goat-trails, which here seem to converge into a common course upward, and finding the peaks still receding above and beyond as we rise, seek a convenient stone, and sit down.

Naturally we look back over the course we have taken for a birds-eye view of the valley of the Rio Grande. The river, two years ago shrunken to a few isolated pools of water at this season, now rushes almost madly along its tortuous course about the valley, as if bent on revenge for being pent so close in its run through the mountains. At the head of this fertile plain lies on one side El Paso, on the other Paso del Norte, at the opposing feet of the divided mountain-chain. Northwestward a streak of vivid green again contrasts with the gray monotony of surrounding mountain and plain beyond the pass, and we are looking, not at Texas, nor at Mexico, but at Nuevo Mexicano! Lost in the shade of its gardens, groves and cottonwoods, Paso del Norte appears insignificant enough in comparison with her American rival. But my drive through the town and its surroundings showed plainly that in point of numbers, whether of houses or people, the Mexican town exceeds ours. Had I mounted one of the many peaks which top the grand pile of mountains overshadowing Paso del Norte, the view would have been a father one in both senses, but while numerically and agriculturally the odds favor the Mexican, the seven or eight hundred buildings of El Paso represent an amount of wealth and intelligent industry and growth which laughs at all competition.

As you may have guessed, both these towns owe their existence to the Rio Grande River. If the drouth of three years ago had continued until now, I doubt if I could have induced the conductor to let me off the train. Through Crockett, Presidio, Pecos and El Paso counties or rather west of Spoffard Junction on the S. P. R. R., you rise to an elevation of above 5,000 feet; at Paisano in Presidio County, is the maximum, with ridges overtopping of two or three thousand feet more. In most of this vast area, equal to all New England outside of Maine, the drouth is something terrible; even in the valleys where grass grows for a short season, and they have cattle by tens of thousands and hundreds of windmills. The cattle and the grass yearly die of thirst in quantities which only a Mexican could speak of without trembling. Had one told me this of Kansas, Arizona, Colorado or New Mexico, I might have believed it, but when we are asked to stretch the vast territory of uncertain rainfall into Texas and Mexico, the question of the agricultural impossibilities becomes, with the increasing population of our country, no light matter. Generally the irrigation of this small spot and those above it in the Rio Grande Valley, completely drains the river, so small is the summer supply of water from the mountains of New Mexico and Colorado. The floods of the past two years reached their culmination about five weeks ago in this valley, and thousands of acres of growing crops of wheat, barley, oats, and vegetables in the bottoms were flooded as in the Mississippi Valley when I passed through it at that time. On crossing to Paso del Norte, we find a body of raging red water in two channels, one of which was formerly the main irrigating canal, but by the impetuosity of the flood has been excavated to a varying depth of fifteen to twenty feet, and the other, the main channel, is two hundred yards wide and of the same depth.

The still half-submerged flats, where stood the adobe huts of the Mexicans, who cultivated them, wear a doleful and tragic air; all vestige of vegetable and animal life is wanting under the sea of red mud and stagnant water, and those huts which by their more careful construction or greater elevation had not wholly melted, thrust up here and there a bit of wall, or rafter, or eucalyptus fencing, as if to show the place, and move the compassion of the passer-by. Once thoroughly across, the farms and haciendas wear a most prosperous look. My driver first took me into the four hundred year old? (2) Catholic Church with its carved rafters, images, and the little dusky maid who motioned that I remove my hat, and offered paper nosebags for a penny; then along tortuous adobe-walled streets of windowless one-storied houses and stores to the barracks, a fine Americanized brick building, alive and bustling with armed and mounted Mexicans in gorgeous array. Then across the Plaza where the annual bull-fights come off, but now cleared of everything that betokened that brutality, save the trampled ring that marked the site of the line-posts of the enclosure. After that we wound through a maze of small farms and plantations enclosed in adobe-fences, and euphorbias and cactus hedges, each with its ditch of muddy water spanning or bordering the roadside, and bordered in turn with osage-pear, willows, and cottonwoods, or lines of pear, fig, apple, peach and apricot trees. The crops of melons, beets, turnips, yams and potatoes were alternated by vineyards and fields of ripening barley, wheat, and oats, and we passed loaded teams of alfalfa and burros going city-wards with laden panniers of fruit, and greens, and firewood.

(To be concluded.)

To the Editor of "THE FRIEND."

As our Yearly Meeting has furnished its members with copies of its valuable "Rules of Discipline," that all may read, and be familiar therewith, I feel it right at this time to call attention to two portions thereof: "Civil Government," and "Oaths."

My reason for thus alluding to these subjects, which appear to be intimately connected is, that having given my vote for one of our members as candidate for a County Office, I was surprised, when necessitated to transact some business with that office, to find that the administering of the oath is one of the duties thereof.

As I know that other of our members also gave their political support in this case, I feel it my duty thus to refer to this subject. How can Friends maintain the Discipline when they aid such delinquents to procure positions, the performance of any of the duties whereof makes them liable to disowment?

It seems to me an incumbent duty for us to know to what duties such candidates (when members of our Society) will be subject, before we thus aid in placing them therein.

Why He Gave Up the Trade.—A young man, a spirit merchant, built a large house in the country and was retiring from business. When he first told me of his intention, I remarked to him: "Surely the spirit traffic is a paying business when you are able to retire from it soon." "No," he answered, it is not that, I have retired from it through fear; and then he went on to tell me that he was a wholesale merchant and sold to many retail dealers. He kept a diary in which he entered all the names and ages of his customers, and when and how they died; and he said "I watched with deep regret many of those who came in this business gradually slipping downward. When I called on some before eleven in the morning, they were so stupefied by drink that they were scarcely able to conduct business. One morning, on looking through my diary, I was struck with the number of names I had entered there as having died suddenly through the effect of strong drink. From that moment I shut the book and resolved that I would be done with the demon that was bringing so many promising young men suddenly and early to fill drunkards' graves."—The British Friend.

FOR "THE FRIENDS."

True love's chiefest joy is life dying unto that which mars and hinders us from "attaining." Our "righteous self" shrinks from death and suffering." For as much then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also himself (seriously reflect) likewise took part of the same (flesh and blood) that through death He might destroy him that has the power of death, that is the devil. "God cannot be tempted with evil," but "the same flesh and blood" must necessarily partake in the first Adam's susceptibility to sin and consequently also to temptations. It was in the flesh he became the second Adam; through death He destroyed," or overcame the first Adam's susceptibility to sin, the first Adam partook of the fruit and died; the second Adam, when He was tempted in the wilderness and hungered did not partake, yet where sin abounds grace did much more abound; so that we are without excuse. If God is for us, who can be against us? God is for the Seed's life, as the promise is to the Seed, not seeds, as of many, but to one," even Christ who must be our all and in all.

He exemplified all his precepts—all parables vanished away, for the reality, as the mind of the chosen twelve were developed to comprehend some of the deeper spirituality, shall I say of the laws? for not one jot or tittle shall pass away till it be all fulfilled. Yet the time came when they said, "now speakest thou plainly and speakest no proverb, now we know that thou knowest all things."—John xvi: 29-30. But while Christ tells them, Luke viii: 10, "unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God, but the rest in parables;" yet how often after that does He upbraid them, even for "hardness of heart," "slow to learn," and finally "I have yet many things to tell you but ye cannot bear them now." &c., "whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap." There never can be any true progress in the rebuilding of the walls of our Zion, until we, the fathers and mothers, become ourselves diligent scholars in the school of Christ. How shall we learn of Christ if our mind is not with Him? How shall we know his voice from the voice of the stranger? But by a continuation of having the mind settled upon God and closely observing what the end will be. In all God's works life precedes form—but no life can exist without a form, and it is the life that makes the form honorable. When the life is gone, earth in all its forms sinks and returns to dust. Therefore it is an indispensable necessity truly to learn to wait in the life, and as we are "able to bear," we will little by little be taught the "mysteries."

As we progress in our passive participation in the work of atonement, the Gospel meaning of death and resurrection is unfolded, "for if we died with Him, we shall also be raised with Him unto newness of life." I have said where there is temptation, there is susceptibility alike to meet the temptation, in the will of the natural man. If Adam had died to that temptation, and continued to die to them he would have witnessed an arising up into a state of manhood in God, therefore the second Adam keeping the susceptibility of that nature in subjection and obedience grew in wisdom and knowledge and favor with God and man. Now from his conception, He was born not of blood nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man but of God.—John i: 12-13. We must here observe the distinct difference between Christ, the only begotten Son, and his brethren: the Godhead dwelt in Him bodily from his birth, therefore his body, the sacrifice for the sins of the whole world, was kept pure and undefiled. If he had sinned, He would in the similitude of the high priest under the law, have had to offer up a sacrifice for his own sins; but by dying to the temptation He giveth an example to those truly begotten of the word of God that liveth and abideth forever, to follow his steps in resisting temptation. Sin lies in yielding, for the Apostle called them "Blessed" that endure temptation, so children of the new dispensation are such as "by reason of use" have their senses practised to discern between good and evil; but ere this practice is attained we "have all sinned and fallen short of the glory of God;" therefore all men differ from Christ in that, in Him no sinful nature was developed, there was consequently no body of death brought forth in his natural man, but of us it is said, "As death came into the world because of sin, so death passed upon all because all have sinned;" therefore Christ is the only sacrifice for the sins of the whole world, and here stands "separate from sinners," the wonderful Emmanuel, God with us, at the same time tempted in all points like us; born of a virgin under the law, there could be no possibility of doubt of his actual manhood, according to nature of the seed of Abraham, the Son of David, yet in spirit his Lord; it is in that unchangeable spirit from which the marvellous revelations have always harmoniously proceeded, always testifying the same thing, therefore the Apostle Paul in his letter to the Hebrew Church who had the law and the covenant, gives his exposition and explanation on the atonement and Christ's high-priesthood in a way to meet them upon the grounds of their own ideas. As Paul addressed them upon the ground of actual knowledge, so let us fear therefore, lest haply a promise being left of entering into rest, any one of you should seem to come short of it, for indeed we have had good tidings preached unto us even as they, &c. Now as the word of hearing did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it (the pharisees and doctors of the law), it is my fervent desire in examining the sacred pages to receive a true understanding of it from God himself. We may easily deceive ourselves and others; God we cannot deceive; therefore in an open teachable frame of mind, after over twenty years of deep research and investigations of the views of all claiming the name of Friends, I write the following thesis as my own conscientious conviction, believing them to be in harmony with the truth held by primitive Friends:

1st. "That by Jesus Christ were all things created, and by Him do all things exist, therefore He is the true light, the light that enlighteneth every man coming into the world." "Existing" and enlightened definitely includes a conscious knowledge of right and wrong, therefore all being enlightened, &c., all are responsible to God for "the Gift received," therefore the true light is the fundamental, the first principle of life and salvation to all, because all are partakers."

2d. "Every Scripture inspired of God is also profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction, which is in righteousness; that the man of God may be complete, furnished completely unto every good work," and they are able to make wise unto salvation," and "testify of Christ." As the inspired writings are known but to a limited extent in all ages, they are the secondary rule of faith and practice, ever harmonious in correspondence with the true revelation of the spirit of God in all ages, and as the natural man comprehended not the things of the spirit of God, &c., so, without a measure of the same inspiration, we can have no more true knowledge and judgment of things pertaining to true godliness and the promises given, than the Jews who searched the Scriptures, thinking in them to have eternal life, &c., and yet came not unto Christ.

3d. "That the creation was subjected to vanity not of its own will, but by reason of Him who subjected it in hope, &c., Rom. viii: 20. It is one thing to be a subject, it is another to be subjected; but the consciousness of right and wrong, grace and strength, would have been given, and will now, if we freely choose to do right. Created to be "subjected," the temptation always was and is to aspire to attain to a freedom not designed by the Creator. Therefore the nearer the true worshipper under the gospel dispensation approaches his Maker in the true spirit of humility, the clearer and deeper our sense of our entire subjective attitude, "that without me ye can do nothing."

4th. As God is unchangeable, "I am the Lord, I change not," so his first dispensation to his own created and purchased children is unchangeable; the first covenant stands in the conscious knowledge of what is good and what is evil, that covenant we break "if we say we have not sinned," &c. Therefore, as God is unchangeable, he created man subject to change according to our own choice, therefore responsible for our own present and future state, and unavoidably passing through a daily dying either to that which is good or evil.

5th. Our fervency in spirit to cleave to that which is good, leads up into the second covenant, which stands in living, active obedience to the fullest measure of God's manifested will written on tables of flesh: "I come to do thy will." That can only be accomplished as the mind abides in the vine. In this covenant, the new song is learned, "Worthy art thou to take the Book and to open the seals thereof, for thou wast slain and didst purchase unto God with thy blood, men of every tribe and tongue and people and nation, and madest them to be unto our God a kingdom and priests, and they reign upon the earth." To reign upon the earth is unavoidably connected with living obedience to the denying of self, not to be conformed to the world, but to be transformed in our minds, that we may with increasing clearness know what is that good and acceptable will of God, "To him that overcometh, will I give to eat of the tree of life, and make him a pillar to go out no more."

WEST BRANCH, Eighth Month 3, 1891.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

A Drive in North Carolina.

Walking in the country, more than driving, seems especially suited to the study of nature. But nevertheless, even in a swiftly going buggy, one who observes may learn much of nature's face around him or her.

Thus in the middle of Eighth Month, when opportunity offered for a drive of a few miles, I was quite ready to avail myself of another chance to traverse a well-known road, though the primary object in going was not the study of nature.

The first part of our way led through forests of pine and oak and sweet gum, otherwise known by the high-sounding name of liquidam- bar styraciflua. Numberless bushes fill up the spaces between the trees—gallberry, huckleberry and andromeda nitida, with its smooth ever-green leaves, and red veins and branches. By the wayside I noticed the pretty and suitably named mist flower, conoclinium celestinum though as yet there were only a few clusters of its delicate pale blue blossoms showing. It is one of the large order Compositae, which furnishes so many of our autumn flowers. Ever now the golden rod and some of the pretty light blue asters are appearing, and the marshmallows of a southern species, nearly allied to these, was blooming freely in the once cleared ground beyond.

Here some twenty years or more ago, stood a saw-mill, now no trace remains, even the heap of saw-dust which marked the spot is entirely covered, and all around there is springing up a young forest of pine trees.

The handsome deer grass (Rhexia Virginica) blooms abundantly hereabouts, and here too grows the exquisite white-fringed Orchis (Habenaria blephariglottis) and its sister the yellow fringed Orchis of the species Ciliaris. The former is found in great profusion in some partly cleared fields. Another orchis which I noticed for the first time I afterwards discovered to be Habenaria Integra. A graceful vine with a large handsome lavender-colored flower of the Pulse family, attracted my attention, and at the first opportunity I intend to discover its identity.

We soon swept around a curve in the road and passed the house of an old colored man. He is quite a doctor in these parts and claims to have Indian blood in his veins. The house he built almost entirely himself, hewing the trees from the forest to make sills and rafters.

Soon his little farm was left behind and we were again in the woods, and in a few moments we emerged into the cleared country beyond. On either hand were green fields of cotton and corn, and occasionally we passed a sweet-potato patch. The houses were wroden structures, for the most part, and in front of some of these were creditable attempts at flower-garden.

The day was very warm, and in the roadway lounged pigs, almost too lazy to move away from the wheels. In a ditch near by grew some plants of the Jussiaea Decurrens, its yellow flowers and three-sided pods being in great measure obscured by the numerous green leaves. It is named after the botanist Jussieu, and as I looked at it I remembered a story I lately read of him, showing his attachment for rare plants. He was travelling through a desert country, the supply of water was falling so that each one in the company was allowed only half a gill a day. But the botanist having with him a plant whose life he wished to preserve, used part of his own meagre portion to water the roots of his treasure, and in this way he saved it.

Some one had picked a cardinal flower, Loelia cardinalis, and had left it behind on the road. I looked in vain for any other of its kind, as it is scarce here.

In front of several of the farm-houses grows the Mimosa, a Southern tree, with fern-like leaves. Its downy-looking blossoms, which grow in clusters, are now nearly gone. The only conspicuous part of them is the long, pink-tipped stamens, but nevertheless they are very pretty and sweet. It is one of the order Leguminosae, and allied, I believe, to the sensitive plant, from which, I suppose, it takes its name.

Soon we arrived at our destination, and later on in the day we drove homewards. S. G. F.

NORTH CAROLINA.

THE REFORMER.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

All grim and soiled and brown with tan,
I saw a Strong One in his wrath,
Smiting the goddess shrines of man
Along his path.

The Church, beneath her trembling dome,
Essayed in vain her ghostly charm;
Wealth shook within his gilded home
With strange alarm.

Fraud from his secret chambers fled
Before the sunlight bursting in;
Sloth drew her pillow o'er her head
To drown the din.

"Spare" Art implored, "on holy pile,"
That grand, old time-worn turret-spare,"
Meek Reverence, kneeling in the aisle,
Cried out, "Forbear!"

Gray-headed Use, who, deaf and blind,
Gorped for his old accustomed stone,
Leaned on his staff, and wept to find
His seat o'erthrown.

Young Romance raised his dreamy eyes,
O'erhung with paly locks of gold,—
"Why smite," he asked in sad surprise,
"The fair, the old?"

Yet louder rang the Strong One's stroke,
Yet nearer flashed his axe's gleam;
Shuddering and sick of heart I woke
As from a dream.

I looked; aside the dust-cloud rolled,—
The Water ceased the Builder top;
Up-springing from the ruined Old
I saw the New.

'Twas but the ruin of the bad,—
The wasting of the wrong and ill;
Whatever of good the old time had,
Was living still.

Calm grew the brows of him I feared;
The frown which awed me passed away,
And left behind a smile which cheered,
Like breaking day.

The grain grew green on battle plains,
O'er swarded war-mounds grazed the cow.
The slave stood forging from his chains
The spade and plough.

Where frowned the fort, pavilions gay,
And cottage windows, flower-entwined,
Looked out upon the peaceful bay,
And hills behind.

Through vine-wreathed eups with wine once red,
The light on a rimming crystal fell,
Drawn, sparkling from the rivulet head
And mossy well.

Through prison walls, like Heaven-sent hope;
Fresh breezes blest, and sunbeams strayed,
And with the idle gallows-rose
The young child played.

Where the doomed victim in his cell
Had counted o'er the weary hours,
Glad school-girls, answering to the bell,
Came crowned with flowers.

Grown wiser for the lesson given,
I fear no longer, for I know
That where the share is deepest driven
The best fruits grow.

The outworn rite, the old abuse,
The pious fraud, transparent grown,
The good held captive in the use
Of wrong alone.

These wait their doom, from that great law
Which makes the past time serve to-day;
And fresher life the world shall draw
From their decay.

O, backward-looking son of time;
The new is old, the old is new,
The cycle of a change sublime
Still sweeping through.

So wisely taught the Indian seer;
Destroying Seva, forming Brahm,
Who wake by turns Earth's love and fear,
Are one, the same.

Idly as thou, in that old day
Thou mournest, did thy sire repine:
So, in his time, thy child grown gray
Shall sigh for thine.

But life shall on and upward go;
The eternal step of Progress heats
To the great anthem, calm and slow,
Which God repeats.

Take heart!—The Water builds again;
A charmed life old Goodness hath.
The tares may perish,—but the grain
Is not for death.

God works in all things; all obey
His first propulsion from the night;
Wake thou and watch!—the world is gray
With morning light.

THE WINNER OF THE RACE.

BY SUSAN MAER SPALDING.

I saw them start, an eager throng,
All young and strong and fleet;
Joy lighted up their beaming eyes,
Hope sped their flying feet.
And one among them so excelled
In courage, strength, and grace,
That all men gazed and smiled and cried:
"The winner of the race!"

The way was long, the way was hard;
The golden goal gleamed far Above the steep and distant hills—
A shining pilot star.
On, on they sped, but while some fell,
Some faltered in their speed;
He, upon whom all eyes were fixed
Still proudly kept the lead.

But ah, what folly! See, he stops
To raise a fallen child,
To place it out of danger's way
With kiss and warning mild.
A fainting comrade claims his care,
Once more he turns aside;
Then stays his strong, young steps to be
A feeble woman's guide.

And so, wherever duty calls,
Or sorrow or distress,
He leaves his chosen path to aid,
To comfort, and to bless.
Though men may pity, blame or scorn,
No censure rang may swell
The soul who yields for love the place
It might have won so well.

The race is o'er. 'Mid shouts and cheers
I saw the victor crowned;
Some wore fame's laurels, some love's flowers,
Some brows with gold were bound.
But all unknown, unheeded, stood—
Heaven's light upon his face—
With empty lands and uncrowned head,
The winner of the race.

PEACE.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Within the sky's deep, shoreless tide
Twilight has silently unfriended
Her dusky, noiseless sails to glide
Peace-laden round the weary world.
She lights her way by not a star;
We follow through the magic gloom;
Familiar places seem afar,
That all but touch us with their bloom.

The laugh and song together fall;
Birds call but faintly through the pines;
Slow dips the oar and softly trails
The troller's unrewarded lines.

And one is glad: she has not kept Relationship to Saxon blood
Whose cruel, warring will has swept Through generations like a flood;
And ever stirs for helpless prey,
Still loth to let the struggle cease;
Though all life loves its little day
And earth and sky are sighing, "Peace!"
—Fannie B. Dumon.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Eastern Shore of Chesapeake Bay.

A recent visit to the peninsula lying between Delaware and Chesapeake Bays, which includes the State of Delaware and parts of Maryland and Virginia, has awakened considerable interest in a section of country with which the writer was before much unacquainted.

In going south by rail, soon after passing Wilmington, the traveller enters a low-lying, flat country, belonging to the Tertiary formation of geologists, and consisting of deposits of clay and sand, which are constantly varying in their characters. This formation covers the southern part of New Jersey, and the coast line of Maryland, Virginia and the Carolinas; and extends along the borders of the Gulf of Mexico. It everywhere bears the marks of having been subjected to the action of water, by which the sands and gravels were rolled and pulverized, and deposited in beds and the clays sometimes separated from them and placed in layers of their own, and at others more or less commingled.

Geology teaches us that there was a time when the entire crust of our globe consisted of hard and compact rocks of a crystalline texture. The formation of the soil which now covers these in great part, was by the breaking down of these crystalline masses. It commenced in the formation of small clefts and fissures which extend through the body of the rocks, under the effects of heat. Crystalline rocks are all an aggregation of different minerals, which expand and contract unequally by changes of heat. This unequal expansion and contraction produces the small cracks already spoken of.

These cracks become filled with water from the autumn rains. The first frost of winter freezes this, and the expansion (irresistible in force) still further disintegrates the rocks.

Besides these mechanical forces the chemical action of the carbonic acid and water of the air tends to break up the primitive rocks, and to produce from their decomposition the sand and clay which are everywhere present.

In addition to the mineral ingredients of the soil, there is always present in those which are at all productive a certain portion of organic matter derived from plants and animals, which have before existed. This is called "humus."

This broad belt of land along the Atlantic coast, has all been deposited there by the action of running water. The gravel and coarser sand would naturally fall to the bottom first, and the lighter particles would be carried further, especially the particles of clay suspended in the muddy water. These deposits would be still further affected by tides and eddies—so that we might reasonably expect to find what we really do see—a great diversity in the soil in different parts of the peninsula.

The State Geologist of Maryland enumerates several kinds, which decidedly differ from each other.

Part of the peninsula, he states, is covered with a white soil, of firm compact texture and level surface, which holds moisture with great retentiveness. It is soft and plastic when wet, and hard and unyielding when dry. In its original state it is nearly always covered with White Oak timber, and hence is called "White Oak soil." The sub-soil is a true white clay (silicate of alumina and protoxide of iron.) The sand diffused through it is in a finely divided state, so that it feels but slightly gritty when rubbed through the fingers. To this fineness of the sand is owing the almost infinite number of small spaces between the grains, which give it great powers of absorbing moisture and gases from the air.

While it contains many of the elements of fertility, it is deficient in lime, so that it is greatly helped by dressings of that substance.

What are called "Black Gum Swamp soils" are those found in bottom lands and in what were formerly marshes, and consist largely of vegetable matter and sand, with small proportions of other materials. They are very productive of corn, but what does not flourish on them, owing to their porous texture.

The light sandy soils are characterized by their coarse, gritty texture and their porosity. They are deficient in clay and iron, and the sand is too coarse to absorb much from the atmosphere. The State Geologist recommends for their improvement that crops of grass should be allowed to grow on them, unmolested by cattle. When this decays it will dissolve much of the mineral matter in the soil that otherwise would not be taken up by the plants.

Some of the richest soils of the peninsula are those containing a considerable proportion of clay.

The Reports on the Geological Survey of Maryland, contain frequent references to the extensive accumulations of oyster shells, believed to have been made on the site of ancient Indian settlements. One of the most extensive of these is found at Long Point on the Wicomico. The deposit extends nearly a quarter of a mile along the shore, and several hundred yards inland, and in thickness varies from three to nine feet. Similar deposits of smaller size, are found in many parts of the peninsula, and are spoken of as one of the resources for enriching the land with lime.

I found a more productive country than I had expected. It was cheering to see the Apple and Pear orchards loaded with fruit. The Peach trees were not so uniformly full, for while some were weighed down with peaches, others had comparatively few. Yet the whole production of this delicious fruit it was thought would be large. We observed a number of orchards, recently planted, showing that the farmers were not discouraged with the future prospects of this crop.

Besides fruits, the principal crops raised are wheat and corn. It is the custom with farmers in that section to go over the land once in three years—following the wheat with grass, and that with corn. Much of the corn and of the wheat looked well. The latter was cut and shocked, and was waiting the advent of the steam thrasher. Wheat there is never hauled under shelter, but is threshed in the fields and hauled direct from thence to market.

Owing to the fitness of the land and the lowness of its elevation, the country along Chesapeake Bay is remarkably indented with rivers, creeks and arms of the bay, which penetrate deeply into the adjoining lands, and furnish convenient water transportation for much of the produce of the farmers. Indeed, these conveniences determined the locations of many of the early settlers, whose farms were selected along the rivers, and who made extensive use of boats as a means of communication.

George Fox mentions attending a general meeting at Tredhaven Creek (on the outskirts of the present town of Easton) where many people gathered, and says, "There were so many boats at that time passing upon the river, that it was almost like the Thames."

Repentance.

"Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."—
Luke xlii: 3.

Our salvation is all of grace through faith, which itself is the gift and work of God on the heart. It is "the goodness of God that leadeth thee to repentance," and grants thee "repentance unto life." Repentance is the first portion of the path of faith, and here and there through the wilderness, where stray lambs may be found, are by-paths of repentance, always leading into the one safe path. Repentance may be likened unto the seedling time, wherein the Heavenly husbandman, by ploughing and harrowing the fields, prepares for the crop of golden grain. By this means the land is prepared, and hearts that are contrited and humbled before God, hear and understand the word which the Son of Man soweth in their hearts, and which bears fruit, some one hundred, some sixty, some thirty fold.

God, who "not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance"—(1 Pet. iii: 9);—is long-suffering to usward, and waiteth to be gracious. "Christ came into the world to save sinners"—(1 Tim. i: 15); and he now comes to all who are dead in trespasses and sins, and in this condition we all are or have been for if "Christ died for all, then we're all dead." (2 Cor. v: 14).

He who alone searcheth all hearts, knoweth the state of the uregenerate man, for how can man know it, since "the heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked," it is prone to evil as the sparks fly upward. Satan, who rules in the kingdom of darkness and death, will not disquiet men's minds from serving him, neither will he enlighten their eyes to behold their miserable estate; were it not then for the begettings of a new life from above, man would for ever sleep the sleep of death. It must then be the inshinings of "the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, that doth shine unto them." (2 Cor. iv. 4.) Being then in some measure quickened by the Spirit, for "it is the spirit that quickeneth," (John vi: 63), and this life and power comes with the light, evidences of this spiritual life are found. The heart is subdued, and made tender; spiritual faculties of feeling, seeing, and hearing are bestowed, whereby sinners have a sense of the burden and bitter bondage of sin, and the renewed soul perceiving its sad state is filled with a godly sorrow.

Yet is this sorrow not without a secret joy, upholding the soul in this conflict. It is a small measure, and like in kind of his, who being himself without sin, yet as a sympathizing Saviour to his children, became "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief."

Then do they become willing, to forsake the flesh-pots of Egypt, and to hear and obey the voice of the deliverer. And God who has thus begun a good work in them, will perfect it "to the praise of the glory of his grace." Now doth the Good Shepherd who gave his life for his sheep, know how gently to lead his flock, not asking of them more than they can bear. Having had their secret sins set in the light of his countenance, they must acknowledge their unfitness for the enjoyment of his presence, and having a sense of their own utter helplessness, they are brought to mourn over their sins, and to see the need of a Saviour. God who hath given "his good spirit to instruct them," and who delighteth to hear and to answer the prayer of the needy, putteth unto them breathings of his own spirit. As they thus mourn over their sins, a true confession and godly sorrow for sin is experienced, and the soul draws nigh to the footstool of Divine mercy, awaiting the extension of the sceptre of his favor.

"Behold! sorrow may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of Him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace." (Is. lii: 7.) This joy and peace in believing is "the blossoming of that everlasting sign, that shall not be cut off." (Is. liii: 13.)

In the full exercise of faith, we are often led into service with our fellow men, but the work of repentance is more peculiarly confined to the individual soul and its maker; and unwise is that man who, with un sanctified hands, intermeddles here.

When as yet the visited ones have not beheld the King in his beauty, yet have they believed his messenger, and have submitted their hearts to the preparation for the King's reception. Should the Lord unduly delay his appearing, surely all souls would fall before Him; but He knoweth our needs, and how much we are able to bear, and will not do so. "A bruised reed shall He not break, and the smoking flax shall He not quench; He shall bring forth judgment unto truth." (Isaiah xlii: 3.) Wait patiently for the Lord, always ready to step forward at the putting forth of his strength. But, O trust in the Lord, for "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him." (Psalm ciii: 13.) And his end and purpose is not that we may be weak in the faith, but "strong in the faith, giving glory to God." (Rom. iv: 20.)

Repentance and faith are of such a nature, that there can be no true repentance, without the exercise of a measure of faith, neither can there be any true saving faith, without an accompanying repentance, for he that hath no burden nor sense of sin, needeth not a Saviour; so doth Christ say: "Joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons which need no repentance." (Luke xv: 7.) But the Lord Jesus Christ comes as a Saviour, "not to call the righteous, but sinners, to repentance." (Luke v: 32.)

As we have need of faith, until the conflict with sin is over, and victory crowns the banner of the cross, so whilst temptation endures and men may stumble, may God grant unto us penitence. And may it not be that when the Lord needeth any for a yet weightier service in his house, though they have received remission of sins, and been partakers of the joys of reconciliation, that it may at times seem good to Him to deepen the work of refinement, which they were not once able to bear, like Job who was "a perfect and upright man," was led to complain, "Thou writest bitter things against me, and makest me to possess the iniquities of my youth." (Job xlii: 26.) Oh! precious are God's dealings with his people! and we are more and more constrained to acknowledge, "Lord, thou hast wrought all our works in us." (Isaiah xxvi: 12.) "All thy works shall praise thee." (Psalm cxlv: 10.)

The intention of this writing is not to "offend against the generation of thy children," but gently to encourage the younger disciples to patiently endure all the spiritual exercises and travails of spirit through which it may please the unslumbering Shepherd of Israel to lead them. As repentance is an individual work, and one of its great ends is to lead us to look away from man, and to the Lord alone, from whom cometh salvation, if we look to others, as to the hills on either side of us, no refreshing rivulets may trickle down their sides, and it will not do to compare too closely the path the Lord leads thee in, with that of others, but rather look to the fruits of righteousness, and to the enjoyment of the presence of thy Lord, for "these shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign, that shall not be cut off." (Isaiah lv: 13.)

Locusts in Algeria.—In his last report on Algerian agriculture, Sir Lambert Playfair remarks on the spread of locusts from the eastern part of the province, to which they had hitherto for the most part confined their ravages, to the central regions. There are two distinct species, belonging to separate genera, each of which has very marked peculiarities. Their habits are quite different, the former generally arriving suddenly in the spring, in immense lights, and devastating the green crops. The females penetrate deeply into the moist earth, and deposit their eggs, from eighty to ninety in number, inclosed in a cocoon. Two months afterwards the young locusts or crickets are hatched. They grow rapidly, get their wings in 45 days, and then continue their career of devastation far in advance.

The other species appear in a winged state in summer. They also ravage what green exists at that season, and the females deposit their eggs at a much less depth than the others, generally on rocky ground. The cocoons do not contain more than thirty or forty eggs, and they remain without being hatched till the spring of the following year. The first species inhabits Central Africa the most favorable circumstances for its development; the second, in more temperate countries, such as the Mediterranean region, and even the Caucasus, Crimea and Asia Minor. It is the latter that has ravaged Algeria during the last few years. Fortunately man is not the only enemy of the locust. Starlings and larks feed eagerly on the eggs. Wagon loads of these birds used constantly to be sent to the French market, but now the killing of them has been prohibited in the Province of Constantine. The larvae of the Sombyx cantharis and other insects also get into the cocoons, and often kill from 10 to 50 per cent. of the eggs, while minute cryptogamic organisms destroy many more.

The best method of contending against the locust has been very carefully studied. Much has been accomplished by ploughing the ground deeply as soon as possible after the eggs have been laid, so as to bring them to the surface, and thus allow them to become an easy prey to birds and insects. The collection and destruction of the cocoons by manual labor is less sure and more costly, but it has the advantage of affording employment to Arabs, who have been reduced to great misery by the destruction of their crops. The statistics of locusts thus destroyed is startling. It has been calculated that between Eighth and Twelfth Months, 1888, an enormous quantity of 8,000 cubic metres of cocoons were collected and destroyed, and that these contained 200,000,000,000 eggs. And after the insects were hatched, 1,200,000,000 crickets were killed, and it was the excess beyond these figures that invaded the land.

It is admitted that the most efficacious means of waging war on the locusts is to concentrate all available resources on the destruction of the young. They remain quite stationary during five or six days after being hatched, and thus time is allowed for their destruction. The Arabs employ very primitive means: they jump among them, treading and crushing them under foot, beating about in every direction with branches of broom and oleander, and lighting immense fires all over the place with alfalfa grass or any dry brushwood that may be available. The most practical method is the use of screens, similar to those employed in Cyprus.

These are bands of cotton stuff, 20 to 25 metres in length, on which are sewn strips of American wax cloth. The young crickets climb up the former, but when they arrive at the latter they can find no foothold, and tumble back into ditches prepared for their reception, along which sheets of zinc are placed to prevent their egress. As soon as the ditches are filled, the insects are covered over with earth and the screens are advanced. During last season the material provided in Algeria, but which was altogether insufficient, was 6,000 screens, each 50 metres long, 100,000 oak pickets, 6,000 steel hammers, 450,000 metres of cord and 60,000 sheets of zinc.—Science.

A Dog Patient.—The Pet of an Ambulance Applies to a Hospital for Treatment.—Few people who have seen Koebler's ambulance going at full speed through the streets have failed to notice the huge Newfoundland dog, Nero, that accompanies it on every trip. The big dog runs by the side of the ambulance and never falls behind, no matter what the speed may be. If a pedestrian is tardy in getting out of the way of the vehicle he runs ahead and by barking and jumping does all in his power to clear the track. For several years he has been the pet of the ambulance men, and at times his intelligence seems almost human.

A striking example of his sagacity occurred yesterday. The ambulance was called out Broadway, and, as usual, Nero accompanied it. In some way the dog was thrown under the wheels and one of his paws was badly crushed. He was unable to follow the ambulance, and the men in it did not miss him for a time. After considering the matter of his injuries Nero turned and went by cross streets, not back to the ambulance barn, but to St. Alexis Hospital.

Upon reaching the hospital he went in, and exhibiting the bruised paw to one of the nurses, intimated to her, almost as plainly as though he could talk, that he wanted medical care. The nurse carefully bandaged the paw, and the big dog, feeling more comfortable, expressed his thanks in a few sharp barks. He then went into the doctor's room and prepared to sleep. A little later the ambulance arrived, and the men were told of his actions.

They tried to induce him to return to his home, but he absolutely refused, and it was plain to see that he intended to stay at the hospital until his paw had healed. Accordingly the men left him, and he was regularly installed in the hospital as a patient. He submits to the manipulations of the nurses cheerfully, and expresses his satisfaction in their care. As soon as he is able to go back to his duties he will be discharged from the hospital as cured.—Cleveland Leader.

French Canadian Families.—An act was passed at a recent session of the Quebec Provincial Legislature, granting 100 acres of land to parents having twelve or more living children. This became law on Fourth Month 6th, 1890, and by Fifth Month 1st, 547 applications were made for this bounty, while within the year nearly 1,500 applications have been made, and the officials think the Province contains at least 2,000 families entitled to the bounty. Three applications came from French Canadians in the United States, though, being non-residents, they are not eligible. Families are developed in Lower Canada of 25 and even 30 or more children, and it is noteworthy that in the debate preceding the passage of the bounty act, it was stated that two prominent officials of the province were 26th children, both men being fine specimens of physical and mental development.

PEOPLE often appear to us more wrong than they really are, because we are not right ourselves in judging them.—G. Dillwyn.

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 12, 1891.

We have as yet received no detailed account of the late North Carolina Yearly Meeting, but have had the privilege of perusing a letter received by a Friend of Philadelphia from a valued member of that Yearly Meeting, which gives some insight into the character of some of the doctrines preached by visitors from other Yearly Meetings. Some of these utterly ignored the Light of Christ, which our early Friends looked upon as God's gift for man's salvation, and called it a damnable doctrine. Silent waiting, these same false teachers said, had no Scripture authority, but was a practice handed down to us by tradition, &c.

Such ministers it is a misnomer to call "Friends" in any other sense than that they may have a right of membership in some branch of our Society. It is a grievous burden to the living members of the Church that they should be permitted to breach such pernicious sentiments under shelter of the authority of meetings to which they belong. And the concerned members of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, it seems to us, would be fully justified in rejecting the services of such propagators of error and closing up the way for their further labor within their limits.

One of the feelings which in measure reconciled Friends of Philadelphia to the suspension of epistolary correspondence at the time we ceased thus to hold intercourse with brethren elsewhere, was the belief that its practical effect would be to shield our members from the visits of many whose teachings would tend to unsettle the young in their attachment to our doctrines and testimonies; and to introduce disunity among ourselves.

We may thankfully believe that such has been its effect; and that amid many shortcomings and defects there has been among us an increase of unity, and that a large part of our members remain firm in their adherence to the principles of Friends.

If sentiments such as have been alluded to are permitted to be proclaimed without rebuke in North Carolina or elsewhere, it must tend to divide the body. For those who have known the Spirit of Christ to be their teacher, pointing out to them the evil works of darkness, and leading them in the path of self-denial, and to practical holiness, cannot accept such sentiments, but must repudiate them.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement shows that the decrease of the bonded debt during the Eighth Month amounted to $1,091,216. Total cash in the Treasury, $766,602,347.

Up to the 7th inst, the total amount of 44 per cent. bonds received, is $24,000,000. Details for continuation of a 2d per cent., was $2,037,850. The amount received there for redemption, was $8,836,700.

The President has appointed John S. Durham, colored, of Philadelphia, to be Minister to Hayti. J. S. Durham is now Consul at San Domingo.

On the 2d inst, the Georgia Senate passed the House bill disqualifying physicians addicted to drink from the practice of their profession. It is announced that the Governor will approve the bill.

Of Justice Patrick Divver, of New York City, the Voice says: He was promoted from the saloon to the judicial bench, and this is how he is now talking about the pit from whence he was digged:

"It's cruel to say that I am running a saloon when everybody who knows me at all knows that I have not been in the business for three years. Does anybody suppose that my conscience would allow me for one moment to be in the liquor business and at the same time be punishing men for being drunk and holding violators of the Excise law for trial? No, sir!"

What an admission—that a man can't be in the liquor business without violating the laws! Would it be just to be in the liquor business and at the same time be punishing men for being drunk and holding violators of the Excise law for trial? No, sir!

It is reported from Florence Alabama, that the cool weather is damaging the cotton crop, which will be 20 per cent. smaller than was supposed a week ago.

A new and damaging insect, attacked the sugar beet at Watsonville, California. It is of a species unknown to the entomologists of that part of the country.

The number of deaths in this city reported last week was 113 less than the previous week, and 16 less than the corresponding week of last year. Of the foregoing, 192 were males and 174 females; 44 died of cholera infantum; 36 of consumption; 23 of diseases of the heart; 22 of marasmus; 15 of inflammation of the brain; 15 of convulsions; 15 of inanition; 13 of pneumonia; 11 of apoplexy; 10 of old age and 10 of diphtheria.

Markets.—U. S. 2's, reg, 99½; 100's; 4's, reg, 117½; coupon, 118½; currency 6's, 109 a 118.

COTTON was firm and 4c. per pound higher. Sales on a basis of 9 cts. per cwt. for middling uplands.

WHEAT—Wing grain, in bulk, $17.00 a $18.00; spring bran in bulk, $4.00 a $4.25.

FLOUR.—Western and Pennsylvania super, $8.75 a $10.00; do. do., extras, $4 a $4.20; No. 2 winter family, $4.40 a $4.60; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $4.65 a $4.90; Western winter, clear, $4.70 a $4.90; do. do., $4.90 a $5.10; winter patent, new, $5.10 a $5.25 Minnesota, clear, $4.75 a $5.00; do. straight, $5.00 a $5.25; do. patent, $5.25 a $5.75. Eye flour sold in a small way at $4.75 a $5.00 per barrel, as to quality.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, $1.04 1/2 a 1.05.

No. 2 mixed corn, 73 a 74 cents.

No. 2 red cut, 67 a 68 cents.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5½ cts.; good, 5¼ cts.; medium, 4¼ cts.; fair, 4¼ cts.; fat cows, 4 a 4½ cts.; culls, 3¼ cts.; Texans, 3¼ a 4 cts.; fat cows, 4¼ a 3½ cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5¼ a 5½ cts.; good, 4½ a 5 cts.; medium, 4¼ a 4 cts.; common, 3 a 4 cts.; culls, 2 a 2½ cts.; lambs, 3 a 7 cts.

HOGS.—Choice Western, 8¼ a 8½ cts.; other grades, 7¼ a 8 cts.

FOREIGN.—Speaking of the recent storm in Great Britain the London correspondent of the New York Tribune says: Ours is a country where the winds have come, and, beating on the fields white for the harvest, quench the last spark of hope. What makes the trial harder to bear is that disaster has followed fast on what promised to be an unusually fine harvest. The winds, not only blighted the crop, but, owing to the failure of the harvest, the price of grain, rice and the British farmer began to meditate revenge on the prospect of six shillings a bushel for sound wheat. But that dream is over now, and the only question is whether it will be worth while, or even possible, to harvest the beaten-down product of the flooded fields. The grain already cut is sprouting. Nor has fruit culture escaped the scourge, apples, pears and plums being swept off the trees. It is bitterly felt by British farmers that England's adversity is America's opportunity, and the reports which reach this country of the magnificent harvests in the United States do not relieve the despair with which the British farmer looks on his own wasted land.

The New York Sun's correspondent bluntly points out that British farmers had season to talk of, was England, as well as the Continental nations, being worryingly worried over the supplies of food.

Each day's figuring, he says, now increases the shortage of food which Europe sees staring it in the face. Roughly speaking, the importing nations of the earth need 500,000,000 bushels of wheat, and the exporting nations have a surplus of only 410,000,000 to meet this demand. This is, indeed, a roscate statement of the case, because it is based on last year's consumption. This year both rye and potatoes are grave failures, which throw a big added burden on the wheat supply. To say nothing of Russia, there will be an additional wheat consumption in Germany of some 2,000,000 bushels, from the mere fact of the shifting of army rations from brown to white bread.

All these figures, which the European papers gleefully repeat, are the ones only to make glum, like snowfalls, grow bigger, much to the disgust of whole ship loads of cash to America. It is like wormwood to the taste, this thought, that, in addition to all the vast and varying herds of standing armies and navies to keep the peace here, a sum equal to the cost of a campaign must be paid over to America to buy wheat.

A dispatch from Berlin, dated the 3d inst., says: The Reichspost Blatt publishes an order to the effect that the prohibition of the importation of swine, pork and sausages of American origin shall no longer be enforced when such live pigs or hog products are furnished with a certificate certifying that they have been examined in accordance with American regulations and found free from qualities dangerous to health.

The Vienna correspondent of the Figaro telegraphs that Austria will reply to the Russo-Turkish Convention, by sending a mission to the Austrian dominions.

A dispatch dated Vienna, Ninth Month 1st, says: The extensive landslide in progress in the Valley of the Drave, as cabled yesterday, which is forming a dam across the Lienzer Gorge, promises to cause more damage than at first expected. In spite of the efforts made by the Austrian Government, to keep the river working day and night in their works, they have been unable to prevent the river from overflowing its passage for the imprisoned water, the landslide is forming an immense lake, and threatens to divert the course of the Drave. The masses of earth and stone which have already fallen from the mountains form a solid dyke of about 270,000 cubic yards in bulk. This shifting of earth has also been the cause of a few acres of forest ground, and further damage is apprehended.

It is officially announced that there are large reserves of rye stored in the granaries of the Baltic provinces of Livonia, and the Governor of that province, General von Meyers, has written to the Emperor, which find themselves deficient in their supply of rye owing to bad crops or other reasons. This loan of one million poods is to be repaid to Livonia when the next harvest is gathered.

The peasants of Courland, another of the Baltic provinces, have written to the Emperor, to express their willingness to lend a million poods of rye to less fortunate provinces, on the sole condition that the Imperial Government will see that the grain lent is restored in due course of time.

The House of Representatives of New Zealand has passed a bill granting residence and suffrage to women and qualifying women for election to Parliament.

John Dominis, Prince Consort of Hawaii, died Eighth Month 26th, from a sudden attack of pneumonia. He had been ill some time with gout, which took on an inflammatory character. Pneumonia subsided momentarily, but Queen Liliuokalani was much affected by the death of her husband.

Mail pouches from China and Japan, which left Yokohama Eighth Month 19th, in the steamer Enos of Japan, and which reached Victoria on the 26th, were brought across the continent by the Canada of British Columbia in three days, and were placed on board the steamer City of New York just before she sailed. If the City of New York makes her usual time the mail will reach Liverpool Ninth Month 7th, 20 days from Yokohama.

A preliminary report issued by the Registrar General, of the census taken in Jamaica, returns the total population at 639,491. These figures show an increase of 38,987 in the population of the Island since 1881.

1836.—[At the Yearly Meeting of Ohio, he writes:]

"In the Meeting of Ministers and Elders, I diverted to the attempts to lay waste some of the testimonies of our Society, made in former times, by unsettled, discontented members, who were soaring above their places; but who eventually fell away and came to nothing. We had recent evidence of this, in those, who but a few years ago, assailed the peace and order of the Society. And I believed this would be the end of all who persisted in such work. Though they might soar as among the stars, and build their nests on high, the Lord, in his own time, would bring them down and lay them as in the dust. He would not permit those testimonies, which He entrusted our forefathers with, to be destroyed; nor this people, if they are faithful to Him, to be laid waste, whom He had raised up to hold forth the standard of pure righteousness to the world."

"The numerous subjects which engaged the me of the Yearly Meeting, extended the sittings until Seventh-day. Near the close, the language of encouragement was held out to guest Friends, to put their trust in the Lord Jesus Christ, the leader and commander of his people. Trials had ever attended them. The people admonished one of the churches, that to rest from amongst themselves, men would rise, speaking perverse things, to draw away sciples after them. Friends here would have their trials and difficulties; but those who dwelt under a sense of their inability to preserve themselves, and were endeavoring to maintain their confidence in Him, who has been the refuge of a people, will know his Name to be a strong tower, in the day of trouble; to which they may run and find safety. He who has been with them in many conflicts, will not forsake them in others; but will mercifully condescend to sustain them to the end, and crown them with glory unspeakable and full of glory. Friends were tried with feelings of near affection for each other; thankful for the gracious extension of Divine help, solemnizing them together, and enabling them to transact the concerns of the meeting with decision and harmony."

"The doctrine of regeneration, by obedience to the Grace of God in the heart, was preached to some who had long slighted his convictions; and the young people were tenderly invited to yield themselves to the visitations of their blessed Saviour; who, if they received Him in the way of his appearance to their souls, would tabernacle with them, and become their teacher and preserver from the snares of their unwearied enemy. Mildred Ratcliff added an invitation, to join in with what she believed to be a renewed offer of help from our Heavenly Father."

"Had appointed meetings at Providence and Sewickly; in which Divine kindness was manifested towards me, a poor creature; and for the comforting, strengthening and arousing of individuals, in the meetings. In both there appeared to be a remnant of concerned Friends; to whom the language of encouragement, to keep close to their Lord and Master was extended; also some, who were in danger of losing what they had once known, and being caught by the stratagems of the enemy, were warned of their danger; as well as those who were settling down at ease. 'Such as we sow, such shall we reap. If we sow to the flesh, we shall of the flesh reap corruption; but if we sow to the Spirit, we shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting.' The certainty of Divine judgment, according to the deeds done in the body, was enforced. We were afterwards told that a person who sat before me, at Sewickly, and who rarely attended Friends' Meeting, was a Universalist. He appeared to be wrought upon."

"Sewickly Meeting finished our visit in this journey; and under a tendering feeling of the condescension and goodness of our Divine Master, thanksgiving for mercies past, and prayer for their continuance, in the various conflicts and close provings, yet to be passed through, were offered to Him; and we parted from our friends with sentiments of near affection, and with fervent desire for our mutual preservation, in our various allotments in the world and in the Church."

1837.—"By appointment of the Yearly Meeting, in company with my friend, Benjamin Cooper, I went to Plainfield, New Jersey; and attended their Monthly Meeting, and the Quarterly Meeting of Shrewsbury and Rahway, held there. For the few who have been left to maintain our discipline and testimonies, we felt sincere desires that their hands may be strengthened; and I was enabled to labor among them, to dissuade from the influence of the spirit and fashions of the world, and to draw them into closer fellowship with our Holy Leader; that they might hold up a clearer light among the people, and experience a growth in the blessed Truth amongst themselves. We were brought near to one another, and parted with feelings of mutual love and desire for each other's welfare."

"In the course of my short pilgrimage, being now in the fiftieth year of my age, I have cucountered some difficulties, and passed through seasons of deep discouragement on various accounts. On commencing business for myself, I fully believed that my life, and my talents, should be devoted to the service of my Heavenly Father. Though it was necessary to make suitable provision for myself, and for those who might be dependent on me, yet in my view, this was secondary to the main object of serving Him; and through the aid of his blessed Spirit, taking part in the interests and concerns of his Church and people. Very early I had the promise, that if I devoted myself to his service, I should never want food or raiment. But though I fully believed the certainty of the promise, and have never since been permitted to doubt its fulfillment; yet when things in the outward have worn a gloomy aspect, and my business was very small, and an increasing family looking to me for their daily supplies, my faith at times has been closely proved. This has had a very humbling effect; and while I have been weaned from the desire after outward things, both riches and temporal enjoyments, it has tended to bring me many times, in a prostrated state of mind, to his footstool, and to lay all before Him, and ask for the continuance of his countenance and mercy towards me, a poor unworthy creature before Him. Herein I have experienced the renewed extendings of his unmerited regard; the load under which my mind had been laboring, was for the present, removed; and ability was received to feel with and for the afflicted, and to hold forth to them the language of consolation, in their secret and bitter conflicts. Under the discipline and cross of Christ, I have been convinced that much too great a part of the time, and of the energies of body and mind, are absorbed in the pursuit of worldly things. A great part of mankind miss of the true enjoyment of the provisions of a beneficent Providence, even after they gain them, for want of living to Him, and not to themselves. They are kept either in a constant hurried frame of mind, confused, or in doubt what to lay hold of to obtain happiness, or they settle down in the love of money; hoarding it, and husbanding it, out of a sordid attachment to it. They are in bonds; unable to enjoy, or to see in what true enjoyment consists. The work of religion is either overlooked, rarely attended to, or postponed to a future day, when they think it will suit their inclination and convenience. I am convinced that it is in our power, as we live in obedience to the Divine will, to find time for all our duties, social and religious. Even the poor, with common industry; as their desires and expenses are circumscribed by the Divine will, may, through his blessing, procure sufficient food and raiment; and when it is proper to leave their outward business, in order to perform their religious duties, they may confide in his superintending providence over their affairs, and their families, so that they shall not suffer from their faithfulness. How simple, and how few are the wants of such! They do not envy the rich, nor covet their possessions. 'Their delight is in the law of the Lord, and therein they meditate day and night." They eat their bread with gladness and singleness of heart. Their labors and their rest are sweet; and as they seek first the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof, all those things necessary to their accommodation, will be added. Here the devoted follower of Christ experiences the right use of his time and talents; and the true enjoyment of the various blessings which his Heavenly Father provides, and bestows upon him. As time and the energies of body and mind are wasting away, he is growing in grace, and in the knowledge of those things which pertain to life and salvation; he is laying up treasure in heaven, where his heart centres; and he becomes more and more established upon that Rock, against which death, hell and the grave, cannot prevail."

1837.—[In the Sixth Month of this year, William Evans, having obtained a minute for the service, set off, accompanied by his friend, Joseph Snowden, to attend the Yearly Meeting of Rhode Island, and a few meetings belonging to it. At the Meeting of Ministers and Elders, he says:—"I had some serious feelings, and made some remarks in relation to the importance of holding a Yearly Meeting; and the necessity of every one keeping their respective places, so as to act under Divine direction. It was no uncommon thing to feel barren, and destitute of Divine good, at the commencement of such meetings; and if we made a right use of such dispensations, their proper effect would be to drive us to the Master's feet; there to wait for his arising, to qualify for his work; and when He puts forth his sheep He will go before them. We must be emptied before we are prepared to be filled; and as we are engaged to keep our habitations in the Truth, we shall, in his time, find that there is bread enough in his house, and to spare."

A CONSECRATED FAMILY.—A consecrated household might be the nearest approach to heaven itself that this world ever witnesses.

We all are aware of some such. Would that they were more numerous. They are conspicuous for harmony and peace, for mutual confidence and helpfulness, for sweet charity and slowness to take offense, for patience in adversity and good sense in prosperity and humility and cheerfulness at all times, for that quickness of repentance for evil doing which is the outgrowth of the consciousness of the Holy Spirit's immediate and constant presence, and for that mood of prayerfulness and service which proves that the heart has indeed been renewed. The very atmosphere of such a home is full of blessing. Its silent influence is felt far around.

A most important duty is to throw our influence as strongly as possible against the control of worldliness which besets every family from outside, especially those forms of worldliness which, without being conspicuously, grossly objectionable, do nevertheless tend to lower our spiritual vitality, to assume an undue prominence in our minds, and to subtly prepare the way for future temptation to assail us successfully.

Is religion the chief interest in our home? This question is the test of the whole matter. Are we doing all in our power to make it this.

While we still remain in the world do we appreciate the fact that we no longer are of it in the same sense in which those are who do not profess to love Christ? While we enjoy it heartily, so far as we may legitimately, do we nevertheless find our highest pleasure in cultivating the spirit and working the works of Christ.

I did not observe much that was peculiar in the vegetation of the peninsula. In places the common garden Larkspur had become naturalized, and its bright blue flowers attracted the eye as we rode past patches of them in the fields and on the railroad banks. The beautiful orange-colored blossoms of the Butterfly Weed (Asclepias tuberosa) were more abundant by the roadside than with us. We often met with patches of the Sweet Clover (Melilotus alba), a plant introduced from Europe, and, like many other immigrants, making itself at home. It is closely allied to the common clover, but is a taller and much branched plant, with smaller and more delicate foliage, and small white flowers in spikes.

I saw, on one occasion, on the marshy borders of a mill-pond, a mass of the curious Lizard's Tail (Saururus cernuus), a marsh plant, with large heart-shaped leaves, and a stem which terminates in a dense and nodding spike of white flowers. I had met with it many years before on the banks of the Schuylkill River, near the mouth of the Wissahickon, and once since on the Brandywine Creek, in Chester County, Pa.

The beautiful Trumpet-flower (Tecoma radicans), with bright red blossoms, and pretty pinnate leaves, was quite common, overrunning the fences as the poison vine does in our parts.

Another sign of our being in a more southern latitude was the presence in the lawns and yards, of a Mimosa tree, with leaves resembling those of the common locust, but much smaller, and an abundance of very curious flowers, which I scarcely know how to describe.

But that which most strongly impressed the mind, was the number of magnificent old white oak trees which were scattered about over the country, in the yards of meeting-houses, etc., and on the roadsides, where they had been allowed to remain undisturbed generation after generation. In the old Friends' meeting-house grounds at Tredhaven (near Easton), a very fine white oak still stands, the trunk of which is probably not less than five feet in diameter. Several of the monarchs in this grove have died, one of which had a hollow trunk which would contain eight grown persons. The finest grove we saw was one around a Methodist meeting-house, at a place called Wye Mills. But the most interesting individual tree was that in the school-house yard near the same place. It was a monster of probably six feet in diameter, and enormous spread of branches, and it had radiating on all sides great roots or buttresses of two or three feet in height and ten or twelve in length. I regretted not having brought a tape line with me, so that I might have taken accurate measurements.

One of the earliest explorations of Chesapeake Bay on record is that made in 1608, by the celebrated Captain John Smith, at that time living in Virginia. With fourteen companions in an open barge, he visited the bay and made friendship with numerous bands of the Indians. He speaks of the multitude of fish with which the water swarmed, and of the abundance of deer, bear and other wild animals on the land. In divers places the fish were so thick, lying with their heads at the surface of the water, that for want of nets, they attempted to catch them with a frying-pan, but found it a poor instrument to catch fish with. At the mouth of one of the rivers, as the tide was ebbing, the boat grounded on a sandbar.

Smith says, "We spied many fishes lurking in the reeds; our captain sporting himself by mailing them to the ground with his sword, so as all a fishing in that manner; thus we took more in one hour than we could eat in a day. But it chanced, our captain taking a fish from his sword (not knowing her condition), being much of the fashion of a Thornback, but a long tail like a riding-rod, wherein the midist is: most poisoned sting, of two or three inches long; bearded like a saw on each side, which she struck into the wrist of his arm near an inch and a half; no blood nor wound was seen by a little blue spot, but the torment was instantly, so extreme, that in four hours had so swollen his hand, arm and shoulder, we all with much sorrow concluded his funeral, and prepared his grave in an island by, as himself directed; yet it pleased God, by a precious oil Doctor Russell at the first applied to it with a probe (on night) his tormenting pain was so well assuaged that he eat of the fish to his sopper; which gave no less joy and content to us than ease to himself, for which we called the island Stinging Isle, after the name of the fish."

The Chesapeake is still a noted place for fish but the increase of the population, and the destruction wrought by the guns of the hunters have greatly lessened the number of the larger animals that inhabit the woods.

Captain Smith describes the eastern shore as covered with trees. A large part of these forests have been removed and the land brought into cultivation, but we observed at many of the railroad stations logs of oak and pine trimmed of their branches—probably designed to be used as driving piles—which showed that the natural growth of the timber is still a source of income to the proprietors.

Beaver and other fur-bearing animals appear to have been numerous at that period, and rively trade for their skins arose between the Indians and adventurers who penetrated those waters. All the Indians dwelling on the shores of Chesapeake Bay and along the rivers which run into it, were in great dread of a powerful tribe that lived far to the north, near the great lakes, and whose canoes descended the Susquehanna. These people they called Musawomeks (perhaps the same name as Mohawks). They probably belonged to the celebrated Iroquois confederacy of New York Indians, who extended their conquests far to the south and the west. The Mohawks, who lived near the Hudson River, were the most eastern of the confederated tribes.

The settlement of Maryland was partly due to the intolerance on religious questions which prevailed in Great Britain; and which made many willing to forsake the comforts of an old settled country and seek a home in the wilderness of America, so that they might worship the Almighty according to their own convictions, without being molested therefor by the public authorities. The Puritans sought refuge in New England; William Penn founded Pennsylvania, and George Calvert obtained a grant from the crown of the territory around Chesapeake Bay, all with somewhat similar motives.

George Calvert, afterwards created the first Lord Baltimore, was an especial favorite of James I, of England, who appointed him one of his Secretaries of State.

His first adventure as a planter of colonies was in the southern part of Newfoundland, whither he sent a small colony in 1621. He ected a handsome house for himself on the land, and spent much money in building barns and storehouses. In 1627 he removed with his family, but he was disappointed in the climate and soil; and determined to remove to Virginia. Previously to this time he had left the established Church of England, and became a Roman Catholic; and on his arrival in Virginia, the authorities there refused permission to settle among them, unless he could take the oath acknowledging the king's pre-eminence in ecclesiastical matters, which as a Catholic he could not do, so he returned to England, and applied for a patent for land to be north of Virginia. Charles I, who had succeeded his father James, retained an esteem for Lord Baltimore, made the desired grant, which he called Mary's Land, in honor of his queen Henrietta Maria.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Plea for Harmony.

A recent editorial in the Public Ledger of this city, commenting upon a proposition which was recently made in the Prussian Diet, that the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine, which were wrested by Germany from France, about twenty years ago, should be voluntarily restored to the latter country, remarks, that this proposition as worthy of an enlightened and far-seeing statesman, and says:

"That killing border of supporting the German army on a footing for instant war is the price Germany pays for the retention of those two provinces—Alsace and Lorraine—won by her in the Franco-German war of 1870-71. Those provinces have been held by Germany since then only by the strong hand of over-awing force. They are more intensely French to-day than they were when the Treaty of Versailles was signed twenty years ago.

Germany has already paid in additional war expenses since 1871—in the vain hope of converting these provinces from French to German—more than the thousand millions of dollars he got by the terms of that Treaty. At the rate this increase of expenditure is going on now, it cannot be long before this alone will cost Germany another thousand millions of dollars—and even then Alsace and Lorraine will still continue to be French."

"To get a release from such an exhausting burden and drain upon Germany alone, the re-conversion of Alsace and Lorraine would be almost like buying prosperity and freedom for nothing."

In the enormous expense which has been expended upon Germany by this action, an illustration is furnished of the retribution, which, sometimes in one form and sometimes in another, follows wrong-doing, whether in nations or in individuals.

May not a lesson be derived from these events, even by religious bodies? By acts of injustice, dissensions in religious societies have at times been increased, until a schism has occurred by which a wound has been inflicted upon the membership, and upon the cause which it professed to desire to promote, which has lasted for generations. In such cases how wise and consistent with Christian feeling would it be for the party thus acting to do what it could to make restitution, and thus, so far as lay in its power, restore the unity which should exist among those professing the same doctrines.

We have had in mind in penning the above remarks the sorrowful events which occurred among Friends in New England in 1844-6, the effect of which has been widespread and harmful. Should the "Larger Body" now be willing to annul the proceedings referred to, we think a step would be taken at which the right-minded everywhere could rejoice, and tend to bring back into one fold those who have been scattered as in a cloudy and dark day.

In an examination of the causes which led to the separation in New England, prepared by the Representative body of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1849, the following passage occurs, which we think must find a response in every heart which longs for the peace and prosperity of our beloved Society:—

"It is our sincere and fervent desire that all parties, under a deep sense of the greatness of the cause and the excellence of the church government, which our Society has been entrusted with, and called to support, may, in the sight of the Lord, examine the respective grounds they have taken; and that where any infraction of private rights or of the discipline has been committed, they may be willing, under the constraining power of Truth, to acknowledge and do it away. We all profess to act under the government of the same blessed Head of the Church, who laid down his life for our sakes, and taught us that we should lay down our lives for one another; and we believe that if all classes stand open to the softening influences of the love of God, through his mercy and goodness, everything that has divided and alienated from each other, may be entirely removed, and a re-establishment on the right foundation, witnessed in that faith and love and unity which in former years bound together the members, and the different Yearly Meetings of our Society." S.

THE Christian ideal demands humility, as a form of service. Our Lord bids us get down to the ground because He has worked to be done there that cannot be done without stooping. Our Lord exemplified the grace in his bearing toward his apostles on the ever-memorable eve of his arrest and condemnation. When they came together in the upper room, his thoughts were full of them and of their needs, not of his approaching passion and death. "Having loved his own, He loved them unto the end." His love was in the mood that seeks to show itself in some act of service, and He saw the opportunity for it. There was no host present to wash their feet, so He takes the service on himself, pouring out the water, girding himself with the towel, and stooping before each of them in the attitude of a servant. It was a symbol of the grand humility with which the Son of God stooped to cleanse us from deeper stain.

The duty of washing each other's feet is of perpetual obligation. Where a brother's feet have caught defilement in the world's ways, how are we to deal with him? One way is to lift ourselves into a more erect position and contrast our immaculate selves with his stains. That is the Pharisee's way. But Christ's way is to wash the needy one's feet,—to stoop in true humility and sympathy to help him to cleanse his walk and conversation from the defilement that clings to him. And this never can be done without stooping: it is feet washing. As the Apostle reproduces our Lord's saying in other words: "Brethren, if a man be overtaken in any trespass, ye which are spiritual restore such a one in a spirit of meekness."

BLUSHING.—A suffusion least seen in those who have the most occasion for it.—Tin Trumpet.

William Caton.

"I know that no visible created thing can satisfy that which longeth to be refreshed in the living streams which issue out from the fountain which watereth and refresheth the whole city of God. . . . A living fountain both the Lord set open for Jewish and Jerusalem; and all that are bathed and washed in it come to enter into the holy city."—W. CATON.

It was on a winter day, early in 1652, that George Fox unexpectedly, and for the first time, arrived at Swarthmoor Hall, near Ulverston, the beautifully situated residence of Judge Fell, who was then absent on his circuit. This visit proved a very eventful one to not a few of the members of that large household.

William Caton was then in his sixteenth year, and had for some time resided at the hall, sharing the educational advantages of the Judge's only son, who was taught by a clergyman, a relative of the Catons; he soon became a favorite of the whole family, so that difference in social position was lost sight of. He shared George Fell's chamber, and was his companion in field-sports and fishing as well as in study. From early childhood he had at times been the subject of serious impressions, and had been very carefully brought up by his parents. The sudden change in his style of living had by no means the unfavorable effect which might have been feared, for he says that his heart was softened whilst thus living in "much pleasure, ease, and fulness . . . forasmuch as Providence had cast me into such a noble family, where there were such sweet children, with whose company I was more than a little affected. In those days there remained an integrity in my heart towards God, and often did I call upon his name."

In order to be alone whilst engaged in prayer he would, of a morning, linger in the bedroom until his companion had gone down-stairs. He was much exposed to temptation during a few months spent by George Fell and himself at a country school, but, he writes, "The Lord was wonderfully gracious to me, and many times, when I have deserved nothing but stripes from Him, hath He broken and overcome my heart with his Divine love." At times his soul ardently longed for communion with God, and he found that he could not appease its cravings by taking notes of sermons or writing paraphrases of them, though such efforts were commended by the family at the Hall.

Much did he marvel at the unfashionable dress and simple manners of their guest from Penny Drayton, "Yet something in me," he writes, "did love him and own his testimony. And I began to find the truth of what he spoke in myself; for his doctrine tended very much to the bringing of us to the light, with which Christ Jesus had enlightened us withal, which shined in our hearts and convinced us of sin and evil; and into love with that and obedience to that he sought to bring us; that thereby, through the Son, we might be brought into unity and covenant with the Lord."

Deep, also, and lasting, was the effect of George Fox's ministry on the hearts of the mistress of Swarthmoor Hall (a descendant of the martyr, Anne Askew), her young daughters and their governess, as well as on the steward, Thomas Salthouse, the housekeeper, and most of the servants; and when Judge Fell was crossing the sands of Leven, on his homeward journey, he was told that his family were all bewitched. His son, too, we find, was "somewhat touched with the same power," which helped to smooth the path of William Caton, who was experiencing in his own soul the power of the truths which they had heard, though he confesses that they often "extinguished the good" in themselves; "but," he adds, "such was the love of God to me in those days, that I was as surely pursued with judgment as I was overtaken by folly." At times he would retire to some solitary spot where he might seek for spiritual refreshment by drawing near to God.

After awhile his mental conflicts unfitted him for hard study, and Margaret Fell (the Judge's wife), with Christian sympathy and womanly penetration, divined the cause of his inability to write themes and make Latin verses; she, therefore, suggested that he should leave school and occupy himself in teaching her daughters and acting as her secretary. Her strengthening and soothing influence must have been very helpful to him, for he describes this period as a happy time: he found congenial employment in writing for her of "precious and wholesome things pertaining to the Truth: whereby [he continues] I came to have good opportunities to be conversant with Friends, in whom the life of righteousness began to bud and spring forth, and who grew in love and unity, with which my soul was exceedingly affected; and I desired very much to be one with them in it." Meanwhile the good work which his Saviour had begun in his soul was carried on more rapidly perhaps than he was himself aware of.

"When I was about seventeen years of age," he writes, "the power of the Lord God did work mightily and effectually in me to the cleansing, purging, and sanctifying of me. . . . And then I began to be broken, melted, and overcome with the love of God which sprang in my heart, and the Divine and precious promises that were confirmed to my soul. Oh! the preciousness and excellency of the day! Oh! the glory and the blessedness of that day! how or wherewith shall I demonstrate it, that they that are yet unborn might understand it, and give glory unto the Lord Jehovah?"

This most merciful visitation was shared by many others of the household, and very closely were their hearts drawn together; whilst such was their desire to unitedly worship Him who had done such great things for them that they frequently met for this purpose in the latter part of the evening, when other members of the family had retired to rest. Great was William Caton's disappointment when, in consequence of George Fell's wish to keep early hours—or, it may be, to avoid late meetings—he had sometimes to accompany him to his chamber, whilst his heart remained with the little company below, for, he says, the refreshment and benefit of these seasons was indescribable. "If," he adds, "we had suffered loss in the day-time when we had been abroad about our business or the like, then we came in a great measure thus to be restored again, through the love, power, and mercy of our God, which abounded very much unto us."

The young heir of Swarthmoor Hall had become indifferent to such matters, and William Caton was not sorry when, in consequence of his being sent to another school, they were separated. It was true that this might stand in the way of his worldly preferment, but we cannot wonder that this seemed of little moment to one who could say, "I was often overcome with the love of my Father, which did exceedingly break and ravish my heart, and so I knew it was with others of that family; and of the overflowings thereof did we communicate one to another to the comforting and refreshing one of another; and truly willing we were to sympathize and bear one with another, and in true and tender love to watch one over another. And oh! the love, mercy, and power of God, which abounded to us, through us, and among us, who shall declare it?" Many Friends at a distance, hearing how remarkably the Lord's power was manifested in this family, visited Swarthmoor Hall, so that occasionally visitors from five or six counties would stay at the house at one time. This gave especial satisfaction to William Caton, who, in consequence of frequently writing for Margaret Fell, had much intercourse with them. George Fox he regarded as a tender-hearted father, who, not content with "having begotten him through the Gospel," endeavored to lead him onwards in the path of the just; whilst his "entirely beloved friend, Margaret Fell," cared for him as if he had been her child.

But these peaceful days at Swarthmoor were but the preparation for his life labors; freely had he received of the grace of God, and freely was he to share it with others. George Fox says, "He was one like unto Timothy, who was an example in innocence, simplicity, and purity in his life and conversation, after he was converted; for that did preach, as well as his doctrine, in the churches of Christ." William Caton himself thus describes his call to the ministry: "Seeing the darkness and ignorance so great in which people were involved, my spirit was stirred within me, and my earthen vessel came to be filled with love to their souls, and with zeal for God and his Truth. And about that time I began to know the motion of his power and the command of his Spirit; by which I came to be moved to go to the places of public worship." Although, at that period, it was not a rare event for laymen to address a congregation at the conclusion of the usual service, it can be no matter of surprise that a youth of seventeen should shrink from thus publicly testifying against the sins of preachers as well as hearers. But he had given his heart to his Redeemer, and henceforth there was but one way for him to walk in—narrow it might be, and yet an indescribably blessed one. "Wherefore when I saw it must be so," he says, "I put on courage in the name of the Lord; and having faith in Him which stood in his power I gave up to his will." Then he realized the fulfilment of Christ's promise that He would be with him; perplexing doubts and the fear of man were alike taken from him, and ability was given him—stripling though he was—to speak as "one having authority." Some were willing to hear him; others, "as brute beasts," fell upon him; but the Lord preserved him from evil, and filled his heart with peace.

Besides these services he often preached in market places, seldom knowing what he should say until he reached the spot, yet never lacking words wherewith to clothe his Master's message. "His word," he writes, "did often powerfully pass through me, and never did I go about any service for the Lord in which I was faithful but I always had my reward with me." Blows and beatings, stocks and stonings, he gave little heed to, for he found in the enjoyment of God's love that which made more than full amends for all; and whenever he was most deeply tried, the tenderness of the Lord's love was most clearly experienced. He alludes also to the great help afforded him from the consciousness of the warm attachment of his fellow-believers.

In the intervals of his ministerial service he industriously employed himself at Swarthmoor, still finding true spiritual refreshment with his household there, as they "spake often one to another and the Lord hearkened and heard." But soon he found that notwithstanding "th glorious days there," the time was at hand when he must bid his friends farewell, and go forth at his Saviour's bidding, to work in more distant vineyards. Judge Fell was very unwilling for him to leave his house, but his wife, with true affection, overcame her first feelings of regret, and freely gave him up. And yet although they felt that they could still be near one another in spirit, it was amidst the freely flowing tears, as well as the fervent prayers of the family, that the parting took place, on a winter day, when he was about eighteen.

He travelled chiefly on foot and—bearing this in mind—his diligence in his holy calling was, it has been remarked, almost beyond belief. When twelve months had elapsed he had visited in addition to many English counties, some parts of Scotland, Calais, Rotterdam and other Dutch cities. In London he found several ministering brethren from the north, and, to gether, they labored night and day. "The word of the Lord grew mightily," he says, "and many were added to the faith." Here he met with John Stubbs, who soon became one of his dearest friends. The previous year he had left the army in consequence of the effect produced on his mind by the preaching of George Fox a holier warfare laid before him in many parts of Europe, in Egypt and America; he was well skilled in the classics, and a remarkable Oriental scholar. Like William Caton he greatly loved and esteemed Margaret Fell. In one of his letters to her he says, "How often in my distress hath the Lord raised one up to minister in season to me, both by word and by writing. . . . Truly He hath made thee, even thee, as his angel and messenger these two times to publish peace unto me."

PEOPLE call me a crank, but I don't mind it. I have been a miller for years and I have made plenty of money, so I can afford to be eccentric. In ten years I have personally distributed to young men all over this coast and along the railroad routes across the Continent 345,000 little books containing the Proverbs of Solomon and a few Gospel hymns. That's my way of trying to do good on this wicked earth. Maybe I'm a crank, and maybe I'm a saint in disguise. Besides, I give away penny Testaments by the thousand. I always carry half a dozen in my coat-tail pocket. Now, if you won't tell any thing about it, I'll show you another of my schemes for spreading the light in this darkened land. I send out thousands of sacks of wheat and feed. The man who stands at the chute sacking the stuff has a pile of assorted tracts—I buy 'em in London—before him, and as each sack is filled he puts in one of the little booklets right a top the feed of grain. If I am a crank I guess I'm harmless.—A miller in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

MUSIC.—I believe that wine itself, though a man be guilty of habitual intoxication, does not more debauch and befoul the natural understanding than music;—always music, music in season and out of season—weakens and destroys the spiritual discernment. * * * When it is the only occupation, it degenerates into a sensual delight, and becomes a most powerful advocate for the admission of other pleasures, gross perhaps in degree, but in their kind the same.—William Cooper.

A SONG OF THE BURDEN-BEARER.

"I'll drop my burden at his feet,
And bear a song away."

Over the narrow footpath

That led from my lowly door
I went with a thought of the Master,
As oft I had walked before.
My heart was heavily laden

And with tears my eyes were dim,
But I knew I should lose the burden
Could I get a glimpse at Him.

It was more than I could carry
If I carried it alone,
And none in my house might share it—
Only One upon the throne.

It came between me and pleasure;
Between my work and me;
But our Lord could understand it,
And his touch could set me free.

Over the trodden pathway,
To the fields all sown and bare,
I went with a step that filtered
And a face that told of care;
I had lost the light of the morning
With its shimmer of sun and dew,
But a gracious look of the Master
Would the strength of the morn renew.

While yet my courage wavered
And the sky before me blurred,
I heard a voice behind me
Saying a tender word;
And I turned to see the brightness
Of heaven upon the road;
And sudden I lost the pressure
Of the weary, crushing load.

Nothing that hour was altered:
I had still the weight of care,
But I bore it now with the gladness
Which comes of answered prayer.
Not a grief the soul can fetter
Nor cloud its vision when
The dear Lord gives the spirit
To breathe to his will, "Amen."

Oh, friends, if the greater burdens
His love can make so light,
Why should his wonderful goodness
Our halting credence slight?

The little sharp vexations
And the bribes that catch and fret—
Shall we take them to the Helper
Who has never failed us yet?

Tell Him about the heartache,
And tell Him the longing, too;
Tell Him the baffled purpose,
When we scarce know what to do;
Then, leaving all our weakness
With the One divinely strong,
Forget that we were the harden,
And carry away the song.

—Margaret E. Sangster.

LINES

In remembrance of Margaret Hutchinson, an aged minister, who died in the autumn of 1849.

Safe on the golden sands,
Which floor the beach of Paradise! while we,
With struggling spirits, and uplifted hands
Are out at sea.

A kind maternal face,
An aged form, that every Sabbath day
We watched to see in its accustomed place,
Are gone away.

But not forgot, the cord
That bound the old and young, and childhood's tie,
Fastened by warm cares, and gentle word,
Never to die.

In thy old gallery seat,
Dear pastor of the flock, we see thee still;
Thy step, thy look, the grasp we loved to meet,
Our memories fill.

And all thy tender care
Over the wandering ones, thy spirit meek,
Thy large compassion, ever first to spare
The blind, the weak.

And when, too oft, we come
To worship, with a full and busy heart,
From life's bright pictures, and its pleasant hum,
So hard to part,

We miss thy trembling words,
The world-bound spirit that could gently raise,
Turning to higher thoughts, its inmost chords,
And hymns of praise.

Ereast, and plain, and few,
We listened, touched with their heart-tendering
And owned the Father's waterings anew [power,
Of seed and dower.

Pure trickling from the stream,
That flows for healing from the Eternal throne;
We only saw the Gospel's crystal gleam—
Nought of thy own.

We miss thy loving heart,
That found its vent in kind words, and good deeds,
Planned in those heavenly places, where, apart,
The Christian feeds.

We miss thy noiseless worth,
That asked no notice, and we softly lay
Its uncton to our souls, while "earth to earth"
Sadly we say.

Oh! when the heart lies still,
When the eye closes, and the lip is cold,
When the outgoings of an obedient will
Its rounds have told,

The memory then, how sweet,
That from the living lip, but kindness fell,
And words of love learned at the Saviour's feet,
Or Sychar's well.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Extracts from My Christian Experience.

BY T. G. TAYLOR, THE CONVERTED CONVICT.

[A few years ago there appeared in THE FRIEND some notice of a visit paid to the Iowa penitentiary at Anamosa, by some of our Friends of that State; and also of a prisoner there who had been led to see the error of his ways and to seek for mercy and forgiveness from his Heavenly Father, whose ear is ever open to the cries of the true penitents. After receiving, as he believed, forgiveness for himself, his heart was turned towards others who were still the servants of sin. The passages published in this article, and in a preceding one in No. 3, are taken from the tract he prepared, in a hope that it might be useful to others.—Ed.]

TRUE PRAYER.

The prayer of a poor penitent sinner is the forerunner of salvation; he cannot pray and perish. It matters not what his prayer is; it may be a sigh, it may be a tear, or a prayer in broken English, ungrammatical and harsh to the ear, if only it be from the heart.

"Prayer is the breath of God in man returning whence it came."
"Whoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved."

THE RESULT OF SIN.

Sin has sown the world with wretchedness, and made man to inherit misery and death; has made the creature to sally forth in an unholly and unequal war with the Creator. The horrors attendant upon sin exceed the power of mortal tongue to describe, or imagination to depict. Look upon the thousands of prisoners now confined within the jails and penitentiaries of this and other lands—the toil, the disappointment and vexation, sorrow and disease stamped upon man, all serve to tell us what sin hath wrought. And, further, a large share of the history of this world is one of crime, which began at the gates of Paradise, and has been followed by a string of moral delinquencies to the present time, such as murders, thefts, and numberless abominations. Contemplate the end of man, the brevity of human existence, the teeming multitude always thronging the gates of death, once active in mind and body, which teach us to spell out the devastating nature of sin. Could we descend to the abodes of the lost, and witness the suffering of the numberless throng and hear the unending moans of eternal despair, we might read in awful characters the fruit of sin. Oh! what direful consequences attend the fall of man. But how delightful it is to reflect that there is nothing in sovereign electing grace to militate against a sinner coming to God for peace and mercy. The decrees of God never erected a barrier in the way of any. It is sin that has done all the mischief and continues to separate from his redeeming grace. Let thy mercy, Oh Lord! so influence our souls that the natural enmity of our hearts may be removed. May we seek to enjoy through Christ the pardon of our sins, and be made partakers of the Holy Spirit, and eventually be received to Thy presence, in glory to enjoy eternal fellowship through Thy matchless grace.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Those of you who have not seen adobe, must know that it is the main building material of a country where timber is not, and where the inhabitants are too lazy (certainly not lacking ingenuity) to hew out and erect stone dwellings. Selecting the site of their home, they begin by hoeing up into a convenient pile some of the surrounding soil. This mixed with water to a pasty consistency and worked up with chopped hay or straw, is moulded into blocks three inches thick, ten by eighteen, and laid on a sandy place in the hot sun to dry. These bricks are laid in a wall of single thickness, to the height of ten feet. Two feet below this they insert rafters of poles from wall to wall, and overlay these with sticks, and plaster the whole with mud, having poles every four feet in the street wall, from which gutters project three feet into the air streetward, for the discharge of what does not gain a quicker admittance through the roof. A fence or house of this material lasts from three to five years, and these in all stages of dilapidation and erection abound in and around Paso del Norte.

The Mexican takes the place of the Negro in Texas, and he is a sorry substitute for that great perplexity. The Mexican has exactly all the worst thieving, lying, spendthrift habits of the African, and lacks his one or two redeeming features, good nature, forgiveness of injury, and the religious element. Texans charge most of their bad reputation to the wickedness of deprecatory Mexicans, against whom the government being slow to give military protection, the settlers took the law into their own hands. This continued so long, and the Mexican even now proves himself so incapable of better things, that a generation of men have grown up in South Texas, who long for an uprising and complete extermination of the race in our borders. At San Antonio the Mexican colony having a few cases of small-pox among them were ordered to send their sick to the pest-house provided for that purpose. One of them refused, and about sixty men of the town quickly arming themselves, rushed out and demanded immediate obedience, which was of course yielded to. I lived for three weeks with one of these men, and he spoke with evident regret that the Mexicans had not again refused, "for," said he, "if they had, we would have killed them all before we left the place." When I expressed my surprise, he said it was an every-day occurrence to find dead Mexicans, and then proceeded to justify the claim by detailing three events of the kind occurring the week before I arrived.

One of the worst features of the Mexican is his love of dirt, and the consequent diseases this breeds in the country. In le Christi and Brownsville the small-pox and yellow fever would be no more, if the Mexican colonies did not continue to propagate it. At present both diseases are claiming daily victims in these towns, and my driver to-day said that there were a few cases of small-pox now in Paso del Norte!

I could write pages about the family and family ways and home of John Priour, with whom I sojourned three weeks in Texas, but must abbreviate. The house, a one-story frame without ceiling or plastering, and boasting many cracks for air and sunshine, had three rooms, one of which being allotted to me, the family of seven filled the other two. Beneath the house another family of seven puppies were being reared. In the yard were two domesticated wild geese, a large Mexican parrot, two wild penned pigs, two dogs, two horses, and four calves. All these animals contributed greatly to our comfort, discomfort, grief and enjoyment. You must know that while family life hath its joys, it also hath griefs, as Bacon says. Priour being a hunter, occasionally added to his stock of curiosities, three young coons being part of the list, and a wild rabbit. Priour and self took one long trip of thirty miles, with team and tent for three days, across country westward to the Nueces River, and had very good success in getting new species of birds from that locality.

As I wrote of San Antonio, east and south Texas is a fertile, fairly watered, and in many districts, well-wooded country, full of promise. But in the limits of this page or of a hundred such, it would be folly to renew a subject on which, while so little informed, my enthusiasm would induce me to pen a volume. * * * Here I was stopped by the jolting of the train which I had just boarded at El Paso. Now I am facing the sunrise behind the Tucson Mountains, and am seated on the porch of the San Navier House, close by the Central Pacific depot. A few remarks about my western ride from San Antonio to this place, and then I will close. There is a level and slightly rolling stretch of cultivated country west of San Antonio as far as D'Hanis, in Medina County, where the first hills appear and the soil begins to be poor, or rather the climate becomes drier, for none of this soil, however sandy, appears infertile when well watered. We passed along the bend of the Rio Grande in the night, following it closely along the narrow, frowning gorges for miles, and then left it toward morning and emerged by a continual ascent on to the table-lands and high prairie, where the mountain ranges never after were wholly out of sight, and at times we were surrounded by them on all sides, as at this place.

These mountain plains are thickly peopled with prairie dogs, burrowing owls, jack-rabbits, and cattle, and despite their parched appearance and the innumerable skeletons lying along the railroad, all animal life seemed to be thoroughly enjoying itself. Mingled with the herds of cattle and horses, an occasional pair of antelopes would be seen looking carelessly at the train. The rabbits and prairie-dogs were very tame, and had their houses within twenty feet of the track. The towns along this portion of the route consisted mainly of section-houses from ten to twenty miles apart, about each of which were a few huts of the Mexican workmen, and four or five homes of the whites, who dared the experiment of living without other water than what the tank-cars brought them. The flora of these parts is far from abundant, but for that reason the more noticeable. A large branching species of cactus with deep cardinal-purple flowers is now in full bloom, and very showy. Also the Spanish bayonet, with its tall snaky clusters. A yellow daisy in profusion, three or four more species of aster, and an occasional bunch of intense crimson spikes on downy silver-leaved stems two feet high, are worthy of mention. No trees on plain or mountain have I seen; it is either bare rock and sand, or dwarf chaparral and half-dead grasses. The temperature in mid-day averages about 90° and drops at night to 55° or 60°. The sky is rarely overcast, and a good breeze through the day makes the shade bearable, but the mid-day sun on the open plain is withering indeed. I must now look about me and see if Tucson contains any congenial spirits in my line of work.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Parasite of the Hessian Fly.—The State entomologist of Illinois, having lately received a few larvae of a supposed parasite of the Hessian fly, enclosed in a box a small patch of growing wheat, so arranged that it could receive light and air. In this he placed some Hessian flies and the larvae. The larvae developed into a very small wasp-shaped insect, which with unerring instinct finds the place where the fly has laid its eggs, and boring into the straw, lays its egg inside of the egg of the fly. There it develops into a grub, which destroys the egg of the fly. This parasite is first discovered in the wheat fields of Southern Russia.

Domestic Serpent.—Rats have so multiplied in many parts of Brazil, that the inhabitants rear a kind of boa, about twelve feet in length, to destroy them. The snake is sold at from a dollar to a dollar and a half, in the market. It is harmless and sluggish, passing the day in sleep. At nightfall it begins to hunt, seizing the rats by the nape of the neck and crushing the cervical vertebrae. It becomes so accustomed to its master's house, that if carried to a distance, it escapes and finds its way back home.

Meteorite Diamonds.—At the late meeting at Washington of the American Association of Science, a paper was read by Professor Foote, describing a locality of meteorites which he had explored in Arizona; 131 specimens were found, the two largest of which weighed respectively 201 and 154 pounds. The others ranged from 6 lbs. 10 oz. downwards. The mineral was extremely hard. An emery wheel was ruined in trying to polish a section. This led to a closer examination, when small black diamonds were found in some exposed cavities, that readily cut polished corundum.

Popocatepetl.—The crater of Popocatepetl—being an extinct volcano—is now a valuable sulphur mine. To obtain this product, it is necessary to descend into the crater by means of a rope, one of great length being required for the purpose; and when a certain quantity is secured, it is packed in mats before being hoisted to the mouth of the crater. The Indians tie these packages together, then making a cushion of their serapes, they slide down the volcano as far as the snow extends, dragging the mats after them. On the north side of the volcano, near the limit of tree-growth, the sulphur is distilled in iron retorts, and is then ready for the market. The crater's mouth is huge in dimensions, being half a mile in diameter, and the amount of native sulphur deposited there is enormous—practically inexhaustible. This profitable sulphur mine is owned, or was, a few months since, by General Ochoa, a resident of the capital. It is said that when Cortez had expended his supply of gunpowder, he resorted to the crater of Popocatepetl for sulphur to make a fresh supply; and that the natives had never ascended the mountain until the Spaniards showed them the way.—Aztec Land.

National Library of Mexico.—This admirable collection of books numbers nearly two hundred thousand. The confiscated convent of Saint Augustine serves as an appropriate building for this library of choice books. We say of choice books, not only because they are many of them unique, but because all books are choice, being sources from which the careful student and historian can cull true history and philosophy. He does not accept each and all of the statements which are here presented, but from the collated mass culls the truthful deduction. These books very largely and very naturally relate to religious subjects as they are mostly made up from the confiscated convent libraries heretofore existing in Mexico. Valuable modern and secular books have been added to these collections from time to time. Our attention was called to a volume bearing the date of 1472, and to one still older, which was printed in two colors. There is here an atlas of England which was printed in Amsterdam in 1659, with steel plates, and in colors which are as bright and fresh as though just from the press. A Spanish and Mexican dictionary, printed in Mexico in 1571, showed how early the printing-press followed the period of the conquest. A book of autographs bearing the names of Cortez's notable soldiers, was interesting. This, we understood, was one of the much coveted prizes which has been sought by foreign collectors. The manuscripts are of great antiquity, and interest. One was in the form of a large volume, done with the pen in old English letters; another, very highly prized, is of painted pictures, which purports to be original dispatches from Montezuma to his allies, and which was captured by Cortez. This last is on a roll of prepared deerskin.—Aztec Land.

Snake bites.—It is curious that while for several years past from 20,000 to 23,000 people in British India die every year from snake-bite, in the French possessions in Farther India and in the Dutch settlements in the Malay Archipelago and in tropical Southern China, the deaths from this cause do not, in each, exceed ten in the year. About 1,500 species of snakes are known.

The Sahara.—There have been a great number of artesian wells bored in the Sahara, largely by the French government. The wells range from 75 to 400 feet in depth; the water rises about two feet above the surface. The land reclaimed by means of them is said to measure 12,000,000 acres.

Items.

Roman Catholic Feeding in Mexico.—A colporteur who had been circulating the Scriptures in the State of Sinaloa, on the west coast of Mexico, on arriving at the capital city was thus noticed by the Roman Church Organ:

"A PROTESTANT PROPAGANDIST.—This week there has arrived in the city a Protestant minister who, it is said, comes from El Fuerte, because of having had such poor success in his sale of multitudes of Bibles, the amount of which heretofore business he found no one to rent him a house or sell him food, having been in this way thrust out and banished from the town.

"We understand that he is lodged here in some kind of a house (we don't know what house it is, nor do we wish to know), where he has set out a table with Bibles for sale at twenty-five cents, and that he calls to the people who pass by, and tells them to bring him their children, that he may teach them Christian doctrine.

"Let all Catholic parents know that they must not buy of him, nor receive as a gift, Bibles, nor any other little book or tract, nor take to him their children, nor visit him, nor speak to him, nor lodge him in their houses, nor give him food or drink, nor wash his clothes; and that artisans must not work for him, etc., etc., because in any one of these ways they would be aiding his Protestant propagandism—an act prohibited by the holy Church, with grave censures and even with excommunication. If any Catholics through ignorance have bought of him, or received in any other way, Bibles, tracts, etc., let them give them to the cura to be burned. This is the conduct which we Catholics must observe with the Protestants, and we may not show them charity, except when they are seriously ill, when being taught they are aiding his Protestantism.

This attack was severely reprobated by a Liberal paper—showing that all Mexicans are not so intolerant as the editor of the Church Organ.

Marriage Laws in New Jersey.—To illustrate the inadequacy of these laws to protect the sacred contract of marriage, a paper of Philadelphia recently sent one of its reporters and his wife to Camden, N. J., who were re-married five times without an inquiry or investigation! That State is one of the most deficient among civilized communities as to any safeguards in the performance and recording of marriages.

Catholic Statistics.—The Census Bulletin of the United States gives the whole number of communicants of the Roman Church in the United States as 2,350,045. Of these there reside in New York, 1,159,190; Massachusetts, 614,627; Pennsylvania, 551,577; and Illinois, 478,324. That these numbers are largely due to immigration is shown by the languages spoken by the members, which include German, Polish, Lithuanian, Hungarian, Bohemian, French, Spanish and Italian. Perhaps the most unexpected statement of the whole is that Boston, which has been regarded as a typical New England town, has in its arch-diocese over 400,000 Roman Catholics. These are, probably, largely of Irish descent and French Canadians, who have been largely employed of latter years in the factories of New England.

The Russian Orthodox Greek Church has 18,504 communicants (mostly in Alaska); the Greek Orthodox, 100 (in Louisiana); and the Armenian, 35 more than one-half of whom are in Worcester, Mass.

The Holy Coat Exhibition.—There has long been reserved at Treves a coat said to be the seamless garment which our Saviour wore when led to his crucifixion. Its claim to this distinction is contested by about twenty other coats. But there is a satisfactory evidence to prove that any one of these garments dates to so remote an era, and the probabilities largely preponderate that the belief in their pretensions is founded only in priestcraft and superstition. The Roman Catholic authorities have determined to exhibit it publicly the present year, and it is expected that great crowds of people will flock to Treves to see it; and the citizens of Treves as well as the priests calculate upon being enriched by the money spent among them by those visitors. The Presbyterian justly remarks: "Supposing it to be the veritable coat worn by our blessed Lord, it is neither to be venerated or trusted in." As an antiquarian relic it would possess much interest, but it could have no more spiritual efficacy than any other worn garment. Men are too apt to forget that the Spirit of Christ is the only effective agent in their salvation, and it does not operate through old clothes, but directly on the heart of man.

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 19, 1891.

NORTH CAROLINA YEARLY MEETING.

Since the remarks on this Yearly Meeting, in the last number of THE FRIEND were prepared, a letter has been received from another member of that body, which confirms the previous report as to the unsound doctrines preached by some of the visitors. The letter says:—

"Our late Yearly Meeting appointed a committee to revise our Discipline. It seemed to me an unsuitable time to enter into that work as our body is so unsettled, and there is such a difference in thought and in teaching. I was present at our late Yearly Meeting. There were quite a number of the Protestant Friends, ministers of other Yearly Meetings, present; and the strangest teaching by them I ever heard.

"Silence seemed wholly ignored; the Scriptures put equal with the Spirit, in theory, and far ahead in practice; the Bible was held in the hand of the speaker most of the time, and often read in the devotional meetings—which meetings gathered by singing, the ministers calling upon the congregation to sing, a few times asking every one present to join in the song; entire sanctification claimed by most of them, and all believers urged to come to the place of consecration just then: which many professed to do. We were taught that we must not feel that we were weak, but strong in the Lord and in the power of his might, &c.

"I tried to listen without prejudice, and to accept the good in all: to find the kernel, even though the shell was thick, and, by his element, I failed to find that humility and the daily cross had any place in their teaching. One Friend preached the strongest sermon on the resurrection of the body that I ever heard or read.

"Certain classes in the meetings—I mean all these things were done in the devotional meetings and the regular meetings for worship, not in the meetings for discipline, were frequently asked to sing, and sometimes to kneel and pray.

"One minister said, the doctrine of the inward Light was a damnable heresy, and the enemy was always at the bottom of it.

"However, I do not wish to convey that they all taught such, or that all our members accepted such teaching. Such was not the case. There were those who could not rejoice in the so-called revival—some of us had not learned Christ—these were exercised and sorrowful. The ministers and elders had a very clear lesson at their last session on the scriptural teachings of the inward Light, [by one of our own ministers]."

The writer of the above had her mind so much exercised about the false doctrines held forth among them, that she has not given many particulars as to the business that came before the meeting. From printed accounts we glean the following additional items.

There were visiting ministers, or elders, in attendance from Kansas, Western Indiana, Iowa, New York, and New England Yearly Meetings.

Lyndon L. Hobbs was appointed clerk for the year; and Josiah Nicholson and James E. Cartland, assistants.

Letters from the Yearly Meeting were addressed to the aged members who are unable to attend; and to the children.

L. L. Hobbs returned the minute granted him to go to England in the interests of Guilford College; he had collected there about £985.

Since the preceding remarks were written, we have received a letter from a concerned Friend, which says, speaking of North Carolina Yearly Meeting:—

"I had an account of one of those meetings in a private letter from a young man who was there. He is not a member with Friends, and his objections to what he witnessed seemed to arise from his sense of its unfitness for any meeting of worship. He spoke of the exercises as being one continuous activity of tongues; and of the language of the leading preacher as boldly averring that Friends do maintain a distinct order of men set apart for the ministry, who devote themselves to this calling, and are paid for their services. He let them know that he was one of this order."

The reading of the above letter reminds us of a reference to the subject of paid ministry contained in an editorial in The Friends' Review, of Ninth Month 3rd:—

North Carolina Yearly Meeting of Ministry and Oversight, adopted this year a minute, of which the following is a part:

"The minister who lives for no other purpose than the service of the Gospel, must have his carnal needs supplied by those whose spiritual welfare he looks after."

This minute was by the Yearly Meeting, referred back to the Meeting of Ministry and Oversight.—This is not surprising, in view of the attitude of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, hitherto, towards innovations among Friends.

The above quote exemplify remarkably the quality of ambiguity, which was characteristic of the oracles of the ancient Greeks and Romans. Taken just as they stand, they may be accepted as true, almost a truism; at least if we understand by the minister's needs those wants which, by reason of his necessary engrossment in religious labor, he has no means of supplying without assistance. It would be equally true to say that "The Christian lives for no other purpose than to serve God and his fellow men, such have his carnal needs supplied by his fellow-Christians, whenever his own exertions for any reason fail to meet them."

But the paragraph quoted was not meant to be taken practically just and only as it stands. We say this as a reasonable inference: it is shown by the dissent from it on the part of a sufficient number of members of the Yearly Meeting, to result in its recommendation to the much respected body by which it was offered. Moreover, this inference is confirmed by what is known among us of what we call the "pastoral movement." Two or three propositions may be read "between the lines" of the minute:

"Ministers should, as a general rule, devote their whole lives to preaching the Gospel; not engaging in secular avocations." Being, by reason of their position as ministers, secluded from self-support by business, ministers should, as a body, receive pecuniary support from the meetings to which they belong, or amongst which they labor."

"Looking after the spiritual welfare of the members of meetings or churches, should be consigned to ministers (pastors), having nothing else to do; thus relieving of that duty elders, overseers, and other lay members."

From all these propositions, we dissent; in common, as we understand it, with a weighty portion of North Carolina Yearly Meeting.

We have received from John J. Wilson, of Fayrestove, Kendal, England, a small pamphlet which contains notes on a book prepared by Major-General Sir Garnet J. Wolsley, entitled "The Soldier's Pocket Book for Field Service," and designed to give such instruction to officers as may increase their military efficiency. This book, J. J. Wilson says, "will conclusively prove to the candid reader the unspeakably satanic nature of war from first to last."

The first point J. J. W. notices is the overbearing pride which General Wolsley inculcates as necessary for the soldier:—"he must be taught to despise those in civil life."

"Decit is everywhere inculcated; "You can by spreading false news among the gentlemen of the press, use them as a medium by which to deceive an enemy."

The policy of exterminating a flying enemy is advocated.

Lord Wolsley talks of chivalrous feelings, and then goes on to describe the best way of burning houses, starving populations, and destroying mills, farms, and railways.

On all which, J. J. Wilson remarks:—"Surely if Christianity means following Christ, the Prince and Savior of the world, no Christian with such a handbook as Lord Wolsley's before him, can enter upon such a vocation without first renouncing his faith."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—W. F. Shunk, the U. S. Chief of Commission surveying for the proposed Pan-American Railroad through Ecuador, reports that no natural obstacles were encountered between Quito and the Colombian frontier. He is, moreover, of the opinion that no obstacles will be found north of Tulcan.

It is reported that the steamer Itata is to be returned to the Chilean Government, the agreement being that the United States Government is to receive a sum equivalent to the expenses incurred in pursuing and capturing the Itata and that then the case will be nolle prosequi in the courts.

The U. S. Court at South McAllister, in the Indian Territory, has refused to quash the indictment against E. P. Scott, of Paris, Texas, for selling beer in the Territory, Scotland, &c., and to quash the indictment, on the ground that it charged no offense of the law, and that beer was not a liquor. On the other hand, the attorney for the United States Court in the Indian Territory has dismissed the prosecutions against the beer sellers of Ardmore, Judge Bryan holding that the Court has no jurisdiction. This removes the barrier on the sale of beer, with one exception—its liability to be destroyed by the Indian police. No one expects this to occur, however.

On the 9th inst. the Secretary of the Interior issued an order directing that all cattle be removed from the Cherokee Strip without delay. The Treasury Department has authorized the Collector at New York to admit to free entry a bicycle recently imported there by a resident of Kansas. The bicycle was purchased by the importer while abroad Seventh Mo, 1890, and was used by him in travelling in Europe, he being crippled and entirely dependent upon the bicycle as a means of locomotion.

A dispatch to the Public Ledger from Buffalo, dated Ninth Month 14th, says: The train that arrived at East Buffalo at 2 o'clock 50 minutes 54 seconds left the Grand Central Depot, New York, this morning at 7:40 minutes. It made the run, including three stops, in 130 minutes, the distance being about 111 1/2 miles. The stops were made at Albany, Syracuse and Fairport, at the two former places to change engines and at Fairport to take water and cool a hot journal. The Syracuse and Albany stops were 34 minutes each, and the Fairport stop 7 minutes. Deducting for the time thus spent it appears that the train averaged about 42 1/2 minutes. The fastest mile was made in 48 seconds, and many others were made in 49 and 50.

A dispatch received on the 13th inst., from Denver, Col., says: Passenger train No. 214, bound toward Denver, on the Grayson district of the Union Pacific Railroad, was wrecked at the mouth of the river near Beaver Brook Station, and 26 passengers were injured, five of whom will probably die.

There were two arrests made in Boston during Eight Month than in any month for five years. The number was 4,171, of which 2,735 arrests were for drunkenness. In New York during the same period 1,000 persons were generally arrested, less than the Bostonians took into custody for drunkenness alone. These figures show how few drunks are arrested at all, in New York.

William Grace was arrested in this city last week on a charge of peddling liquor without a license. Grace is the loudest of the best fellows of the sewer, and was peddling it in a push cart. Magistrate Stevin held that the act of Assembly of Sixth Month 9, 1891, applied only to wagons, and no other vehicles, and as the defendant had used a push cart he did not violate the law. Grace was then discharged. What a field this opens to the lawless peddlers!

DEATHS in this city last week numbered 365, which is 1 less than during the previous week, and 16 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing, 21 died of marasmus; 20 of consumption; 26 of heart disease; 20 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 20 of cholera infantum; 15 of cholera; 14 of typhoid fever; 14 of casualties; 11 of inflammation of the brain; 12 of pneumonia; 10 of Bright's disease, and 10 of old age.

FOREIGN.—A sensation was created throughout Britain on the 14th inst., by the announcement that England has seized the town of Sigri, on the island of Mitylene, within twenty-five miles of the Hellespont. It is believed this step received the connivance of Turkey, and was taken to counteract the designs of Russia.

The Board of Trade returns show that the threatened contraction of British commerce has already commenced. The decrease in exports is largely due to the falling off in the tin plate trade. Of a decrease of £205,000 in textile exports, £400,000 is in cotton goods to the east. Cera and flour imports show a decline in 1890, indicating a large contraction, as prices have been higher. Other textile imports show increases.

In regard to the reports of the Labor Congress, in session last week at Newcastle, Eng. John Burns, who represents the advanced section of the Labor Union, said to the New York World's correspondent: "I am much delighted with the results achieved by the advanced section of the Congress. Important and great are the strides that have been made, if the men had been better organized greater results would have been obtained. The voting on the chief question, that of eight hours, is eminently satisfactory. The acceptance of the principle of permissive rejection of the eight-hour question further than that of the principle of permissive adoption. I venture to predict that this settles the eight-hour question for all time. Generally speaking, this has been all round the most successful Labor Congress I know of."

A telegram from London, says: The weather has suddenly become for the better all over the country, more especially in the south of England. There have been long days of sunshine. Harvesting is now everywhere in full swing, and the farmers, not prone to a confession of that kind, agree in the admission that, after all the damage done by the persistent rain, the crop will fall out well and in good expectation. The consequence was quickly felt in the grain market, where prices have steadily dropped through the week.

"It is authoritatively stated that in the north of Europe the harvest prospects are so deplorable that bread has already gone up 10 per cent, and the farmers are now raising for the winter."

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Selections from the Journal of William Evans.

1837.—At a large meeting at Newport, he writes:

"It was impressed on me to show that religion is not a speculative thing, but a real heart-elt work. The Prophet Malachi compared the dispensation, to be afterwards introduced, to the burning of an oven. John, the forerunner, said, that the axe was laid to the root of the trees, and every tree that brought not forth good fruit, was to be hewn down, and cast into the fire. He that sent him to baptize, said, 'Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on him, the same is He which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost.' 'Whose fan is in his hand, and He shall thoroughly purge his floor, and will gather the wheat into his garner; but the chaff He will burn with fire unquenchable.' Here the operation of Christ's religion is, in three places, compared to fire. Thence I was led to describe some of its effects, in rooting out and destroying every evil plant and fruit in us; and thereby preparing the soul to receive Christ, and his kingdom and government. Where this is experienced, love prevails; first to our Heavenly Father, and then towards one another, and all mankind. Here, wars and confusion are brought to an end; and all such, being united by one Spirit, into one body, became united together in spreading the kingdom of the Messiah; whose design and work it is, that it may extend from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth."

"I attended the several sittings of the Yearly Meeting; in which way was opened to hold forth the ground on which our religious Society was gathered: that of entire dependence upon the Minister of the Sanctuary, in all its religious assemblies. The importance of rightly maintaining our discipline, was also adverted to, as a means of preservation to the flock; and a source of instruction and of useful exercise of the gifts and faculties bestowed upon us. The young people were called upon to dedicate themselves to his service; and as they were properly concerned, they would be benefited by the example and wisdom of their elders; and feel their hearts knit to one another, and to their more advanced brethren, as that of Jonathan and

After the Yearly Meeting "we went to Providence; attended their meeting for worship on First-day morning; and were at the boarding-school in the afternoon; in both which, Divine help was granted to preach the Gospel. We sat an hour and a half, before the way opened for me to say anything; but afterwards a qualification was granted, to enforce the importance of co-operating with the means which Divine mercy has provided, to enable man to work out the salvation of the soul. This is very simple in its requisitions; but must, nevertheless, be accepted and obeyed; if it is not, we shall be rejected and left to ourselves. The expressions were brought into view: 'They have Moses and the prophets, let them hear them;' 'If they hear not Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead.' Naaman, the Syrian, was offended at the simplicity of the means pointed out for his cure; but when he yielded, it effected the object, and his flesh returned as that of a little child. It was a pretty open time.

"In the afternoon, the protection of our Heavenly Father, extended to Jacob and Joseph, when separated from parental care, was held up to the view of the children, at the boarding-school; and their caretakers were encouraged to apply for that wisdom which is derived from above, to enable them to go in and out rightly before their interesting charge; and so to govern them, as to bring them to Christ; that they might be prepared as good ground, to receive the precious seed of the kingdom, in their hearts."

Attending the morning and afternoon meetings in New York, he states that,—

"In the first, Truth opened the way to set forth the necessity of faith in God; without which it is impossible to please Him; that faith which gives victory over our corrupt propensities, and through which we are enabled to bring forth the fruits of the Holy Spirit; for as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works, is dead also. The importance of coming to realize the blessings of the Gospel of Christ; in which we profess to be true believers; not contenting ourselves in a mere belief and profession, were enforced, under feelings of love, and sincere desire for those present; that thus they might be preachers of righteousness in life and conversation; and lights to others, in the midst of a worldly-minded and dissipated people. It was a time of renewed favor; and prayer was offered up for the feeble-minded and fearful, yet sincere disciples of the Lord Jesus; that He would lift up his Holy Spirit, as a standard against Satan, in his assaults upon them; and strengthen them to acknowledge, in all their ways, the right of the dear Son of God to set up his kingdom, and rule in the hearts of all mankind.

"Our beloved and endeared friend, Elizabeth Coggeshall, having received a severe injury from a fall, a few days before we reached the city, on going to see her, she expressed much thankfulness that her life was not taken in that manner; and that not even a bone was broken. Yet in a retrospect of the many trials which, in the course of her life, had fallen to her lot, she was much affected. I endeavored to comfort her with the fact, that in the midst of all her deep afflictions, she had endeavored to show forth the efficacy of the religion of the Lord Jesus; and in the end, as she persevered, all would be well with her. She was a strength to her friends in the consistent example which she set, by her meekness and cheerfulness under affliction. She expressed her fellowship with me in the bonds of the Gospel; which was encouraging, coming from one who had ministered to me when I was an apprentice, and by her very affectionate notice, not only endeared herself, but the Truth she preached, and invited others to."

After his return from Rhode Island, W. E. records, that he and his truly valuable wife attended the Monthly Meeting at Abington; where, he says:

"The way opened to hold forth the efficacy of true faith in the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ; and the necessity of keeping it steadfastly unto the end; that so we might fight the good fight, and finish our course with joy, in the prospect of receiving the crown of righteousness, which is laid up for all that love Him with sincerity. The visitations of heavenly love in early life, and the advantage of obeying the Divine voice, as Samuel did, were pressed upon the young people. It was a tendering time to many of them; and my dear wife was favored to petition the Father of mercies, on behalf of the youth, the strong men, and the fathers and mothers, who had held forth a hand of help and encouragement to others; but who, as they drew near the close of their day, were assailed with the buffetings of Satan; and sometimes with fears lest they should not, at last, find that resting-place and blessed reward they longed for."

"At Salem Quarterly Meeting, held at Woodbury, I was engaged to hold forth the importance of faithfulness in little things. As our growth in the Truth was by slow gradations, so he that despised the day of small things, would fall by little and little. The departure of such from the strait and narrow way, as well as from the entrance into it, was from a small beginning; and if we left it, though we might think we kept much in the same course, yet every step took us further and further from it. Little things were often an indication that some were losing that sincere love to the Truth, and fervent desire to walk in it, which they had once felt. It might be in some small departures in dress, language or manners, from the simplicity of the cross, which their friends would be painfully affected with; though they might not at once disclose to them, the sorrow and exercise which it occasioned them. The eye which had been closed, would be opened to look upon temptation; and that eye which the Lord had anointed and opened to see, in measure, the beauty and excellency of the Truth, would become dim; and they would not be able to see things in the true light, as they had once seen them. Their judgment would be clouded; and the way opened for the tempter to gain further advantages; and having departed from the path cast up for the Lord's children to walk in, they could not foresee where they might be permitted to wander, or into what temptation they might fall. Warning and invitation were extended to the youth; and the language of encouragement to the honest-hearted travellers, who might, in this day of stripping, be like one of a family and two of a tribe; mourning over the desolations of Zion."

At the time of holding it, he notes:

"My wife and myself went to Burlington, to attend the Quarterly Meeting. Some ability was furnished to labor amongst them, particularly in the meeting held on Third-day. It appeared to be my place to hold up the glory of the Gospel dispensation; which consists in the universal outpouring of the Lord's Spirit on all flesh, agreeably to the prophecy of Joel, and the revelations made to John the beloved apostle; when he saw the pure river of the water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb; and the universal invitation to partake of it, in this language: 'The Spirit and the bride say, come: and let him that heareth say, come: and let him that is athirst, come; and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely.' The necessity of obedience to the early manifestations of this Divine Spirit, which, as it is received and obeyed, becomes as a well of living water to the thirsty soul; the gradations by which the babes in Christ witness a growth to the state of young men and strong men in Him, and through mercy, if they persevere, become established as pillars in the Lord's house, where the streams of that river 'make glad the city of God, the holy places of the tabernacle of the Most High,' were opened and enforced, under the feeling and authority of Divine love. Near the close, the condition of one or more, who had long resisted the striving of this Spirit, and might be in danger of hearing the awful sentence, 'Let him that is filthy be filthy still,' was closely spoken to, and they encouraged to lay hold of the renewed offers of Holy help. My beloved wife closed the meeting with reverent, fervent prayer; in which the last state was feelingly included; also the dear children, the lambs of the fold; the young and strong; and those whose earthly tabernacles were tottering, but who had endeavored to serve the Lord in their generation. It was a time of renewed favor, for which we humbly desired to ascribe praise, and thanksgiving, and gratitude to our Heavenly Father.

THERE is a vast amount of reveling in sin through the imagination, which stops there. It stops not for want of depravity, nor for want of opportunity, but because there is so much exposure, inconvenience, disadvantage, and personal self-injury in outward commission. The open sinner may seem more daring and reckless, but perhaps he who sins only in thought may be as reprehensible in God's sight.

It is one thing to have knowledge; it is another thing to be able to impart it. Many a man knows more than he can cause others to know; and he who has gained all the knowledge available on a given subject, may have yet to acquire the power of making it known to others.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Visit to the Pine Barrens.

There is a belt of country known locally as the "Pines," or Pine Barrens," in New Jersey, which extends from the northeast to the southwest across the State, marked by the presence in various parts, of beds of almost pure white sand, such as is adapted to glass-making, and noted among botanists for the number of plants that grow in it which are uncommon elsewhere. Hence it is a favorite resort of the lovers of that science.

On the 26th of the Eighth Month, the writer, in company with a friend, who possesses much knowledge of the plants found in this section of country, drove over early in the morning, to Medford, in Burlington County, and thence went some 11 or 12 miles further in a southerly direction towards Atsion, near which are extensive swamps rich in botanical treasures.

The list of flowers we met with, including those on the roadside between Moorestown and Medford, includes more than 100 species.—Among these was one of the honeysuckle family, belonging to the same genus as the snow-berry, which was formerly often to be seen in gardens—a low bush bearing little clusters of snow-white berries near the end of the branches. The species which we found differs from the cultivated one in having the berries of a bright red, and smaller. It is called Indian currant, or coral-berry (Symphoricarpos vulgaris). Its botanical name is derived from two Greek words and refers to the manner of growth of the fruit—in close clusters. I have seen it in early winter in North Carolina, after the leaves had fallen, when the bright red of the fruit made it a conspicuous object by the roadside and in gullies in the fields, and borders of woods—where it had found a foothold.

We were interested in observing on our way to Medford, the unusual number of plants of the Partridge-pea (Cassia chamaecrista), closely allied to the wild sensitive plant, having a similar beautiful pinnate foliage, but much larger and more showy yellow flowers, nearly an inch across and crowded in great numbers on the slender stems and branches. On many of them, about one foot in height, we could count fifty blossoms to each plant. It is not at all uncommon in our section of country; but I have no recollection of ever seeing it in anything like the same profusion. The manner in which some of our rarer plants appear and disappear, is a very interesting subject of study—and a rather puzzling one. The observant botanist will sometimes meet with certain plants in some degree of abundance in localities where he had not detected them before for years;—and perhaps the next season they will again have disappeared.

The Partridge-pea belongs to the great pod-bearing family of plants, in company with the peas, beans, &c. Whether, as its name indicates, it furnishes food to the quail, I cannot tell. Its favorite soil is of a sandy character, and we imagined that on entering the "Pines," we should meet with many specimens; but, to our surprise, not a single plant of it was visible there. Its place seemed to be taken by an allied species, the Wild Sensitive Plant (Cassia nitens), which has much smaller flowers, and spreads more on the ground. We admired, as I had often done before, its delicate and beautiful foliage. There are many species of Cassia found in different parts of the world, and the leaflets of several of these are used in medicine, under the name of senna.

Another pod-bearing plant that attracted our attention in the "Pines," was the Pencil-flower (Stylosanthes elatior); not that it was peculiar to that region, but on account of its abundance. It is a slender little plant, growing only a few inches high, with small bright yellow flowers. Almost everywhere along the road, but especially in the wooded portions, we were greeted by its bright face. We saw also the two species of Deer-grass—the square stemmed (Rhexia Virginica), and the round stemmed (Rhexia Mariana); several peculiar kinds of Golden-rods (Solidago), and Star-flower (Aster); five kinds of Bone-set (Eupatorium), and numerous other plants, which it would be tedious to enumerate.

Perhaps the most productive piece of ground that we explored was a small meadow, or marsh, by the roadside, that tempted us to leave our carriage. A rather small rose-colored flower, varying in shade to white, that was scattered through the grass, proved to be the rose-flowered Tick-seed (Coreopsis rosea). It received its generic name from the curious resemblance of its seed to a bug. They are flat on one side, convex on the other, and have two horns not unlike the antennae of an insect. There were numbers of the Pipewort (Eriocaulon), slender stems of about two feet high, crowned with small white knobs of flowers, and the narrow leaved Sun-flower (Helianthus angustifolius), remarkable for having long and very narrow leaves, like blades of grass. A hairy stemmed plant, covered with a dense cluster of dingy-yellow and loosely woolly flowers, with red fibrous roots, I was glad to meet with; for, although I had before met with it, I had preserved no specimens for the herbarium. It was the Redroot (Lachnanthes tinctoria). Its botanical name refers to the woolly-like fibres which clothe the flowers. Another plant that it was pleased to find, was the Virginian Chain-fern (Woodwardia Virginica), which, in its general appearance, considerably resembles the sterile fronds of the common Cinnamon fern (Osmunda), which grows everywhere in swamps and damp woodlands; while in the Osmunda the fruit is borne on separate fronds, which are entirely covered with it, and show no green leaf-like expansion; but in the Woodwardia, the fruit dots are arranged in chain-like rows on the back of the leaflets, which in other respects cannot be distinguished from the fronds which have no fruit on them.

One of the most interesting plants in this marsh was, a narrow leaved variety of the Arrow-head (Sagittaria sagittifolia), which, because of the many forms assumed by its leaves, was named by Engelman the S. variabilis. The flowers are white, and arranged in threes on the flower-stalk. As grown in some localities, the leaves are as wide as long, and the lobes at the base are broad; but in this swamp, they are reduced to very slender dimensions—which contrast strongly with the broadly developed parts of the ordinary arrow-head of other localities.

About 2 P. M. the weather became showery, which induced us to cease our rambling and turn homeward.

It may be doubted whether the greatest villain in the world ever thought himself much worse than his neighbors. Another is worse than himself, or he fancies him to be so, and he forthwith imagines that he is a moral character, because he is not the basest profligate in existence.—Tin Trumpet.

William Caton.

Whilst William Caton and John Stubbs were holding meetings in Kent, they were brought before the magistrates at Dover, who decided that a penalty should be inflicted on any one who gave them lodging; they were consequently turned out from the apartments which they had occupied at the inn. In this time of need they were befriended by a shoemaker, named Luke Howard, who having been told that a Quaker was preaching in the churchyard, at once went there, and seemed to find a sermon even in William Caton's countenance and demeanor; and protectively noticed the house which he entered, in order that he might visit him when the darkness of the winter evening should screen him from observation. But he soon grew bolder, for when the innkeeper no longer dared to entertain the young preachers, Luke Howard said to them, "Go home to my house, for I care not for the rulers nor the mayor either;" and he refused to give them up when asked to do so by the constables.

Two meetings were held in his house, of which the latter was regarded by him as the turning-point of his life. When his guests left the town, he walked two or three miles with them, and gave them the names of some places on the coast, and also of some persons who he thought might render them assistance: so much did he feel at parting with them that, even after returning to Dover, he found it difficult to restrain his tears. Deep inward trials were for a time his portion, but the Saviour to whom he had fled for refuge suffered not his faith to fail, and when almost ready to despair, these words came as a heavenly message to his soul: "I will cleave the rocks and mountains, that the redeemed of the Lord may come to Zion." Casting all his care upon Christ, henceforth hope was the anchor of his soul, though tempest after tempest might befall him. Thus, when describing his sixteen months' confinement in Dover Castle for attendance of meetings, he writes: "I had perfect peace, joy, and content in it all; and the Lord made it good unto me both within and without.*"

Before leaving Dover, John Stubbs and William Caton had remarked, in a letter to Francis Howgill and Edward Burrough, "A fire is kindled among them which cannot be easily quenched." Nor were they mistaken in this belief—for Dover was one of the first places in Kent where, in accordance with their advice, a meeting was established by those who were convinced of the truths which they preached.

During some years this meeting was held in silence, unless visited by a travelling minister; but Luke Howard, at whose house the Friends at first assembled, says that the Lord was their Teacher, and manifested his power and presence in their midst.

Whilst at Lydd, William Caton and his companions were kindly entertained at the house of Samuel Fisher, a very eminent Baptist minister, to whom they had been directed by Luke Howard. In his earlier life he had been a clergyman, but had resigned his living from conscientious motives. At first he did not fully acknowledge the influence which the ministry of his guests had on him; but when, after visiting some neighboring places, they had returned to Lydd—and another Baptist minister publicly preached against them and their doctrine;—Samuel Fisher arose and said, "Dear brother, you are very near and dear to me, but the Truth is nearer and dearer: this is the everlasting Truth and Gospel!" To the preacher's exclamation, "Our brother Fisher is also bewitched," he made no reply; in the course of that year he joined the Society of Friends. For ten years he diligently labored as a minister at home and abroad, and also as an author, often suffering severe persecution for the cause which was dearer to him than life. He died in the White Lion jail, in Southwark, after a long imprisonment.

So grateful were some of the open-hearted Kentish people to William Caton and John Stubbs, who had been enabled to labor very powerfully amongst them, that they urged them to receive gold, which was declined, with the reply that it was not theirs but them they sought. But at Maidstone a different reception awaited them; they were sent to the House of Correction, deprived of their Bible, money, &c., then stripped, and, with their necks and arms placed in stocks, desperately whipped until bystanders wept at the sight. After iron and large clogs of wood had been laid on them, they were ordered to work, and because they did not, were kept without food for some days. The women who lived in the house showed their pity by privately offering them refreshment, which they did not think it well to accept. Before they were set at liberty, a few things were restored to them; but they were dismissed from the town in contrary directions, each accompanied by constables, to whom (so states an old M.S. of Friends of East Kent), "their heavenly images and sober lives and words preached so much that they finally suffered them to travel alone whether they pleased."

Neither knew where the other had gone, and great was their pleasure at meeting in London; but soon they felt bound to return to Maidstone, and, though fearing the consequences of so bold a measure, their faith did not fail, and they were preserved from further persecution. On re-visiting other towns in Kent, they were cheered by the belief that their patient suffering had tended to confirm the faith of those to whom their ministry had been an effectual message. From Dover, William Caton crossed to Calais, where he had what he styles "a very gallant opportunity" at a mansion with some of the chief inhabitants, a Scotch nobleman acting as his interpreter. Soon afterwards he accompanied John Stubbs to Holland. They meant to sail from Yarmouth, whether they had walked from Dover, although travelling many miles a day; no hardship, perhaps, but for the fact that, in order to avoid expense, they sadly stinted themselves in food. Yet William Caton says that their reward was with them in all places and conditions.

After a delay of three weeks, they went on board a vessel, but, to their great disappointment, the captain refused to take them. As it seemed improbable that they would obtain a passage from that port, they thought it better to go northward. William Caton longed to visit his beloved friends at Swarthmoor, and a suitable opportunity for doing so occurred, to his extreme refreshment of body and soul. Before sailing, some meetings were held in Durham, which were of great service.

On returning from Holland, where very rough treatment was encountered, he again spent a short time at Swarthmoor Hall; he writes, "a very precious time we had together, whereby my very life was much revived; and therefore did my very soul magnify the Lord, with the rest of his lambs and babes in that place." Soon he started for Scotland, with John Stubbs. Many sufferings within and without were their portion, but the Lord sustained them through all, and their exceeding affection for each other was a continual source of comfort. In the following winter, in company with another Friend, William Caton visited Lancashire, Cheshire, &c., and says that time would fail him to relate "the extraordinary good service" which they had. He also attended a large General Meeting in Leicestershire, which was a very blessed time; George Fox, whom he had much wished to meet again, was present. A little later, whilst on his way to Scotland, he visited Ambleside, in which place courage and power were given him to address a congregation in a chapel, though the people first attacked him as if they had been wild beasts. At Elinburg and Letham many large meetings were held, sometimes in the streets, and much power in the ministry was granted to William Caton and the Friend who was with him.

About this time we find the former ill from the effect of "sore travel" from place to place. On their return to Cumberland they held meetings, which William Caton describes as being very large and precious, and he adds, "Friends were strengthened and confirmed in the precious Truth which in those days did flourish and prosper very much; and the Lord's power and presence was with us, through which we were carried on in his work and service, in which our souls delighted to be exercised. There being such an effectual door open abroad in the country, I was constrained, through the love of God which dwelt richly in my heart, to labor so much the more diligently; for I knew it was good working whilst it was day; and indeed a glorious and precious time we had, to make known unto the people the way of salvation, and what the Lord had done for our souls. Many believed and were converted, and brought to serve and worship the Lord in spirit and in truth."

Many of these meetings were held around Swarthmoor; soon afterwards he bade farewell to his friends there, and bent his steps southward. He was greatly cheered by his intercourse with Friends at Bristol, and with the "large and gallant meetings" held in that city and neighborhood, and says that he was enabled to "communicate to them of the overflowing of the life and power dwelling in him." Then we find him travelling westward, usually alone and on foot, to visit George Fox and other Friends in Launceston jail. Their intercourse was "in the fulness of endeared love" and though William Caton's chief aim might be to carry comfort to the prisoners, his own cup was filled to overflowing.

* Luke Howard gives the following beautiful description of the consolation afforded him one night during this, or another, imprisonment: "On the Thursday, the Eighth Month, 1661, in the night-watch, upon my bed of straw and chaff, in the common jail of Dover Castle, as I lay in a comfortable sleep and rest, the hand of my God fell upon me, and his sweet and comforting presence awakened me, and so continued with me unto the morning-watch; in which time the living presence of my God was with me and the comfortable presence of his Holy Spirit accompanied me; so that my soul was as if I were walking on the bank of a river which did overflow; the banks, so that nothing appeared but joy and gladness, and the streams of his everlasting virtue ran through me exceeding swift. * * * This is my God; I have waited for Him, and his appearance to me is as the morning without clouds, and his beauty hath taken my heart, and his sweetness hath ravished my soul; and with his exceeding riches, hath He adorned my inward man, and his everlasting strength is my salvation, even the Son of his love."

When at Totnes, he was brought before the mayor, who threatened him with a whipping; but the other magistrates thought more moderate measures might suffice. When they examined him a clergyman was present, and an excellent opportunity was afforded him to uphold the truth as it is in Jesus, for in that very hour, he says, the Lord was much with him. After spending the night in prison, he was sent on with a pass from place to place; an arrangement which had by no means the intended effect, for it soon became known, in one town after another, that William Caton was no pauper, but a Quaker, and people came out from their houses to see him, who he addressed freely on the truths dear to his soul.

After attending a General Meeting in Wiltshire, and some other services, he revisited Kent; he was but twenty years of age, yet his Saviour's grace and power were so manifestly granted him, that he shared in the wonder felt by others at the abundance given for the multitude who came to hear him. When he turned his thoughts to his own weakness, he was ready to faint; but when he placed his confidence in Christ alone, he became strong. Often he did not know what he should say when he entered a meeting, and yet so much was given him to communicate, that he would speak for two, three, or, occasionally, four hours. "Not unto me, not unto me, be the praise (he writes), but unto the Lord alone." I can truly say that which I received from Him I delivered unto his people. * * * An exceeding glorious day I had of it, and did much rejoice in the Lord, notwithstanding my great travails and sufferings; neither were they much to me, with all the perils and dangers I went through, both by sea and land, in comparison of the power and presence of the Almighty."

In the summer of the same year he again sailed for Holland, this time alone—though he longed for a companion—and in poor health from the effect of exposure to heat and cold during his almost incessant journeys. He met with scoffing and abuse from some fellow voyagers, who were, however, ready to give heed to his words when he addressed them in their dismay, during a dangerous storm, which had filled them with terror. Deep trials were his portion during this visit, which were increased when he became aware of the evils wrought by the extreme views promulgated by some who had joined the Society. At Middleburgh, William Caton and his interpreter were imprisoned some days, and then conveyed in a wagon to the coast. They were accompanied by several soldiers to protect them from the violence of the citizens; but, as William Caton says, the Lord was their chief keeper. Great were their sufferings during the following fortnight whilst prisoners on board a man-of-war, in which they were carried to England. Though the weather was very cold and stormy, they were obliged to lie on the bare planks, and were not even allowed the covering of a piece of sail-cloth. But God had not forgotten to be gracious. Whilst undergoing this treatment, William Caton's health and strength were, in a great measure, restored, though for a time he suffered severe pain in the feet, the result of keeping on shoes and stockings during so long a period of exposure to the cold.

Soon afterwards, he paid an extremely satisfactory visit to Sussex. At one place where a meeting was held, a rude crowd marched up to the house with a drum, seeming ready in their violence to pull down the building on the heads of those assembled. William Caton went out to them and asked what they wanted? "Quakers!" was the reply. "I am one," he said, and then power was given him to address them in such a manner as to make them withdraw in shame and fear. He met with a somewhat similar deliverance during his next visit to the Netherlands, where he spent more than a year engaged in ministerial service and authorship. On his return he was comforted by the blessed meetings held in London, where many were added to the Church; and he speaks of how God bestowed exceeding power and wisdom from above, on his servants and handmaids, who, in Christ's name, preached the Word of Life, not in meetings only, but in churches, markets, streets and highways—in deed wherever their Saviour led, and wherever He constrained them. They gave themselves wholly to God, and marvellous was the result.

"I made it my sole work to be found doing the work of God, unto which He had called me," writes William Caton, after describing meetings held in the North of England, where, as in many other parts of the country, the labors of Friends were producing extraordinary effect. Now and then he enjoyed extreme refreshment by intercourse with the family at Swarthmoor, "whom," he says, "he found in the same love, life, and power in which he left them." The very remembrance of these days was sweet to him in after years, and the more so from the continued consciousness of the love of Christ, by whose realized presence those seasons had been hallowed. It was this, also, which had often made his weary journeyings, and arduous labors a source of delight.

THAT touching the Almighty we cannot find Him out, even in the domain of the physical, becomes increasingly evident as we are more fully admitted to an acquaintance with his works.

The advance made in such acquaintance is notably instanced by the case of electricity,—an element which so long eluded human investigation and control, flashing in defiant liberty through the heavens, and hiding in the fearful mysterious phenomena that revealed its presence.

And yet this nobly subtle power has been enthralled, yielding to the decree of dominion over God's handiwork given to man. In the city below the clouds, when what we term the electric fluid leaps in exultant energy, it burns at the bidding of its new master, in fettered rows of lights, with a fancied air of sad submission, reminding us of the marvellous subjection of this once unbridled force to the multiplying purposes which it is itself suggesting. Such authority over nature is more and more granted to man, and, in view of progress already made, imagination cannot anticipate the insight into law and skill of manipulation in the sphere of the material he may attain. Do pride and presumption, then, become him? Nay; at each upward step disclosing a wider outlook, the creature should bow with yet deeper reverence and humility at the throne of the Creator, grateful for added knowledge and delegated lordship, but mindful when his blind, flattering followers ask expectantly, "Canst thou by searching find out God?" to answer with adoring awe, "Power belongeth unto God; and the Lord sitteth King forever."—*S. BETWEEN THE GATES.

BY JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER.

Between the gates of birth and death
An old and saintly pilgrim passed
With a look of one who witnesseth
The long-sought goal at last.

"O thou whose reverent feet have found
The Master's footprints in thy way,
And walked thereon as his holy ground,
A boon of thee I pray.

"My luck would borrow thy excess,
My feeble faith the strength of thine;
I need not thy soul's white saintliness
To hide the stains of mine.

"The grace and favor else denied
May well be granted for thy sake."
So, tempted, doubting, sorely tried,
A younger pilgrim spoke.

"Thy prayer, my son, transcends my gift;
No power is mine," the sage replied,
"The burden of a soul to lift,
Or stain of sin to hide.

"Howe'er the outward life may seem,
For pardoning grace we all must pray;
No man his brother can redeem
Or a soul's ransom pay.

"Not always age is growth of good;
Its years have losses with their gain;
Against some evil youth withstood
Its lands may strive in vain.

"With deeper voice than any speech
Of mortal lips from man to man,
What earth's unwisdom cannot teach
The Spirit only can.

"Make thou that holy Guide thine own,
And, following where it leads the way,
The known shall lapse in the unknown
As twilight into day.

"The best of earth shall still remain,
And Heaven's eternal years shall prove
That life and death, and joy and pain
Are ministers of Love."

A DAY OF THE LORD.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

It was not a day of fasting,
Nor a day of the brimming cup;
There were bitter drops in the fountain
Of life as it bubbled up,
And over the tollsome hours
Were sorrow and weakness poured,
Yet I said "Amen," when night came;
It had been a day of the Lord.

A day of his sweetest whispers,
In the hush of the tempest's whirl;
A day when the Master's blessing
Was pure in my hand as a pearl,
A day when, under orders,
I was fettered, yet was free;
A day of strife and triumph,
A day of the Lord to me.

And my head as it touched the pillow,
When the shadows gathered deep,
Was soothed at the thought of taking
The gift of child-like sleep;
For what were burdens carried,
And what was the foe's sword,
To one who had fought and conquered
In a fearless day of the Lord?

FOUR "THE FRIEND."

Before the patent granted to Lord Baltimore could be finally adjested, he died in 1632, "leaving," says Bancroft, "a name against which the breath of calumny has hardly dared whisper a reproach." He was succeeded by his son Cecil Calvert, in whose name the charter of Maryland was issued, the nominal consideration for which was one-fifth of all gold and silver ore which might be found in it, and two Indian arrows, annually.

The first colony was sent out in the fall or winter of 1633. The place selected for settlement was on the banks of a river a few miles north of the Potomac, which the colonists named St. Mary's. Here Leonard Calvert purchased of the natives a tract of land. This they were the more willing to sell, because they had suffered from the attacks of the Susquehannas, a warlike tribe to the north, who often made incursions into the territories of more southern Indians.

One William Claiborne, of Virginia, had previously established a trading post on Kent Island, and contested the right of the Calverts to exercise jurisdiction over it. This led to hostilities in which for a time the Calverts maintained their authority. But the troubles after a few years were renewed, and availing himself of a favorable opportunity, Claiborne and his party overthrew the proprietary government, and maintained themselves in power for two years.

The boundary disputes with Virginia on the south and with William Penn and his heirs on the north were not finally settled until many years had elapsed. The real difficulty appears to have been, that the grants to the different parties from the English government conflicted with each other—which is not to be wondered at, considering the imperfect geographical knowledge of the country which then existed. These disputes were sources of annoyance to all concerned, but that between Maryland and Virginia caused conflicts of authority between the two provinces which sometimes led to open fighting.

The income of the Lord Proprietors was largely derived from the sale of lands to settlers. So it was their interest to encourage immigration. One of the inducements was the free toleration of all forms of religious worship; for although the Calverts were Catholic (and so were many of the original settlers), yet they were sufficiently wise as statesmen, to welcome respectable settlers of any persuasion.

In Virginia the Church of England was made "the established Church," and the treatment to which dissenters were exposed caused many of them to remove within the bounds of the Maryland government. Indeed the laws of Virginia prohibited any persons settling in that province who did not conform to the English Church.

It is true, that acts were passed offensive to Friends, and that in 1692 the Church of England was made the established Church of Maryland, but these were, partly at least, the fruits of outside political influence, which for a time set aside the rights of the Proprietary, for which the Calverts could not be regarded as responsible, and which must have been as distasteful to them as they were to many of the inhabitants. Indeed the provisions of these laws were more offensive to the Roman Catholics than to any others.

The Society of Friends had at this time many members and several meetings, and in accordance with their usual practice of holding up their light to the world, they vigorously protested against enactments which would injuriously affect them, and their representatives in England appeared before the Lord Commissioners of Trade and Plantations, whose assent was requisite to give validity to the acts of the local Assembly, and there offered their objections. While they were successful in defeating a part of the proposed law which would have been specially hurtful, yet they could not prevent the passage of a law which gave to each established minister of the Church of England, forty pounds of tobacco per poll, and required the sheriff to collect this tobacco.

Violent proceedings, growing out of the boundary disputes, were not all confined to the southern borders of the province. Many of the German Palatines, who had settled west of the Susquehanna in York County, and had accepted titles from Maryland, renounced their allegiance and sought the protection of Pennsylvania.

This irritated the Maryland authorities, and the sheriff of Baltimore County, with 300 men marched to eject them from their possessions. The sheriff of Lancaster County drew out his posse for their protection, and without violence induced the Maryland party to return. But an association was soon afterwards formed, headed by Thomas Cresap, expressly for driving out the Germans, and dividing their lands among the associators; two hundred acres being promised to each. In the prosecution of their design they killed one man who resisted them; and Cresap was afterwards made prisoner and lodged in a Philadelphia jail.

These violent proceedings were stopped by an order in council from the king, and the parties awaited the slow process of obtaining a legal decision, which was rendered in 1750. In 1763, Lord Baltimore and Thomas and Richard Penn being in London engaged two surveyors, Charles Mason and Jeremiah Dixon. Having determined the point where the west line of what is now the State of Delaware touched and made a tangent with the western side of a circle drawn at a distance of twelve miles from the centre of the town of Newcastle; they measured fifteen miles from the most southern part of Philadelphia, the north wall of a house on Cedar Street (now South Street), on the meridian of the tangent point, thus determining the north-eastern corner of Maryland. Thence they ran the boundary line west 244 miles from the river till they were ordered to stop by the Indians.

At intervals of five miles, stones were placed (of oolitic limestone), having the arms of the Penn family engraved on one face, and of Lord Baltimore on the other.

The line thus surveyed and marked, is the famous Mason and Dixon's line, which subsequently obtained additional notoriety, as separating the Northern from the Southern States, the area of liberty from that of slavery.

In the colonial days tobacco took the place of currency in Maryland. It was the chief article of export, and would always command a fair price. Hence taxes and fines were levied of so many pounds of tobacco, and in the same manner subscriptions for charitable and public purposes were given in the same way. Scharf, in his history of Maryland, says: "In this ancient province [of Maryland] all the processes of government, society and domestic life, began and ended with tobacco. The Lords Proprietary took their quit-rents, their fees and donations in tobacco. Every officer of the government, from the governor down to the jury and their bailiffs, were paid in tobacco. Wages of all sorts were paid in tobacco; so were custom dues and the clergyman's salary. If you wanted to be married, you had to go to the rector of your parish and pay him so many pounds of tobacco. Your wealth was estimated in annual pounds of tobacco. In fact it was the only currency of the country, and all the large commercial transactions were conducted in inspector's bills (warehouse receipts for inspected tobacco of named quality already in store, and in the custody of the province's sworn inspectors)."

The ships from England laden with goods for the planters used to come in convoys, arriving in the early part of summer, when last year's crop was ready for shipment. The crop would be sold and the purchases for next year's supply laid in—of course the arrival of a vessel was an event of much importance. In the journal of Sluyter and Dankers is a ludicrous account of how, just as the missionaries arrived at a plantation, news came of the arrival of a ship at the mouth of the creek. Instantly the strangers were abandoned by everybody, except an old crone who could not get away and was too lame to prepare them anything to eat. The entire population had turned out to go down the river to meet and trade with the ship.

FOUR "THE FRIEND."

At the beginning of Christ's ministry upon earth He opened the book of Esaias and read concerning Himself: "The spirit of the Lord is upon me because He hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor; He hath sent me to heal the broken hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bound, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord."

The Gospel of salvation, when enforced by the life and conversation of the ministers of Christ, leads to like results as did the blessed ministrations of the Lord Jesus, of whom, according to prophecy, it was declared that "many of the Children of Israel shall turn to the Lord their God."

A spurious ministry clothed in sound words may administer to a sensational religion without reaching the heart. A ministry on which the holy anointing rests, leads to Christ and leaves believers at his blessed feet.

How different in effect is the false from the true! Jesus said, "He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad." Whatever is spurious in its tendencies lasts only for a season. Oh, that every one called of the Lord to minister of holy things might bear in mind that "the gifts and callings of God are without repentance." The Apostle Paul said to the Galatians, "Are ye so foolish; having begun in the spirit are ye now made perfect by the flesh?" The life of the ministry is periled when departing from the cross of Christ in the exercise of gifts conferred by the Holy Spirit. In waiting upon Christ, his ministry is also waited upon, and confession oft is made to Him, that "While withholding, Thou art giving

In thine own appointed way;
And while waiting, we're receiving Blessings suited to our day."

P. R. GIFFORD.

PROVIDENCE, Ninth Month, 1891.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Words.

The editor has received from a Friend a copy of an article with the above heading, taken from the Christian Cynosure, of Ninth Month 3d, and written by William F. Davis, who was confined in a Boston jail some two years, because he felt conscientiously restrained from paying a fine which had been imposed upon him for preaching on the commons in that city.

The Friend who sends the article, says: "Coming from such a man, not a member of our Society, it impressed me as a strong endorsement of our testimony to plainness of speech. Too many among us use the false and complimentary language of the world, and offer the excuse mentioned by William F. Davis, that they do not mean anything by such words, only to conform to a custom."

"By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned." Matthew xii: 37. This verse flashes the searchlight of the great white throne upon words, and furnishes the only curb strong enough to tame the human tongue, which no mere man ever yet hath tamed nor ever can tame."

"What have we, as professed Christians, to do with the false and flattering speech of men? We need not join the Quaker sect to know that thou, not you, is the simple language of truth when applied to the second person singular, nominative or vocative. The substitution of you for thou and thee, as of we and us for I and me, sprang from polite lying and worshipping men; and is grammatically as inaccurate, and logically as false, as it is obviously obnoxious to the first and second commandments.

The same objections lie against the worldly 'Mr.,' 'Master,' 'Lord,' 'Rev.,' 'Doctor,' 'Teacher,' 'Father,' 'Sir,' used as titles of eminence, for exalting a man above his fellow-men on pedestals of honor.

Many now say they use these words without meaning anything by them, except to conform to a custom. Thus multitudes of ignorant people and poor children now curse and swear without meaning anything more than to be emphatic, and conform to customs existing around them. They speak the greatest words often without being aware that they have spoken them. Mere words, idle words. He who said, 'Neither be ye called masters; for One is your Master, Christ,' (Matthew xii: 36) said also, 'That every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment.'

In the light of the judgment day no man will defend the polite flatteries of this day, which so many professed Christians now practice lest they appear odd. That judgment day light is given us to walk by in this dark world now. Let us use it."

RESTING is as important in its place as working, and he whose present duty it is to rest has no right to be at work. And here is where many a summer rest-seeker misuses his vacation time.

He taxes his strength by long walks and hard climbs and fatiguing amusements, or he wastes his vital forces by late hours and social excitements, so that when the autumn comes he is lacking in vigor for the routine labors to which he returns, and he can do only half work all winter because of his failing to get more than half rested in the summer. In work-time, it is work that is in order; in rest time, it is rest.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Lobster Moulting.—At the Aquarium, Brighton, England, the female lobster recently cast her shell. She screwed herself up together on her toes and tail, and suddenly bent her body. Snap went the shell in its centre, and the cast of the back came away in one piece. The claws were her next care, and she worked away at them for a long time. It was a proceeding of extreme delicacy, considering that all the flesh of the great claw had to be passed through the small base. During the operation one claw came off altogether, and this must have seemed to the lobster lady a serious misfortune, as it will not grow to its full size again until the second year. The tail and legs gave very little trouble, and the body, when thus undressed, proved to be of a pale blue. The shell casting over, the lobster sank on the sand, and this action seemed a signal for the attack of every creature in the tank. The defenceless victim bade fair to succumb to the fury of her enemies, when the male lobster suddenly came to the rescue. Standing over his shell-less better-half, he fought her assailants relentlessly. Day and night did he watch over her, until her shell was sufficiently hardened to protect her in fighting her own battles. When this happy moment arrived he deliberately picked up the old claw, broke it in his nippers, and ate the meat. He then dug a hole in the sand, placed in it the broken bits of shell, buried them, and piled a number of small stones above the grave.

Cat and Parrot.—But of all the cat stories I know, the best is one told by Théophile Gautier, who has written concerning cats with an understanding and a feeling unsurpassed. He kept many cats, a chief favorite among which was "Madame Théophile," a "red" cat, with a white breast, a pink nose, and blue eyes. "She slept," says he, "at the foot of my bed; she sat on the arm of my chair while I wrote; she came down into the garden and gravely walked about with me; she was present at all my meals, and frequently intercepted a choice morsel on its way from my plate to my mouth. One day, a friend who was going away for a short time brought me his parrot to be taken care of during his absence. The bird, finding itself in a strange place, climbed up to the top of its perch by the aid of its beak, and rolled its eyes (as yellow as the nails in my arm-chair) in a rather frightened manner, moving also the white membranes that formed its eyelids. 'Madame Théophile' had never seen a parrot before, and she regarded the creature with manifest surprise. While remaining as motionless as a cat-mummy from Egypt in its swathing-bands, she fixed her eyes upon the bird with a look of profound meditation, summing up all the notions of natural history that she had picked up in the yard, in the garden and on the roof. The shadow of her thought passed over her changing eyes, and one could plainly read in them the conclusion to which her scrutiny led: 'Certainly this is a green chicken.' This result attained, the next proceeding of 'Madame Théophile' was to jump off the table from which she had made her observations, and lay herself flat on the floor in a corner of the room, exactly in the attitude of a panther watching the gazelles as they come down to drink at a lake. The parrot followed the movements of the cat with feverish anxiety; it ruffled its feathers, rattled its chain, lifted one of its feet and shook the claws, and rubbed its beak against the edge of its trough. Instinct told it that the cat was an enemy, and meant mischief. The cat's eyes were now fixed upon the bird with fascinating intensity, and they said in perfectly intelligible language, which the poor parrot distinctly understood: 'This chicken should be good to eat, although it is green.' We watched the scene with great interest, ready to interfere at need. 'Madame Théophile' was creeping nearer and nearer, almost imperceptibly; her pink nose quivered, her eyes were half closed, her contractile claws moved in and out of their velvet sheaths, slight thrills of pleasure ran along her back-bone at the idea of the meal she was about to make. Such novel and exotic food excited her appetite. In an instant her back took the shape of a bent bow, and with a vigorous and elastic bound she sprang upon the perch.

"The parrot, seeing its danger, said, in a base voice, as grave and deep as Mr. Prudhomme's own: 'Have you breakfasted, Jack?'"

"This utterance so terrified the cat that she sprang backwards. The blare of a trumpet, the crash and smash of a pile of plates flung to the ground, a pistol shot fired off at her ear, could not have frightened her more thoroughly. All her ornithological ideas were overthrown.

"And on what?" continued the parrot. 'On sirloin?'"

"Then might we, the spectators, read in the face of 'Madame Théophile': 'This is not a bird; it is a gentleman; it talks!'"

"The cat cast a glance at me which was full of questioning; but, as my response was not satisfactory, she promptly hid herself under the bed, and from that refuge she could not be induced to stir during the whole of the day."—Strand Magazine.

Instincts of Cattle.—The following incident will show how violently blood passion sometimes affects cattle, when they are permitted to exist in a half-wild condition, as on the pampas. I was out with my gun one day, a few miles from home, when I came across a patch on the ground where the grass was pressed or trodden down and stained with blood. I concluded that some thievish gauchos had slaughtered a fat cow there on the previous night, and, to avoid detection, had somehow managed to carry the whole of it away on their horses.

As I walked on, a herd of cattle, numbering about three hundred, appeared moving slowly on towards a small stream a mile away; they were travelling in a thin long line, and would pass the blood-stained spot at a distance of seven to eight hundred yards, but the wind from it would blow across their track. When the tainted wind struck the leaders of the herd they instantly stood still, raising their heads, then they broke out into loud, excited bellowings; and finally, turning, they started off at a fast trot, following up the scent in a straight line, until they arrived at the place where one of their kind had met its death. The contagion spread, and before long all the cattle were congregated on the fatal spot, and began moving around in a dense mass, bellowing continually.

It may be remarked here that the animal has a peculiar language on occasions like this; it emits a succession of short bellowing cries, like excited exclamations, followed by a very loud cry, alternately sinking into a hoarse murmur, and rising to a kind of scream that grates harshly on the sense. Of the ordinary "coo music" I am a great admirer, and take as much pleasure in it as in the cries and melody of birds and the sound of the wind in trees; but this performance of cattle excited by the smell of blood is most distressing to bear.

The animals that had forced their way into the centre of the mass to the spot where the blood was, pawed the earth, and dug it up with their horns, and trampled each other down in their frantic excitement. It was terrible to see and hear them. The action of those on the border of the living mass in perpetually moving round in a circle with dolorous howlings, was like that of the women in an Indian village when a warrior dies, and all night they shriek and howl with simulated grief, going round and round the dead man's hut in an endless procession.

On the pampas I was once standing with one gaucho at the gate of a corral into which a herd of half-wild cattle had just been driven. One of the men, to show his agility, got off his horse and boldly placed himself in the centre of the open gate. His action attracted the attention of one of the nearest cows, and, lowering her horns, she began watching him in a threatening manner. He then suddenly displayed the scarlet lining of his poncho, and instantly she charged him furiously. With a quick movement to one side he escaped her horns, and then, when he had driven her back, resumed his former position and challenged her again in the same way.

The experiment was repeated not less than half a dozen times, and always with the same result. The cattle were all in a savage temper, and would have instantly charged him on his placing himself before them on foot without the display of scarlet cloth, but their fear of the mounted man, standing with lassoes in their hands on either side of him, kept them in check. But whenever the attention of any one individual among them was forcibly drawn to him by the display of vivid color, ad fixed on him alone, the presence of the overseen was forgotten and fear was swallowed by rage.

It is a fact, I think, that most animals that exhibit angry excitement when a scarlet rag is exhibited aggressively at them, are easily excited to anger at all times. Domestic geese and turkeys may be mentioned among birds; they do not fly at a grown person, but they will often fly at a child that challenges them in this way; and it is a fact that they do not at any time fear a child very much, and will sometimes attack one without being challenged.—W. H. Hudson in Longman's Magazine.

ELEVATION OF STATION is very often accompanied with depression of spirits. Success disappoints us; we feel ourselves out of our sphere, and sigh for the lost happiness of our humbler days. "You see how languid the carp are," said Madame de Maintenon to her friend, when looking into a marble fishpond at Marly; "they are ke me: they regret their mud."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Western Yearly Meeting.

[The following account of Western Yearly Meeting (Conservative) was received from a member of that body.]

Western Yearly Meeting was opened at Sugar Grove, near Plainfield, Hendricks County, Ind., a Sixth-day, the 11th of Ninth Month, by a meeting for worship, at 10 o'clock, which was a vored meeting, in which much good counsel as handed forth tending (we trust) to the comforting of many minds. At the close of said meeting, the Meeting for Discipline opened, with representatives from the Quarterly Meetings all present. Friends present from other Yearly Meetings, with credentials, were Daniel T. Dye and Alice Hawley, ministers from Iowa Yearly Meeting, and Joseph Hawley, an elder and companion to his wife, Alice Hawley.—Several dear Friends from other Yearly Meetings, without credentials from home, were present.

At this session we received and read epistles from all the Yearly Meetings with which we correspond, except one; and a committee was appointed to prepare essays for each, if way opens for it.

Seventh-day morning meeting opened at 10 o'clock. Benjamin P. Brown, a minister of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, was present, with a certificate from his friends at home, accompanied by Samuel Walton, of Ohio Yearly Meeting. Our Book and Tract Committee made their annual report, which was satisfactory—and the committee was continued to have care of the work the ensuing year. The raising of an educational fund was brought before the meeting, through the Meeting for Sufferings, and considered in joint session, and approved; and five trustees were appointed to receive and hold such donations or bequests as may be placed in their hands—the proceeds thereof to be used for educational purposes.

First-day, two large meetings were held, one in the forenoon, and one in the afternoon; both of which were held after the order of Friends; in which the ancient doctrines of life and salvation, as ever held by the Society of Friends, were held up and promulgated, to the satisfaction and comfort of many minds.

On Second-day, the state of Society was brought to view, by the reading of the Queries and answers to them from the Quarterly Meetings; which showed that there were some deficiencies existing amongst us, which was cause of sorrow; and much good counsel was handed forth by concerned Friends on account thereof.

Third-day was occupied with reports of the various committees. The Peace and Temperance Committee made their annual report; and the committee was released, and the subject referred to the Committee on Books and Tracts.

Fourth-day meeting convened at 9 o'clock. The minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings, for the past year, were read; and the action of that body approved;—the answers to the Queries from the Select body, with a short minute of advice, was read; and epistles were produced and read, from each of the Yearly Meetings with which we correspond; and after the business was all through, the meeting closed with a meeting for worship; which was a solemn opportunity; and Friends could say, as with the voice of one man, that it was good for me that I have been here.

The Army Canteen.—The Independent of Ninth Month 10th, contains an article by T. W. Blackburn, of Omaha, on the Canteen, which is a store conducted by the officers of a military post and designed to take the place of the former sutler, who supplied the soldiers with luxuries, etc., not included in the government rations. These consist mainly in liquors and cigars. The writer says he knows a small frontier fort, with a garrison of eighty men, which in eight months has consumed 25,000 bottles of beer. The article states:

The fact is the canteen is an open saloon, sometimes no worse than the respectable "leggery" elsewhere, and generally no better. It is a convenience to profligate soldiers and officers, who might be sober between pay-days except for the credit which this institution affords. It is a standing invitation to the younger men to participate in its festivities. It is officially recognized, and purchases over its bar are encouraged in the interest of good discipline and the canteen treasury. It is in the very midst of the houses of officers and men, and about their only resort for indoor amusement. It is a standing menace to the good morals of the army.

The canteen is the official army saloon; it is a national declaration in approval of the liquor traffic, an admission of its necessity. It is a declaration that drunkenness and debauchery are unavoidable among disciplined men; it is an open door with an officer standing before it to encourage his men to partake freely of intoxicants; it is a direct insult to a large and growing public sentiment which, recognizing the awful evils of drink, pleads for total abstinence and the abolition of the saloon.

Unhealthy Excitement.—The Christian Advocate (Methodist), of New York, says: "One of our ministers in the State of New York, exhorting sinners to repent at a camp-meeting, grew very impassioned, the people sympathized with him, and his warnings and appeals raised the excitement to a great height. Suddenly his voice changed from well modulated tones to unnatural and discordant shouts, and his language became incoherent and gestures wildly frantic." He resisted removal with maniacal strength, and continued to shout out incoherent snatches of prayer and exhortation. He was carried away amid a great outburst of sobs and groans from the sympathizing spectators." Such scenes as this have occurred before. When the sapper is called upon to religion, but a list of the political speakers, of lawyers at the bar, judges on the bench, and actors on the stage, who have in the excitement attending their respective professions become delirious or maniacal, would show that it is not religion, but excess of excitement. The young man will in all probability recover his reason, and learn how to take care of himself. St. Paul expressly forbids the loss of self-possession, declaring that "the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets." Wesley taught his members never to lose their heads. Working one's self up into uncontrollable excitement is supposed by some to be a means of obtaining "the power." It is not power, but weakness.

Sermon Distribution in Berlin.—In 1881, a company of Christians met in Berlin to consider what could be done to relieve the spiritual destitution of that city, which had but fifty places of worship for a population of 400,000 and a quarter. It was decided to begin distributing printed sermons on the streets. They began with 600 copies. These were well received and the work has grown, until in 1888, the weekly distribution amounted to 121,800 copies, and this has since increased.

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 26, 1891.

The editor has received a letter from our aged and esteemed Friend, Joseph Morris, of Cardington, Ohio, encouraging him in his labors in connection with THE FRIEND. A part of it appears to be designed for wider circulation, and expresses the lively concern felt by the writer for the prosperity of our beloved Society, in a faithful maintenance of its original principles and practices. The following extracts from it follow:

Let humility and self-denial dwell with us in all our deliberations for the welfare of Zion and honor of the Truth. There is much to be done to re-establish the Society upon its primitive foundation, which is an arduous and unenviable task. It is to be hoped that we may not be led off by compromise. What was good in the days of our worthy forefathers in the truth is not bad in these days. Let us not fall short of the best objects attainable in our struggle for the maintenance of those principles that so eminently built up and sustained the Society of Friends two hundred years or more, and are yet the same, as pure and needful as ever, both in civil and religious associations, and will never grow old and useless whilst the world stands.

How sad is the thought that there are those among us, and some seemingly good ones, to disclaim and set at naught those principles and usages which so highly characterized the Society, and the individual members belonging thereto. I have thought, if I should become a dissident, I would like the Society that I belong to, and I should enjoy myself better with any other branch of the Christian Church. I would ask for admission into their society, and so beautify and enhance the object of my interest; and not remain with those whose doctrines and usages did not suit me, and in which I had but little interest, except the name (Friend). Some speak of George Fox and other prominent individuals of his day with great admiration, and at the same time reprobate many of their doctrines and usages, and neglect and practice the ordinance of water baptism, hire and establish pastors as spiritual helpers, very much to the casting down and discouragement of those less popular ministers, who at times feel constrained in the love of the Gospel to speak well of the Lord's dealing with themselves, and for the encouragement of others also. It appears like striking at the very life of the free exercise of the Gospel, and especially so in the self-arranged system in the Society of Friends, congregational singing in their meetings, reading the Scriptures, &c. Silent waiting for Divine guidance is but little practiced, and regarded as lost time, and in their devotional exercises they are said to be more noisy than some other denominations of Christians. Such as these shall call themselves by some other name, but I pass themselves as "Quakers." Friends, there are many tried ones among them, for whom we feel most tenderly in the love of Christ.

Our friend Huldah H. Bonwill, who has long exerted herself to relieve the wants of those in distant places who are poorly supplied with clothing and other necessities of life, again requests that Friends and others, who may have partly worn garments which they are willing to contribute, or shawls, quilts, bed-clothing, &c., will kindly send them to her care for forwarding. The goods will be received, as for two or three years past, at the store of Laing & Magnus, No. 36 North Third St., Philadelphia.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President has signed the proclamation opening to settlement and homestead entry the newly ceded lands of the Sac and Fox and Pottawamie Indians, in the eastern part of Oklahoma Territory. These lands were entered upon on the 22nd inst., large numbers of persons taking part in the race for home sites.

In accordance with instructions from the Indian Bureau the agents at Union Agency, Indian Territory, have packed up the tools and other articles owned by the United States Marshal to be libelled. Four Indian traders found selling beer have had their licenses revoked. Judge Shackelford, of the United States Court for the Indian Territory, has held that beer is a spirituous liquor within the meaning of the Intercourse law, and its sale is prohibited in the Indian Territory.

Our Government has reached an understanding with the Governments of Great Britain, France and Germany, by the terms of which, in the event of the failure of the Chinese Government to afford adequate guarantees for the residence of the lives, property and interests of citizens of the four nations, that duty is to be undertaken by the Governments of the United States, Great Britain, Germany and France, acting jointly.

Advices received by the Secretary of State of Michigan for the week that the State will exceed 25,000,000 bushels, instead of less than 27,000,000 bushels as estimated two weeks ago.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 889, which was 24 more than the previous week, and 67 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing 219 were males and 170 females. Fifty died of consumption; 30 of cholera infantum; 28 of heart disease; 23 of pyæmia; 24 of marasmus; 19 of diphtheria; 17 of typhoid fever; 17 of inflammation of stomach and bowels; 13 of inflammation of the lungs; 12 of inflammation of the brain; 12 of convulsions and 10 of paralysis.

FOREIGN.—The landing of British soldiers at Sigi on the island of Mitylene, spoken of in last week's Summary, appears not to have been for the purpose of conquest, although it created quite a sensation throughout Europe, showing in what a high state of tension is the feeling in these tax-burdened, groaning countries, and how necessary a measure it was, in the thought necessary to increase the munitions of war.

Exactly what happened at Sigi appears still to be doubtful. The earlier stories of a boat drill and a picnic are now both discredited. The correspondent of the New York Recorder gives the following information: "The British Government, in Constantinople despatch says that an officer sent expressly by the Sultan has returned from Mitylene, and he brings the report that there is no sign of British occupation. The inhabitants say, however, that a British force landed on the island and remained there two days, holding intercourse with the natives. The only other facts do not indicate that there was a picnic or a drill party, as stated, but that the British landed there for the purpose of examining the surroundings with the view of possible operations in the future. Another despatch states that the British squadron in the Levant, Admiral Lord Kerr commanding, has left the island. The only other fact is that a British ship was occupied in extensive submarine mining operations of Sigi last week, and engaged in several night attacks with torpedoes.

A heavy rain fell on the 11th and 12th insts., swelling the mountain torrents that poured into the Amarant, the city being destroyed by four stone bridges, and twenty mills, besides an enormous number of houses. Wreckage and corpses were carried 40 miles. The Mayor of Consuegra puts the fatality there at 3000. In some places limbs have been found separated from bodies. The officials have telegraphed for lime to prevent an outbreak of disease.

A hurricane on the 20th inst. has added to the damage done by the recent floods to the unfortunate town of Consuegra. Many of the houses previously undermined or otherwise weakened by the floods collapsed beneath the force of the wind.

A further feeling of gloom has been caused throughout Spain by the announcement that a severe epidemic of influenza has broken out at Badajoz, capital of the province of that name. There are already over 2000 severe cases of that disease in the city mentioned, and it is feared that the epidemic will spread over Spain.

An imperial decree is published modifying the passport regulations. It provides that after September passports for entering Alsace-Lorraine will be required only from military men on active service, ex-officers and pupils of foreign military schools, and men who have been in military service during the present military service. A "viza" will be permitted in these cases and will be granted gratis. Finally, it is ordered Ex-President Balmaceda, of Chili, has committed suicide.

That foreigners staying in the Reichsland beyond 2 hours must notify the police of their presence under penalty of expulsion.

The Russian Minister to Persia has been instructed to arrange a trade treaty between Russia and Persia.

The object is to bring about the exclusion of Persian-marked English goods, 1,000,000 roubles' worth of cotton textures so marked having crossed the Persian frontier in 1890.

Official reports show that the harvests have utterly failed in 13 Russian provinces, and that the harvest partially failed in eight other provinces of the Russian Empire.

The distress in the Volga provinces is intense. Poorly-dressed women and children wander about almost utterly exhausted, shrieking for food in the market places. The Governor of Saratov, especially remark that children are the worst factor in such a crisis as this. All existing charities and Red Cross Societies are doing their best.

Russian corn merchants on the frontier are despondent over the idea that the German trade will find fresh channels and never return to Russia.

Letters received here from Juddah, dated Eighth Month 24th, state that the death rate from cholera among the pilgrims to Mecca was unprecedented in the history of the city. The number of pilgrims who died at that time estimated that 11,000 pilgrims had died during the season. At the date the letters referred to were sent all signs of the epidemic had disappeared.

The French Government has instructed the French Minister at Santiago to recognize the Provisions Government of Chile.

The Italian Government has recognized the Junta as the established Government in Chili.

1837.—“In our Quarterly Meeting, the importance of having our dependence individually placed on the Lord Jesus Christ, and not on one another, was enforced. Many were concluding that but little was doing by the Society; and one reason is, that we may be looking man, instead of waiting on the Lord, to show Him to be in the midst, apportioning to very one his several duty and work in the Church. He is represented in the Scriptures as a jealous God; jealous of his honor and glory; which He will not give to another, nor his praise to graven images. It is, therefore, no marvel that gifts are not dispensed as they have been, while we are looking up to man and honoring him, instead of the Lord of life and glory. Were we all gathered to the place of true waiting, incense, kindled by fire from heaven, upon the altar of the heart, would ascend, and He would condescend to smell a pleasant savor in our assemblies. Gifts, we might hope, would be bestowed, and babes in Christ be engaged to spend forth his praise; and thus an army would be raised to display the banner of the Prince of Peace. It was thought to be a solid, comfortable meeting.”

Of Concord Quarterly Meeting he writes:—“Towards the period for entering on the business, it appeared right to hold forth the injunction of the Apostle, ‘Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus; who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God, but yet made himself of no reputation, and took upon Him the form of a servant, &c. Submission to his humbling over, and a willingness to become of no reputation amongst men, that we might be prepared for his use, and experience preservation, were tenderly enforced. Those who were enduring these refining processes, were encouraged to old fast the faith and patience of the saints; and in due time they would witness Him to return to them, with healing in his wings, and receive renewed ability to engage in his work. He wounds to heal, and kills but to make alive gain. The dear young people were affectionately and earnestly invited to take the yoke of Christ upon them; and, forsaking those things which prevented their entrance into the path which He casts up, which the vulture’s eye hath not seen, nor the lion’s whelp trodden in; to come and join themselves to those, who, above all things, were desirous of loving and serving Him. My beloved wife closed the meeting, with fervent prayer for the various states which had been spoken to. In the second meeting, David Cope was earnestly engaged to stir up the young men to a faithful, diligent discharge of the duty of public worship, and the attendance of all our religious meetings.”

“In conversation, last evening, with my beloved father, he said, that in the course of his experience, he had remarked, that those Friends who had manifested a disposition to palliate the offences of those who had broken the discipline, generally lost ground in a religious sense; and those whom they were disposed to screen, rarely came to anything in the Church; and when such fell away, they were more severe against the unfaithful ones, than against those, who, in the uprightness of their hearts, could not compromise the cause of Truth, but stood steadfast in its support, against wrong things. He was not in favor of a rigid administration of the discipline; but he believed that where it was kept to, in a disposition to restore, and when that failed to produce the effect, to keep to the judgment of Truth; it would always be found in the end, best for the meeting and for the offender.”

1838.—At “Westtown School we had a very tendering time in the meeting, in the forenoon. The danger of losing our first love, and relying upon what we have known in time past, without experiencing the renewed baptism of the Holy Spirit, was held up to view. In this condition we may be deceived respecting ourselves, and suppose that we are in a better state than we really are. Watchfulness upon prayer, and the disposition to desire those proving dispensations, wherein we experience a being baptized into the likeness of Christ’s death and suffering, were recommended; that thus we might, from season to season, be raised up into newness of life; and be qualified from experience, to testify to the Truth; and not merely because we have read or heard of it, through others. Sarah Emilen knelt, returning thanks for the present favor, and praying that messengers might be sent forth to roll the stone from the well’s mouth, as it had been done that day; that so the flocks might be watered; that the word preached might sink deep into the hearts of some present, who were ashamed to confess their Lord before men; and that their eyes might be anointed to see, and to discriminate between the chaff and the wheat; the alloy and the precious gold and silver. It was a season of renewing our strength and confidence in the mercy and goodness of the unslumbering Shepherd of Israel; for which we desired, in reverence and humility, to return thanks to his great and worthy name.”

“My wife and myself attended Frankford

Monthly Meeting, held at Germantown. It was a day of Divine favor; the blessed Head of the Church qualifying us both, to preach the Gospel to the weary and tried amongst them, and to the younger members: inviting them, under the influence of heavenly love, to obey the discoveries of the light of Christ, and taking his yoke upon their necks, to follow Him whithersoever He leads.

“From the state of many meetings, there is reason to fear a declension from the life and power of religion amongst us is taking place. Death is removing the older members, and comparatively few of the younger, appear to be coming forth in dedication to the work of the Lord. Unless the Head of the Church turns his hand upon sons and daughters, and raises up a band of faithful laborers, clothing them with zeal as with a garment, for his cause and honor’s sake, there is reason to fear, that in some places, the Society may become a desolation. Such a picture is truly mournful; but what can we expect, when so little fruit has been produced, after so many gifts and favors have been conferred upon us.

“The ministry of the Gospel is a mystery to those who are unacquainted with the teachings and movings of the Spirit of Christ in the heart. I have many times been instructed by the gradual unfolding of matter, designed to be communicated in a religious assembly. If we are not preserved in patience, it is possible to miss the particular point which is designed to be held up to view, or to give a wrong construction to the portion of Scripture brought before the mind. He who has the work in his own hand, and sees the wants of the people, can alone prepare the creature for his service, and that which He intends for them to do. There is at the present time much unsettlement among many of the members of our Society. They are attracted by wordy, doctrinal discourses, which fill the head, and leave the heart little benefited. An aversion is produced to a spiritual, practical ministry, which lays open the negligence and unfaithfulness of the professors, and insists on the indispensable necessity of self-denial, and a steadfast following of Christ in the way of the cross. Many appear to want a religion without a cross; and to be ranked among the followers of Christ, without yielding to the baptisms and humiliations which He introduces the obedient soul into. But this desire is vain; and all that such may hear will avail nothing, unless they are brought to Christ; and in the submissiveness of little children, take his yoke upon them, and follow the leadings and discoveries of his Divine and saving light in the secret of the heart.”

1839.—“My dear and honored father had been in a declining state of health for several months, and on Fourth-day, the 30th of Second Month, had a severe chill. Though he came down stairs on the following morning, he found himself too much prostrated in strength to remain, and accordingly returned to his bed; which he left but little until removed by death.

It being proposed to call in a consulting physician, he declined, saying, that at his time of life it was not probable he could continue here long, and he was entirely satisfied with what his son, the attending physician, might do for him. He daily grew weaker, until he departed, on Sixth-day morning, the 8th, a little after eight o'clock. He was nursed by his children, who watched him with much solicitude. One morning, when asked how he was, he replied, "very quiet—very quiet, but very weak." I remarked, it was a trial to have those removed, at this time, who have long stood for the defence of the Truth. He rejoined, "I have felt a great deal on that account, a great deal. I am satisfied there is a spirit at work which would lay waste the ancient profession and doctrines of our Society, and draw Friends away from the spirituality of that which they have once known; and many are caught with it."

"During the first three days of his confinement, his mind appeared to be under exercise, and though, as was usual with him, he said little of his own exercises, I believe he was introduced into a very humbling view of himself, and made deeply sensible of the frailties which pertain to man; and that it is only through Divine mercy, after we have done the will of God, that we are accepted at last. He became settled in a holy confidence; being gathered and centered to the sure foundation, Christ Jesus, the hope of the saints' glory. He endured with patience the infirmities produced by advanced age and disease; alluded with much serenity to his approaching close; and the peacefulness and heavenly settlement which were felt, gave evidence that his eye was firmly fixed on the eternal recompense, laid up in store for those who follow the Lamb of God, whithersoever He leadeth. He retained the use of his faculties to the last, and expired without any struggle, or the change of a feature. To his children it was a solemn and affecting event; and to the Society, in which he has long stood as a faithful watchman, his removal will be felt as leaving a blank that cannot soon be filled. He was favored with a clear, sound and discerning mind; and soon detecting the specious appearances of the enemy, he raised his voice with unwavering firmness against them; and though he often incurred the censure of the superficial professor, and of those who sought the honor of men, yet he kept his ground, and very generally proved that his judgment was correct. He was faithful in waiting for the arising of the power of Truth in our religious assemblies, both for worship and discipline. It was his delight and life to feel it, both in himself and in the service of others; and when he was sensible of it, it was his authority for his own movements, and satisfied him respecting others, however simple and unlearned they might be. The internment took place on Second-day morning, the 11th, and the solemnity which prevailed in the house and over the company, there and at the ground, was very remarkable; it was in character with his love of silence and his deep inward waiting, rather than the expression of many words.

TWO VICTORIES.

A hero came from battle, where the slain Lay piled in bloody heaps upon the plain; And all the people sang the hero's praise, And crowned him with the victor's honored bays.

A simple child had fought hard against a sin, And won a mighty victory within; No one rehearsed his praise, or sang his fame, But heaven's recording angel wrote his name.

William Caton.

Early in 1659, he attended a meeting of ministers from various parts of the kingdom, held at the Bull and Mouth Meeting-house in London, which he describes as being "very large and exceedingly precious." In the latter part of the day a meeting was held at Horselydown, where a great concourse seemed much impressed with the truths they heard. William Caton writes: "Great was our rejoicing and comfort which we had in the work and service of the Lord, in which we were abundantly refreshed together. And in that great assembly did our souls, even with one accord, praise and magnify the God of our salvation."

A visit to Holland in the same year, with its perilous return voyage, was soon followed by one to Scotland. He set out on the latter expedition from Swarthmoor, and after his friends and himself had, as they thought, fully taken leave of each other, they felt that they could not yet part, and several hours were spent in waiting on the Lord, and in pouring out their souls in prayer. Whilst in Scotland he endeavored to obtain an interview with General Monk, but, being unable to do so, he wrote an address to him and his army.

The following winter, a meeting which he attended, at Warrington, was broken up by some rough soldiers, who violently forced the worshippers out of the town; but they re-assembled on the road-side, and had, we find, "a sweet and precious meeting." Before long the soldiers again interrupted them, and whilst William Caton was preaching, seized him and, to the great distress of his friends, beat him with their muskets and spears; then, having given vent to their fury, they allowed him to return to the meeting, where, he says, "The Lord's power and presence did exceedingly appear amongst us; for, as our suffering at that time was greater than ordinary, even so was our refreshment in the Lord." About this time he records the death of his "dear mother," whilst he was paying her a visit.

When in London, in 1660, he alludes in a letter to full and peaceable meetings; and, after stating that the common topic of conversation was the expected coming of the king, he adds, "But blessed be the Lord forever, in whose power we can testify that our King is come, who reigns in power and great glory." Nor can we wonder at these words from one who drew the strength and joy of his life from the knowledge that his citizenship was in heaven; who could unite with the sentiment of that good man who said, "When I die I shall change my place, but not my company!" Redeemed by the precious blood of Christ, to Him William Caton freely dedicated his life, and the Lord, who loveth a cheerful giver, suffered not his faith to fail—to whatever extent it might be tried. "I have often observed," he says, "that, by how much the more I felt the weight of the service of the meeting before I went into it, by so much the more was my service in it, and my reward accordingly. Blessed and magnified be the name of the Lord for ever!"

Before sailing for Holland, in the latter part of the year, he writes from Dover to George Fox. After mentioning the death of a Friend,

"* Have you a glimpse of Christ, now that you are dying?" was the question asked of an old Scottish saint, who, raising himself, made the emphatic reply, "Pl have none of your glimpses now that I am dying, since that I have had a full look at Christ these forty years gone!"

of Staplehurst—probably a minister—who, he thought, would be greatly missed in that neighborhood, he adds, "I believe there will now be more necessity for Friends visiting them pretty often than there was before; I desire that thou wouldst be mindful of them. * * * Dear! beloved of my soul," he writes, "let thy prayer be for me, that I may be kept in the power, life and wisdom of our God, to his praise and to thy comfort and consolation of the brethren, with whom I can rest in the Lord, even in the heat of the day; glory be to the Lord forever." And, during the voyage, we find that he was "exceedingly filled with the Lord's love, and with the power of his might." One of his fellow-passengers, a Roman Catholic, notwithstanding William Caton's habitually courteous manners, openly avowed his hatred of him and his religion; but before they parted there was a complete change in his behavior. Well did George Fox say, "Love, patience, and wisdom will wear out all which is not of God."

In a letter of sympathy written from Amsterdam, to English Friends, William Caton remarks that he believes those amongst them who were not yet cast into prison, were in greater danger from persecution than were their brethren resident in the city, where it was said that fifty men had conspired to break up their meeting, and pull down the meeting-house. I was about this time that he published a volume with the lengthy title, "An Abridgement or Compendious Commemoration of the Remarkable Chronologies which are contained in that celebrated Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius," &c.

In 1661, William Caton visited Germany with William Apes; at Heidelberg they had interviews with the prince, and laid before him the sufferings of the Friends in his dominions on account of their conscientious objection to the payment of tithes: he gave them a courteous reception, and tithes were then due with him. When next at Heidelberg, William Caton had the unexpected pleasure of meeting with his friend John Stubbs, who, with another Friend, was on the homeward route from Egypt. When the prince heard they were at William Caton's lodgings, he sent his secretary to ask them to come to the Castle to see him; where, in the presence of his nobles, he conversed very freely with them about their mission, &c.; and, after what William Caton calls "a very gallant opportunity," he took an affectionate leave of them.

The enjoyment of William Caton in the city of his brethren, was soon shadowed by tidings from Amsterdam of the death of a beloved friend of his, Niesie Dirix, a faithful laborer for her Lord, in her native land; his sorrow was excessive, until he was comforted by the conviction that her mantle would fall on his sister Anneken and some others. On his return to Holland, some months later, he made proposals of marriage to Anneken Dirix. Warm and enthusiastic as his disposition was, he took extreme care to act rightly in this matter. He wished her first to consider whether she "felt something in it as from the Lord," and asked for no reply until she had deliberately weighed three things:—First, the difference in their outward circumstances and how little he had to offer her; secondly, the liberty—more to him than the treasures of Egypt—which he should still need, to travel in the service of the Lord; and, thirdly, the possibility that their union might be disapproved of by magistrates, by her relatives or others, and might thus bring trouble upon her. Her reply was to the following effect:—As to the first, it was not means that he looked to, but virtue. As to the second, when the Lord needed him for any service, she should not be the woman that would hinder him. As to the last, if they "were perfectly clear of the thing before the Lord, she hoped to bear what people without should say, for that would be one of the least crosses!" Still they did not think it right for a time to bind themselves by promise. William Caton thus describes his own feelings during an interview which they had after several months had elapsed: "Waiting awhile exceeding steadfastly in the sight of the Lord, the life began to arise, and the Word of the Lord testified unto me thus, saying, 'She is the gift of the Lord to thee.' Then was my heart also broken, and in the fullness of love and unity in the everlasting covenant, did I receive her as the Lord's gift unto me."

About three months after his marriage, he embarked for England. Whilst in London he received much spiritual refreshment from a visit to Edward Burrough (of whom there is a sketch in this series), then a prisoner in Newgate, where he died a week or two later. Their separation was not a long one: each was early called to the ministry; each accomplished the labor of a long lifetime in ten or a dozen years. Like their Divine Master, "clad with zeal as a cloak," though faithful they wrought righteousness, obtained promises, * * * out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to fight the armies of the aliens." On his next visit to England—for his home was now in Holland—William Caton was accompanied by his wife, who greatly longed to become acquainted with the Friends there, of whom she had no doubt often heard; and with a similar desire, one other Dutch member of the Society sailed with them.

The London Friends rejoiced, William Caton says, "to see people of another nation, and of a strange language, brought into the same living Truth in which they were established, and to bear the same injury which they bore—and to be comprehended in the same Love." At a General Meeting at Kingston, he acted as interpreter for one of his Dutch sisters. His wife and the other Friends from Holland had returned some time before his mission was accomplished; but in the autumn of 1663, he also set sail. When about ten leagues off Yarmouth, William Caton, who felt sure that a storm was at hand, unavailingly urged the captain to put back. That night a tempest overtook them, and its height the helm became useless, and, as the vessel was also very leaky, she was in extreme peril; the sailors, wet to the skin and utterly wearied by toiling at the pumps and with her sails, were almost ready to despair. William Caton, who had been aiding them in their arduous work, now wrestled in prayer for their deliverance, if in accordance with God's will:—"though, as for my part," he says, whilst with deep gratitude recording their remarkable preservation, "I found myself exceeding freely given up to bequeath my soul into his bosom of everlasting love, and my body to be buried in that rest deep."

But soon storms of a different character had to be encountered. Whilst waiting at Yarmouth or a change in the wind, he attended the meeting there, and, in company with seven other Friends, also strangers, was carried before the magistrates of the town. Because they declined to take the oath of allegiance, they were committed to the common jail, where they were confined for more than six months; when it was ordered to William Caton, he said that he had never uttered an oath but once, in his boyhood, and having then incurred the displeasure of the Almighty, he dared not swear again. So fully had the magistrates anticipated this steadfast adherence of the Friends to their conscientious convictions, that they made out their mittimus before putting them to the test.

In a letter, written a few days later, William Caton alludes to the cruelty of their oppressors, which sometimes made it no easy matter to obtain their bread and water; but says that the only wonder was that he had not earlier found himself in bonds, "unto which," he adds, "I have long been freely given up in the will of God, where my soul is in peace with the Lord." And again, he writes of how, "one day, in prison, with the Lord, was better than a thousand elsewhere, without the enjoyment of his presence, in whose love his soul solaced itself night and day." Some friends of the prisoners, thinking to beguile the long hours of their confinement, wished to give them a spinning-wheel, but were not allowed to do so.

In was in the early part of 1664, that the Friends were liberated, after meeting with kind consideration from the judge who presided over the sessions, and from a justice of the peace. Five of William Caton's fellow-sufferers belonged to a vessel which had come to Yarmouth for herrings, and as, during this period, she was seized by the Turks, their English captivity was the means of saving them from Asiatic slavery.

In the following winter, William Caton wrote an epistle from Rotterdam, to his friends in England. After referring to his powerlessness to express the fervency of his love, and of his prayerful longings for them, he adds, "Yet herein I can satisfy myself, in that we come to read and feel one another in that which is immortal." He says that, although his heart is often saddened by the many hindrances to the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom in Holland, he is supported by the "wonted goodness and tender mercy of the Most High, still perfectly continued to him." William Caton died in the latter part of the following year, at the age of nine-and-twenty. His wife did not long survive him.

It has been remarked, that "No truth or goodness realized by man ever dies, or can die;" and surely such a life, though lived two centuries ago, has not ceased to convey a lesson. As we look around us, we find no warrant for believing, that the world no longer needs to be reminded of that cross to which every helpless soul may cling, and of such truths as Christ's Headship of his Church, the spirituality of the Gospel dispensation, and the reality of the teaching and guidance of the Holy Spirit.

The fields are white unto harvest still; still the Lord of the harvest has need of laborers; of laborers who, with the knowledge that they are bought with a price, and that "voluntary obedience is liberty," completely yield themselves to Him to be trained for, and directed in, any service which He sees meet to assign to them, be it of what kind it may, for "all service is not work, and all work is not service; endeavoring to consecrate to Him, as occasion may arise, every talent, whether natural or acquired,

"Ever by a mighty hope, Pressing on and bearing up."

"Do not," it has been said, "let Satan have all the benefit of ambition in his kingdom."—Excellior is no unworthy device for the banner of Christian warriors, who are learning that they are nothing—Christ is all.* "Behold, the Lord's hand is not shortened that it cannot save; neither his ear heavy that it cannot hear." He can "restore judges as at the first, and counsellors as at the beginning," and may no believer on our part hinder the performance of "mighty works" on his.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Falls of French Creek.

On the 11th of Ninth Month, the writer accompanied a friend on a visit to this romantic spot, interesting from the wildness of the scenery and from the stone quarries and mines of iron found in its vicinity.

Our starting point was West Chester, in Chester County, Pa. We left about 7 A.M., on the hack which carries the mail to a station of the railroad running from Wilmington to Reading. This railroad during much of its course follows up the Brandywine. It crosses the great valley at Coatesville, running at that point under the Pennsylvania Railroad. It is an interesting fact that both the East and West branches of the Brandywine, where they cross the valley have cut for themselves deep ravines through the rocky ridges which border the valley on both sides, and thus make their way in a south-easterly direction to the Delaware River, without being tempted to follow the apparently easier course along the valley already excavated to the Schuylkill; a phenomenon which can be accounted for by supposing that at the time when this course was taken by the stream, the floor of the valley must have been more elevated than the hills adjoining it.

The confinement to a railroad car gives but little opportunity to the traveller to examine the various geological formations which he traverses; so we could see but little of the limestone that underlies the valley at Coatesville, or of the white sandstone (belonging to the Potsdam formation) which is the rock of the North Valley Hill.

The west branch of the Brandywine drains the country on the southerly side of the Welsh Mountain. Our road followed its windings for many miles, gradually ascending till it approached the Welsh Mountain, when it left the creek and took a direction more to the right and bending around the eastern end of that range, again bore more to the north. We left the train at Springfield, just opposite the east end of the mountain, and one of the most elevated points on the line, being 645 feet above tide-water. It is on the divide between the valleys of the Delaware and Susquehanna, for in its vicinity are the head-waters of the French Creek, which flows easterly into the Schuylkill and through it into the Delaware; and of the Conestoga, which flows westwardly into the Susquehanna River. The Welsh Mountain rock is a species of quartz, popularly but erroneously called flint, or sandstone, and like the North Valley Hill is classed by geologists as a Potsdam sandstone.

There is a railroad connection between Springfield and the Falls of French Creek, but the time of the running of the trains was so unsatisfactory, that we engaged a man to drive us

* "So long," writes the author of The Patience of Hope, "as we are resting on anything within ourselves, —be it even in a work of grace—there remains, at least to honest hearts, a ground for continual restlessness and continual disappointment. To know that we have nothing, are nothing, out of Christ, is to know the truth which makes us free."

over about six miles. He proved to be an agreeable and intelligent man, who not only conveyed us to and from our destination, but gave us much interesting information. The road commanded many beautiful and extended views, including several ranges of hills. The soil on these is not very fertile, and they were formerly principally owned by the different iron furnaces, which obtained from them a supply of charcoal. Tracts of thousands of acres were held for this purpose. As the wood was cut off, the land was allowed to grow up again with timber. A properly equipped furnace in the olden time was one that had enough woodland attached to it to furnish a permanent supply of charcoal for fuel. The development of coal mining and of railroad construction, has made a great change in the iron industry of this section of country. During the day we passed the locations of several furnaces which have been allowed to go to decay, and the industry transferred to points on a railroad, where team hauling could be dispensed with and coal procured by rail. Owing to the early discovery of iron ore and the abundance of wood, the manufacture of iron has long been an important industry in parts of Chester County. It dates back to 1716.

While we were waiting for our horse and driver, we visited a large pile of boulders, called in the neighborhood "Blue Rocks," near the village of Springfield. They covered about five acres of ground, and appeared from the structure of the grain to be a trap, identical with the so-called granite of the falls of French Creek. The road we travelled went directly over or through the old Warwick iron mine, which had been worked for more than 120 years and had yielded an immense supply of ore. The ore does not seem to be a regular vein, but lies in a bed or deposit varying in thickness from seventeen feet downward, and comparatively near the surface. Several acres of ground had been dug over, and the debris furrowed by the rains presented a desolate appearance, such as may be supposed to characterize the Bad Lands of Nebraska. But little work is going on here at the time. Two or three persons were gathering up portions that had been left by former workers. They described the ore as a magnetic oxide of iron. The Geological Survey says it is intermediate between magnetic oxide and the true hematite.

This bed of ore lies on the southern edge of the red sandstone formation, where it borders on the gneiss rock of that section of country. It is supposed to have been derived from the decomposition of a former rock of slate containing iron.

The red sandstone, which occupies the northern and northeastern parts of Chester County, is evidently of more recent age than the gneiss of Potsdam sandstone, and limestone formations, which lie to the south of it; for it has been spread over them in the state of mud or sand. The area now covered by it was at one time an estuary or arm of the sea, either laid below the general level when the older strata had been elevated and folded into the mountains of the Appalachian and Alleghany ranges; or subsequently depressed in one of those changes of surface which have so often occurred on the earth. In the lapse of ages, many thousands of feet of gravel, sand and mud, derived from the decomposition of the neighboring gneiss country filled up these depressions from the Philadelphia gneiss hills across to the Reading hills.

On our ride across country, after passing the Warwick iron mine, we came on a region of trap, large stones of which were built up into roadside walls. It was readily distinguished by the brown color of the weathered portions of the rock, and by the even sides and regularly angular outline of the blocks. The internal color, before being traped by exposure to the air, is a dark green. Trap is an igneous rock poured up in a state of fusion into cracks which go down to great depths to some profounder reservoirs of lava now extinct, but probably similar to that which at the present time underlies the western part of the United States, feeding active volcanoes and geysers, and producing earthquakes and fractures of the crust of the earth. Dykes of trap are very frequent in the red sandstone country—why, is perhaps not very satisfactorily explained.

The Falls of French Creek are a series of rapids, where the water makes its descent to a lower level through a narrow valley or ravine filled with enormous blocks of stone, left bare by the washing away of the earth and tumbled down from the steep hills adjoining. It is a romantic spot. On both hillsides men are busily employed in quarrying the stone—called granite—although really trap, much of which is broken up into Belgian blocks for street paving.

In the immediate neighborhood is a valuable vein of magnetic iron ore, occupying a fissure or crack in the gneiss(?) rock of the region—which we were told varied from thirty-five to seventy feet in width, although this measurement may have been taken horizontally across, which would give an over estimate of the vein, because the fissure inclines many degrees from a perpendicular. Like all the mineral veins, the fissure, however formed, has been filled up with metallic and mineral matter by infiltration or in some other way. The mineral accompanying the iron ore is principally carbonate of lime crystallized in beautiful rhombs; many of them quite translucent and almost as perfect as specimens of Iceland spar. Some of the pieces of Calcite (the crystallized carbonate of lime) are studded with the brilliant crystals of sulphuret of iron—iron pyrites. The presence of a small portion of copper is also indicated in many of the specimens by the bright colors which it gives.

The demand for these minerals as cabinet specimens, has led the miners to lay aside the most beautiful ones, which they sell for a small sum to visitors; but I know of no veins where the dump heap furnishes such an abundant supply of valuable and attractive specimens to the mineralogist.

This vein has been followed down to the depth of about 400 feet, and it is in contemplation now to sink a shaft sixty feet deeper so as to obtain an additional supply of ore. How deep the fissure extends, and when the iron will cease to be found in paying quantities, are questions as yet undetermined.

We returned to our homes heavily laden with minerals, and feeling that we had added considerably to our stores of information. J. W.

CONCERT.—Taking ourselves at our own valuation—generally about fifty per cent. above the fair worth. Empty minds are the most apt to soar above their proper sphere, like paper kites which are kept aloft by their own lightness; while those that are better stored are prone to humility, like heavily-laden vessels, of which we see the less, the more richly and deeply they are freighted. The corn bends itself downward when its ears are filled, but when the heads of the conceited are filled with self-adulation, they only lift them up the higher.

GOD KNOWETH BEST.

Some time, when all life's lessons have been learned,
And sun and stars for evermore have set,
The things which our weak judgments here have spurned—

The things o'er which we grieved with lashes wet
Will flash before us out of life's dark night,
As stars shine most in deeper tints of blue;
And we shall see how all God's plans were right,
And how what seemed reproof was love most true.

And we shall we see how, while we frown and sigh,
God's plans go on as best for you and me;
How, when we called, He heeded not our cry,
Because his wisdom to the end could see.

And even as prudent parents disallow
Too much of sweet to crumble into bread,
So God, perhaps, is keeping from us now
Life's sweetest things because it seemeth good.

And if, sometimes, commingled with life's wine,
We find the wormwood, and rebel and shrink,
Be sure we want not of our wine or bread,
Pours out this potion for our lips to drink.

And if some friend we love is lying low,
Where human kisses cannot reach his face,
O, do not blame his loving Father so,
But wear your sorrow with obedient grace!

And you shall shortly know that lengthened breath
Is not the sweetest gift God sends his friends,
And that sometimes the sabbal puff of death
Conceals the fairest boon his love can send.

If we could push ajar the gates of life,
And stand within, and all God's workings see,
We could interpret all this doubt and strife,
And for each mystery could find a key.

But not to-day. Then be content, poor heart!
God's plans, like lilies, pure and white unfold;
We must not tear the close-shut leaves apart;
Time will reveal the calyxes of gold.

And if, through patient toil, we reach the land
Where we tread free, with sandals loose, may rest,
Then we shall clearly know and understand,
I think, that we will say, "God knew the best!"

FOR "THE FRIEND."

North Carolina Yearly Meeting

Convened at the appointed time this year, at High Point. The attendance was good, with a larger number than usual of men and women Friends, with minutes from Yearly Meetings on this Continent. Epistles were received from most of the Meetings with which we correspond. It was up-hill work preparing replies; conveying information as to what had been doing amongst us during the past year is not all; and the ability rightly to distinguish what the Spirit saith unto the Churches, and then faithfully to impart it, is a high attainment.

The answers to the Queries disclosed a very low state of things in the attendance of meetings for worship and discipline; and, in the statistical report, I think one-third to one-fourth of the members were returned as in the practice of coming to meeting.

The report from Guilford College was very interesting; $9,000 is still lacking to complete the endowment fund of $50,000.

The experiment of building cottages for the use of poor girls to avail of the teaching at the college, has been successful, and about 30 girls enjoyed these advantages during the past year. With commendable liberality, $600 was raised in the face of the meeting, to be applied to this use during the ensuing year.

About the time appointed for commencing meetings for Discipline, we sometimes heard singing from the gallery. I think at such a time, all ought to be gathered into stillness before the Lord, craving his Divine help to conduct the business to the honor of Truth. Now, as to the devotional meetings held during the Yearly Meeting, there was frequent singing by many, and it was encouraged by Friends from other Yearly Meetings; and as there are hymn-books for the First-day school, these Friends were told to bring their hymn-books; and one Friend, who told us he had gone to Moody's meetings, to learn his methods, told us that he did not object if unsanctified persons joined in the singing: as if acceptable worship, in Spirit and in Truth, could be performed in any such a way. This would lead us back to the objectionable practice in some churches, of employing those who had good voices and musical ability, but who were irreligious, to lead in their choirs.

We heard much in favor of the support and pay of ministers and pastors; but this was only to be expected, if it was true that some of the prominent speakers were pastors, who received pay (though it may be little), as one told us that John H. Douglas could have had $5,000 per annum from another body. This man told us that he had offered $10.00 to any one who would find in the Bible a text to support stillness before the Lord, or to prove silent waiting. Had time and opportunity offered, some of us might have replied, but we dare not accept the money or recognize any such way. It is very objectionable to want to obtain another's money without giving honest value or labor in exchange. "Thy money perish with thee," was an apostle's reply to one formerly. This Friend also told us, that we should be always ready to pray, preach, &c., on assembling for Divine worship; insisted on the body resurrection; condemned the doctrine of inner Light, and put the Bible above the Spirit;—repeated many stories of how he had acted towards elders during his career; and when his wife was not willing that he should leave her without fuel, &c., and snow one foot on the ground, he forced himself away! Oh! how different from the meekness and gentleness of Christ! He occupied much time in the Meeting for Ministry and Oversight, telling us about his being accused of various crimes, including horse-stealing. A mournful exhibit for a select body.

In the meetings for devotion, held in the evenings, there was little of stillness; with the Bible in hand, conspicuous in all our meetings, texts were read and explanations given; then the pastor would propound some question, and ask all to whom it applied, to rise;—supplementing with other questions;—and when sufficiently worked up, they would be asked to come forward and kneel, or kneel where they were, and we would hear frequent ejaculations from him, and he would go down amongst the people and kneel, and still continue from time to time to respond. Some of these meetings held late. I heard that one continued until near midnight, after several prominent Friends had knelt and joined in. It is with pain I try to pen a truthful record of the proceedings; but I cannot convey the pointed way in which some of the practices of our forefathers were berated; and although considerable was said about purity of life and conversation, and encouragement given to confess Christ; yet to take it all in all, as it was, the unbiased hearer could hardly fail to perceive that the true principles of Christianity as professed by the Society of Friends, were not brought out and enforced by the members of the Society in North Carolina, as a body. Some sterling protests were heard from time to time during its sittings, against wrong things. Much more might be said; but I forbear.

A. FISHER.

NORTH CAROLINA, Sixth Month 9th, 1891.

The Eastern Shore of Chesapeake Bay.

In those primitive days much of the tobacco was conveyed to tide-water to meet the vessels by rolling the hogsheads, often a distance of fifteen or twenty miles. There are still many roads in Maryland which bear the title of rolling roads. The hogsheads were rigged with a tongue and axle.

At one of the meetings which we attended (Ceel, in Kent County), a part of the house was built of bricks imported from England. Such cases are not uncommon along the southern Atlantic coast. The store goods sent out by the English merchants occupied much less space in the hold of a vessel than the bulky tobacco which formed the return cargo; hence the bricks probably acted as ballast, and were brought out free of charge, or nearly so.

Land was abundant and easily procured; and as a man's wealth was estimated by the amount of tobacco he raised, there naturally sprung up a demand for laborers. This was in part supplied by convicts from Great Britain, who were sentenced to servitude in the colonies, as a substitute for being hung at home, a punishment which the sanguinary laws of that period prescribed for very numerous offences. These convicts were generally transported by private contracts under contract with the government, and sold to planters in the colonies. It is estimated that before the Revolution of 1776, at least 20,000 such convicts were imported into Maryland.

Another numerous class of immigrants were the "redemptioners," persons who desired to emigrate, but not having the necessary means to defray their expenses, bound themselves by contract to serve a certain number of years to pay for their passage. Their condition of servitude was generally mild, and at the expiration of its term, the law required the master to give the redemptioner fifty acres of land, corn to serve him for a year, three suits of apparel, and the needful tools.

By an official statement it appears, that from Midsummer, 1698, to Christmas, 1707, 2,290 Negro slaves were imported into the province, and the census of 1712 gives the whole number of Negroes then in Maryland as 8,330.

Tobacco was more productive and of finer quality on newly cleared lands, than on those which had been longer in cultivation; hence arose the practice of planting the same land fifteen or more years in succession, and when its fertility was exhausted, of turning it out to grow up with pine, sassafras and other woods; and clearing a new tract for cultivation. Much of the pine woods in Maryland to-day is on ground impoverished by tobacco culture.

Cattle and hogs roamed in the woods and found food for themselves, and even horses ran wild and became so numerous as to become a serious nuisance by their incursions into cultivated lands.

Chesapeake Bay was, to the early colonists of Maryland, much more than the railroad is to the present settler in the western wilderness. "Its inlets and estuaries were so numerous and so accommodating that nearly every planter had navigable salt water within a rifle's shot of his front door." The "backwoods" was the unsettled country removed from navigable water.

Also, who was a redemptioner, and spent several years on a plantation near the Patuxent, says that they had no meat but venison nine months in the year, but that was so abundant that at one time, for a family of seven persons, his master had hanging up the carcasses of four-score deer.

Squirrels were so abundant as to be quite destructive in the corn fields, so that not only was a bounty offered for their scalps, but in 1728 a law was passed fining every taxpayer who neglected to produce each year three squirrel scalps or crows' heads.

In 1772 John and Andrew Elliott, Quakers, whose father, Andrew, emigrated from Devonshire, England, in 1730 and settled in Bucks County, Pennsylvania, having examined on horseback the country between the Patasco and the Blue Ridge, and found it well adapted for the growing of wheat, bought a mill site on the Patasco, and persuaded Charles Carroll of Carrollton, the great lord of the manor thereabout, owning thousands of acres, to grow wheat instead of tobacco, promising that they would erect mills of sufficient capacity to take all of his crop and that of his tenants. Thus, at a stroke, as it were, immense tracts of the choicest land were taken from tobacco culture and devoted to wheat.

During our wanderings through the peninsula we found wheat everywhere, but did not see one patch of tobacco.

The Church of England was made the established Church of Maryland in 1692. But the "establishment" was never popular with the people, who resented the injustice of compelling those of other religious persuasions to support the Episcopal ministers. The character of many of these too was bad, so that there was a more rapid spread of Methodists, Quakers, Presbyterians, etc., than of the Episcopalians.

The first record of a visit to Maryland by Friends was about the close of the year 1657, when Josiah Cole and Thomas Thurston, who had been preaching the Gospel among the Indians in the interior, came into the province. They appear to have labored there for several months, until banished by the authorities. Josiah Cole was an eminent minister, whose declarations, William Penn says, "were like an axe, a hammer or a sword, sharp and piercing, being mostly attended with an eminent appearance of the dreadful power of the Lord." It is no matter of surprise that the zealous labors of these servants of the Lord were followed by many being convinced of the truth of the doctrines they proclaimed. It must be borne in mind also, that at that time the people generally lived in much isolation on their plantations, and that few of them had any opportunity of attending the religious services of any denomination of Christians—so that they were as scattered sheep, waiting to be gathered.

Within a year or two after their first visit to Maryland, Josiah Cole and Thomas Thurston returned thither and continued for a time their labors. Other Friends also came on a similar errand, and there was "considerable conviction." George Rofe, who as a minister visited the American colonies, wrote to George Fox in 1661, that "many settled meetings there are in Maryland and Virginia and New England." He paid a second visit to the province in 1663 and was drowned during a storm in Chesapeake Bay.

When George Fox himself visited Maryland in 1672, he found quite a body of Friends there. He was then making his way northward from the West Indies. John Burnyeat had appointed a general meeting for all Friends in the province, and "it was so ordered by the good providence of God," says George Fox, "that we landed just time enough to reach that meeting. A very large meeting this was, and held four days; to which, besides Friends, came many other people, divers of whom were of considerable quality in the world's account. After the public meetings were over, the men's and women's meetings [for discipline] began; wherein I opened to Friends the service thereof to their great satisfaction."

After finishing the service that then lay upon his mind, George Fox travelled through the wilderness to the English settlements in East Jersey; and labored in his Master's cause on Long Island and in New England. He returned in safety to Maryland, after encountering many hardships and dangers. At Tredehaven Creek (near Easton) he attended a general meeting for all Maryland Friends. The meeting held five days. The first three days were for public worship, and drew together many people of divers sorts, amongst whom were persons of chief account in the country. It was thought there were sometimes a thousand persons at one of these meetings. "It was," he says, "a very heavenly meeting, wherein the presence of the Lord was gloriously manifested, Friends were sweetly refreshed, the people generally satisfied and many convinced; for the blessed power of the Lord was over all."

James Bowden, in his history of the Society of Friends in America, says, that through the preaching of George Fox "large numbers were added to the Society." The same Divine power seems to have attended his ministry in this country as had been so remarkably manifested in England, where at times almost whole congregations would be convinced and turned to the Light of Christ in their hearts. Bowden adds: "His presence among his fellow-professors in this land was hailed as a blessing of no ordinary kind, and the churches were greatly strengthened by his labors. But it was not from those of his own Society only that George Fox received a welcome in America. Everywhere, governors, magistrates and the authorities, both civil and military, received him with cordiality, paid him marked attention. When we reflect upon the position which George Fox occupied, we need not wonder that this should have been so. The Society of Friends, of which it was understood that he was the founder, though of less than thirty years' standing, and notwithstanding the violent persecution it encountered, had now become both at home and abroad a numerous and increasing body, and included in its ranks men both of wealth and station. Another circumstance which caused the settlers in America to frequent the meetings of George Fox, was the rarity of ministers of any sort amongst them; for, excepting in New England, there were at that period but few ecclesiastics in the land. None had yet settled in Carolina, and in Virginia they were so few that a bounty was offered to allure them; and, scattered as the settlers were along the banks of the rivers and creeks, it was a rare thing for them to hear a sermon of any kind. When, therefore, it was known that George Fox, 'the head of the Quakers in England,' had come amongst them, and was going to have a general meeting, the lonely settlers of both the Eastern and Western shore of Maryland flocked from far and near to hear him."

Some Remarks on a Publication Entitled "Quaker Strongholds."

The above work, which it is believed has met with a large circulation (and deservedly so), relates chiefly to the doctrine and practice of the Society of Friends, and the object of the following remarks is to show how the writer's observations are regarded by a member of that body, occupying a stand-point somewhat different to the ordinary, who for many years has been a deeply interested observer of the causes that have been at work within the Society, silently but surely undermining its original foundation, remoulding its internal economy, and resulting in its now so greatly altered exterior. Having at first felt no particular desire to read the book, thinking it might be on a level with the essays on the state of the Society, with suggestions for its reformation, &c., which some Quarterly Meetings are encouraging their members to write, it was an agreeable surprise on perusing it to find that—so far from advocating the "modern" or modified views held by the so-called evangelical or Gurney party—the authoress holds to the Society's ancient and fundamental principle, and not only to the principle, but mainly to the various testimonies arising therefrom, and that contrary to those who control the body at the present day, she owns the "undeniable vigor and ability of Robert Barclay in his famous Apology."

On the questions of the Last Supper, Baptism, the Ministry of Women, Oaths, War, Superfluities, &c., she sets forth in clear and unmistakable language her views, which are largely in accord with the original principles of Friends. It is gratifying to have such a witness-bearer; but she guards herself against the supposition that the Society, as a body, accepts and acts up to its principles, and declares that many of the peculiarities of Friends are, to a great extent, abandoned by the present generation. Would that it were the peculiarities only that are rejected! She avers, and that truly, that our "recent history is one of change and reaction;" but as she declares that she has "been occupied throughout with our ideal, not with the degree of our fulfilment, or failure to fulfil it," so we do not find any details of this failure, or any account of the causes which have been at work to produce it. There is, however, no such thing to be found in her book as unlimited confidence in "a judicious adapting of Quakerism to modern tastes, that will revive its power." On the contrary, its revival must be the result "of a fresh recognition and acceptance of the very principles upon which the Society of Friends is built."

Allusion is made to the influence of Joseph John Gurney and his sister, Elizabeth Fry, and the new wave of religious and benevolent activity which arose; and to the influence of Elias Hicks in America some years previously, but in the opposite direction as regards doctrines. Both produced great dissensions in the Society, and led to divisions and sub-divisions; and it bespeaks a degree of candor and fearlessness on the part of the authoress, that she should even allude to these subjects, for it is notorious that Friends of the present and recent times shrink from any investigation which would reveal the character of either of these two schisms and their effect in laying waste the goodly structure of the Society of Friends. The change which has taken place in the Society within the last half century certainly has not sprung from nothing; it is the result of error sown broadcast, which, falling upon ground prepared, has spread and brought forth abundantly, and nowhere have its fruits been more conspicuous than in the "strongholds" themselves. The whole subject has a literature of its own, which would amply repay perusal, and should be studied by all who desire to comprehend the true history of the decadence of the Society of Friends.

Among the many subjects referred to in "Quaker Strongholds," it would be a surprise if all were equally acceptable. There are portions on prayer which appear of a questionable character. Attempts are made to reconcile what is not to be reconciled. The prevailing ideas on the subject of prayer, both in and outside of the Society are very erroneous; the authoress has pointed out some instances of this, and concludes that prayer which is owned by the Father is not that which is offered in our own will and time. Isaac Penington says that "Prayer and supplication must be in the Spirit; yea, it must be always in the Spirit, which speaks in the heart to God, and makes the intercession, or it is no prayer." There occurs in the volume the application of the term "Gospels" to the books of Matthew, Mark, &c., in the New Testament, which is not reconcilable with our views of the nature of the Gospel of Christ, and such names as "May," "Sunday," &c., are also to be met with, yet there is the admission that the minor testimonies of Friends, as they are sometimes called, are from a deep root of principle, and there are also some pregnant remarks on testimonies not borne through conviction, but more from imitation, or, having been early instilled into certain practices which are of the nature of testimonies.

Mystics or mysticism is another matter, the consideration of which might very well have been omitted in a statement of the strongholds of Quakerism. Why it should have been intruded as having any connection with the principles of Friends is not easy to understand. We are told that the Society is the natural home of "mysticism," that "some are born Mystics," and that the authoress believes it "is essentially the same gift which in a different form, or in combination with a different temperament and gifts of another order, makes poets," but what connection has such a gift with the operations of the true Light (Christ Jesus) which lighteth every man that cometh into the world,—the full belief in the efficacy and universality of which is admittedly the foundation doctrine of true "Quakerism?" To endeavor to connect individual faithfulness to this Divine Teacher and Guide, in man but not of man, with any merely natural gift or inherited mental or constitutional bias, is to try to blend things of radically different natures. Viewed in this light, to associate Mysticism with the operations of the Inward Light, seems almost akin to profanity. And because the practice of silent waiting and introversion of mind, preparatory to approaching the Most High in the solemn act of worship, has been commended by the pious in all ages, and that certain amongst the Roman Catholic community who have exercised themselves herein, have been denominated Mystics, it does not follow that George Fox, his coadjutors, and their successors, were themselves Mystics, for, as Barclay says [See his Apology, Prop. XI, Sec. 16], they do not "make of it a mystery, only to be attained by a few men or women in a cloister."

In that portion of the work under the heading of "Our Calling," we read "the Christianity meaning that outside the Society] which has spread and flourished is still deeply saturated with reliance upon outward rites and outward ordinances, and deeply entangled with rigid formularies. It is largely composed of creeds and doctrines, which, whether theoretically true or false, are yet capable of being held in unrighteousness, and incapable, therefore, of truly redeeming the souls who trust in them." All this is very true; as also are the sentences which convey the idea that there is something in modern Christianity which the masculine mind rejects. It is stated in another place that what people want is, first, a "higher, purer, and worthier form of faith and worship than they have been accustomed to find provided for them; and, secondly, they want stronger proof of the reality of the objects of faith than is commonly offered." How true all this is! And yet the remedy is close at hand. The Truth, even that which the Apostle declares is "Christ in you, the hope of glory," is the restorative provided by a beneficent Creator for the redemption of his creature man.

There is no small evidence that the authoress has been favored with a sense and sight of things, that she has been enabled to grasp the condition of multitudes outside the Society, and, moreover, the true remedy for their wants. It was no part of her task, as we are told, to point out the shortcomings of those who profess to be the followers of the early Friends, or to search into the causes thereof, but it might be well were her facile pen to be devoted to the investigation of the question, "How happens it that a Society with such a grand inheritance of noble principles and occupying such a vantage-ground as compared with other professing Christian bodies, should be so stunted in its growth, and, except on lines hostile to its true principles, in a fair way to utter extinction?" If an opinion be offered, it is, as a noted Friend once remarked, that the leaders have turned the ship's head about while professing to sail in the track of ancient Quakerism. It is not unlikely that the authoress by this time knows, if she did not know before, that her views are not acceptable to some within the pale of the Society. From her preface to the third edition of her book we gather that the absence from its pages of certain undamental doctrines of Christianity is regretted. It was not, as she truly says, needful for her to give a full exposition of our Christian faith as Friends. I expect, however, it was what she inserted in her book, not what she left out, that was objectionable. And why objectionable? Because "Quaker Strongholds" unfolded a clear and ample testimony to the 'universality of the saving light of Christ.' I am glad that she has had the courage to elaborate this necessary, though to some, unwelcome truth, and also the possibility of being, even in this life, made free from sin, according to the doctrine of Perfection;* and, further, that "the heathen, who had not the outward knowledge of Christ, were saved by his power, light, and grace without such outward knowledge, if they were but faithful to the light they had." Such presentations of truth are seldom heard in our meeting-houses; and the changed aspect of the Society—the letting fall of its estimations—the altered position of the Scriptures—the mission movements—all indicate that the leading and fundamental principle, offered for and advocated by the early Friends, and set forth so fully in "Quaker Strongholds," can hardly be said to be upheld collectively by the modern professors of the Society of Friends. Would that it were otherwise!

FLEETWOOD, Eighth Month, 1891.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 3, 1891.

In another part of our paper, we publish a more detailed account of North Carolina Yearly Meeting than has yet appeared in our columns,—prepared by our friend, Abram Fisher. It confirms the reports that had before reached us as to the unsatisfactory character of some of the teachings of strangers in attendance.

In reflecting on the rejection by these of the fundamental doctrine of the Light of Christ, it has seemed to us very much like a revival of the charges of unsoundness made on a similar ground, against our early Friends. Even well-disposed men, like Bunyan and Baxter, looking at Friends and their doctrines through the mist of prejudice, fancied they saw in this doctrine a denial of Christ and his offices in his outward appearance in the prepared body in which He moved, taught, and suffered in Judea, of old.

John Bunyan published a book in which he charges Friends with "undervaluing the Lord Jesus Christ, God-man," &c. Edward Burrough, in reply, characterizes this charge as a slander, and says: "We prize the Lord Jesus Christ, God-man, to be precious unto us, and unto all that do believe and have owned Him alone to be the foundation, whom God hath laid for salvation unto the ends of the earth, and in his Light are we saved, and therein do walk;—and because thereof, are we hated by the generation of hirelings and false prophets, who speak much of Christ without you, but know Him not in you, the hope of glory."

E. Burrough further declares, that "to follow the Light of Christ Jesus, wherewith He hath 'lightened every man that cometh into the world,' it will lead into the kingdom of peace and righteousness; for, saith Christ, 'I am the Light of the world; he that followeth me, shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life.'"

Again—"Without the revelation of Christ within, there is no salvation."

"The same Christ which was born of Mary, which wrought righteousness in his person, by doing and suffering; which was and is the substance; was afterwards revealed in the saints."

Thus it will be seen that Edward Burrough unhesitatingly accepted and maintained that doctrine which the poor misguided man in North Carolina so rashly and roughly repudiated. E. B.'s sentiments were the same as those of other Friends of that day. George Fox, in speaking of his mission, says: "I was sent to turn people from darkness to the Light, that they might receive Christ Jesus; for to us as many as should receive Him, in his Light, I saw He would give power to become the sons of God, &c.; and I saw Christ died for all men, was a propitiation for all, and had enlightened all men and women with his Divine and saving light; and that none could be true believers but those who believed therein."

William Penn speaks of "the Light of Christ within, as God's gift for man's salvation," as the "fundamental principle which is the cornerstone of their fabric" of the Quakers.—"This, I say, is as the root of the goodly tree of doctrines, that grew and branched out from it."

It would be easy to multiply such quotations, for truly the convicting power of the Spirit of Christ, which awakens man to a sense of his sinfulness, and leads him to repent of and forsake sin, lies at the root of all practical religion, and has been experienced by all those who have walked in the path of salvation. "This is 'the grace of God, which bringeth salvation;' and "it hath appeared unto all men."

In the midst of the religious controversies which agitated England at the time of the appearance of our Society, it is not surprising that this and other doctrines proclaimed by Friends should have been misunderstood by some of their adversaries; but it is a surprising thing that a denial of this cardinal doctrine of Christianity should have been publicly made by one who professed to be a minister in our Society, in the present year. Can it be, that any under our name, have so far wandered from a belief in our principles, that they are prepared to rank themselves among the "generation of hirelings and false prophets," of whom Edward Burrough says, they "speak much of Christ without you, but know Him not, in you, the hope of glory."

We do not wish to dwell too long upon this occurrence, which has already been twice referred to in our columns; but it seemed proper, for the sake of the inexperienced, to show that such sentiments as those advocated by A. Kenworthy, are totally at variance with the established doctrines of Friends—which we believe are in strict accord with the testimony of Scripture. Since the publication of the former editorials, we have received from a respectable Friend of North Carolina, a letter dated Ninth Mo. 18th, which says: "I am sorry to say that the 'sermon' delivered in the meeting-house on First-day morning, was not only most unlike anything I had ever heard in a Friends' Meeting, but was, I thought, unscriptural and unsound." Yet we infer from the printed minutes, that returning minutes of "acceptable attendance" were given to all alike! Either such minutes are a mere matter of form and have no meaning, or else they in measure commit the body that issues them to an endorsement of the doctrines proclaimed in their midst, however "unscriptural and unsound" these may be.

Since our last number went to press, we have received an additional account of the Western Yearly Meeting (Conservative), written by a friend in attendance, who is not a member of that meeting. It confirms the statements contained in the published account, so that it will be sufficient simply to quote some of its general comments:—

"The several sittings of the Yearly Meeting were solid meetings, in which the Divine presence was felt; and the business conducted in much harmony."

"The Friends of this Yearly Meeting became convinced, that if the doctrines and testimonies of Friends were to be maintained hereaway, they must come out of the mixture; and are now satisfied it would have been better if they had done it much sooner. So many of the young people had become so influenced by hearing the ministers advocating and using the plural language, and also discarding the plain dress, that when the separation came, many of the children did not follow their parents."

CORRECTION.—In the notice in last week's FRIEND, of H. H. Bonwill's request for second-hand clothing, &c., &c., the place of deposit for the goods was said to be at Laing & Maginnis' store, No. 36 North Third Street, Phila. The store is No. 30, not 36.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Upon his return to Harrisburg, on the 22d ult., State Treasurer Boyer found the resignation of Cashier Livesey awaiting him. Domestic circumstances are given as the cause. It is believed that Livesey is in Canada.

CHIEF JUSTICE PATTON on the 26th ult. issued a proclamation calling an extra session of the State Senate to meet on 10th Mo. 13th, for the trial of charges made against Auditor General McCann and State Treasurer Boyer in connection with the Bardsley defalcation. The governor has also written to Senator Smith, Chairman of the Joint Legislative Committee appointed to investigate the offices of Auditor General and State Treasurer, asking him to permit the Attorney General to take part in the investigation.

J. D. McMillan, ex-County Treasurer, has been on trial at Conant, Texas, charged with embezzling $3,000. On Saturday Judge Hightower directed a jury to acquit him, charging that the legal definition of money is legal tender coin, and that bonds or coupons are not money. Judge Hightower, who is recognized as one of the State's brightest jurists, holds that no official can be indicted for embezzlement under the laws of the State.

After a conference in New York between the Creditors' Committee and the Directors of the Union Pacific Company, it was announced that, at the request of the Directors, Drexel, Morgan & Co. will offer to the public $5,000,000 collateral extension notes at 92½. These are the issue authorized for the purpose of extending the floating debt of the company, and bear interest at the rate of six per cent. annum. The Creditors' Committee assert that the success of the plan is assured.

The American Waltham Watch Company has announced a reduction of 15 to 20 per cent. in the wages of 900 of its employees.

The appraisers in the case of the steamer Itata, at Los Angeles, have reported to Judge Ross that the value of the vessel is $60,000 and that of the arms the same amount. The vessel was ordered released on the 10th of the inst. and will be appraised.

The first instalment of nickel-steel plate made in this country for actual use has been delivered at Camp's ship yard. It is three-inch protective deck plate for one of the triple-screw cruisers.

The value of merchandise exported from the United States during the twelve months ended Eighth Month 1891, was $909,264,438. The figures in 1890 were $856,490,061. The value of the imports in 1891 was $839,063,241, and for 1890, $791,615,497.

The fire which swept over the Sioux reservation in North Dakota proved to have burned everything in its path, and left the stacks and range from the Canon Bell River to Moreau River. The reservation is a blackened waste.

An earthquake occurred at different points in the West shortly before 11 o'clock on the night of the 29th ult. The shocks were felt as far south as Memphis, Tennessee, and as far north as Keokuk, Iowa.

The vibrations were felt in St. Louis, Springfield, Terre Haute, Mt. Vernon and other places. In some instances buildings were violently rocked, furniture was displaced and people left their homes in fright.

Two persons were killed and thirty severely wounded by the explosion of a mortar, which the Italians were firing a salute in celebration of the St. Rocco, at Newark, New Jersey, on the evening of the 24th ult.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 369, which is 20 less than during the previous week, and 34 more than during the corresponding period of the year. Of the foregoing, 26 died of cholera infantum; 35 of consumption; 25 of marasmus; 15 of heart disease; 16 of inflammation of lungs; 15 of infantile; 14 of typhoid fever; 14 of old age; 13 of casualties; 13 of convul sion; 12 of infanticide; 11 of cancer; 12 of cancer and 12 of diphtheria.

Markets.—U. S. 4's, reg., 110½; coupon, 117½; 2's, 99½; currency 6's, 110 to 120.

COTTON was quiet but firm on a basis of 9c per pound for middling uplands.

WHEAT in bulk, $1.17; $1.18; spring hard, in bulk, $1.16 to $1.17.

FLOUR.—Western and Pennsylvania super, $3.60 a $3.75; do, do, extra, $3.90 to $4.25; $2.50 special family, $4.25 to $4.60; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $4.05 to $4.50; Western winter, clear, $4.60 to $4.75; do, do, straight, $4.75 to $5.00; winter patent, new, $5.00 to $5.25; Minnesota, clear, $4.75 to $5.00; do, straight, $5.00 to $5.25; do, patent, $5.25 to $5.50; do, special brands, higher. Rye flour moved slowly, at 75 to 85 cents.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, $1.04.
No. 2 mixed corn, 60 to 61 cts.
No. 2 white oats, 34½ to 35 cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Good, 5 cts; medium, 4½ to 4 cts; fair, 4½ to 4 cts; common, 3½ to 4 cts; culls, 3 to 3½ cts. PORK.—Clover, 23 cts; 7 cts; hams, 10 cts.

SHEEP.—Extra, 4½ to 5 cts; good, 4½ to 4 cts; medium, 3½ to 4 cts; common, 3 to 3½ cts; culls, 2 to 2½ cts; lambs, 3½ to 6 cts.

HOGS.—Good Western, 7½ to 8 cts.; other Western, 7 to 7½ cts.; State hogs, 7 to 7½ cts.

CORRECTION.—Gleaner has in a letter to the Times and League, saying in substance that the defeat of the measure introduced by the Government and practically endorsing publicans was in its first effect negative, but that it really created a movement, "which has already grown powerful, and which will be the nucleus of a grand system, of protest, and, if this is a discredit and a calamity to the country, and you can depend on the Liberal leaders using their most earnest endeavors to alter it."

The Times announces that the French Government has consented that the Credit Foncier shall issue a new 4 per cent. mortgage loan. The Credit Foncier has called a meeting of the syndicate and announced the issue, at the end of 10th Mo., of three per cent. stock without conversion. The Credit Foncier, according to the Times, reserves the right to negotiate the price.

Upon the occasion of the jubilee of the Seventy-eighth Infantry Regiment at Osanburg, Hanover, the author of the present article, in a long and spirited paper upon the political situation in Europe. He said that the apprehension in some quarters as to whether the existing state of things would be maintained were not warranted. Not one of the sovereigns, he added, wished to disturb the peace or provoke a European war.

The Standard's Vienna correspondent records a discussion which was carried on at the table of the Archduke Albert during the Austrian military manoeuvres as to whether it was wise to allow a known enemy to complete preparations for war, or whether it would be better to force a contest at once. "But all understood that Russia was meant. Emperor William said emphatically: 'I strongly believe that the enormous responsibility which modern warfare imposes must override all military theories. I would not begin war if I consens that by delaying it I could secure a single year, say a single month, of peace which the chances are equal on both sides, there is much to be gained by having several months of peace.'"

A dispatch states, eighty grain vessels are lying at Hamburg waiting for an opportunity to discharge their cargo, and to force a cargo of the utterly unnecessary with the daily increasing arrivals and more extensive service is being organized.

There is much discussion going on in Catholic and Protestant circles in Berlin and other cities on account of the fact just made public that Professor Winschield, of Leipzig, who belongs to one of the most noted Catholic families of that city, has announced his conversion to Protestantism. This in itself would have created a sensation in religious circles, but its effect upon Catholics may be imagined when it is coupled with the statement that the professor attributes the change in his religious views to his conviction of the authenticity of the garment known as the Holy Coat, which was on exhibition in the Cathedral at Treves, and his conscientious scruples against supporting a Church that would lend its sanction to such an exhibition.

The work of disinfecting Consagra and clearing the town of the miasma which left by the floods of the river, is now so advanced that there is no longer danger of an epidemic there. The inhabitants are now provided with abundance of food.

It is officially stated that 600 buildings remain standing at Consagra. There were 2,100 before the late deluge.

Starvation is staring in the face a large number of people at Tauboff who have been employed upon public works, as work upon the latter must stop when the frost sets in. The masses of the people rely entirely upon the Government to help them. This being the state of affairs in the present mild weather, but whose prospects held out by the coming winter can be readily imagined.

The Moscow Gazette, in reporting the movements of Russian troops on the Afghan frontier, boasts that England's impudent menace in the Dardanelles matter was answered in Asia, where there is no Drebund to assist England, and that every blow struck at Russian diplomacy in Europe was met by a blow in Asia.

Abundant harvests are reported from most of the Turkish provinces, especially from those situated in Asia Minor. It is estimated that the title revenue will exceed that of any previous year by 500,000 Turkish pounds.

Reference to the Times from Singapore says: "Shanghai advices to Ninth Month 12th prove that the Ichang riot was an organized outbreak on the part of the Hunan soldiers. The Central Government was powerless to quell the riot, except by sending troops from a distance and risking a civil war. As gambets cannot succeed in Ichang, a merchant steamer will take the British marines. Pilgrims issued to students at Nankin accuse Christians of gross crimes. People at the treaty ports say that nothing but the landing of a well armed force of foreigners will quell the troubles."

The North German Gazette publishes a letter from Dr. Peters, the African explorer, dated Eighth Month 8th, saying that the country southeast of Mount Killma-Njaro (Mountain of Greatness), a snowy mountain of East Africa, is delightful in temperance, healthy and fertile. "War," says Dr. Peters, "is a thing of the past," and he adds that he undertakes to "maintain discipline and obedience with forty soldiers."

The English Government has officially recognized the Provisional Government of Chili.

Advices from British Columbia indicate that, in promising to indemnify the Canadian sealers for any loss they might sustain in being driven out of Behring Sea this season, the British Government assumes a responsibility they had not accurately estimated. It now appears that Great Britain will have to pay at least $500,000, and possibly $700,000, to fulfil its pledges to the sealers of British Columbia.

Selections from the Journal of William Evans.

1859.—[A minute having been granted our honored Friend to visit the Western and Calm Quarterly Meetings, and the meetings comprising them; at its close, in a summary of the whole, he thus conveyed his sense of them, and hopeful prospect:]—

"It was refreshing to find there are those, in many places, whose minds are in good measure imbued with the love of Christ, and their conduct and appearance circumspect. From among these we hope to see faithful soldiers raised up, who will not flinch from suffering and reproach; out, growing in grace and strength, will valiantly maintain the testimonies which our holy Head communicated to us to hold forth in the world, and for which our devoted forefathers suffered many privations, and not a few, even death."

"The Yearly Meeting being now at hand, brings with it an unusual degree of concern, respecting the manner in which it will be held. It is greatly to be feared, that some have become blinded by a spirit which is seeking to draw Friends away from the spirituality of our holy profession, and to bring them into an alliance with the friendships of the world.

"Nothing short of the extension of Divine help, can preserve our poor Society from distraction and division. May our trust and confidence be placed in the protecting arm of the Shepherd of Israel, who has ever been the defence of his dependent children; and though He may permit them to go into deep baptism and suffering, as they endeavor to keep their faith and reliance in Him, He will bring them up again, rejoicing in his mercy and faithfulness.

"On Third-day morning the Yearly Meeting opened on the Queries and Answers, and Friends were favored to speak suitably to the different subjects; holding up the importance of public Divine worship, and the preservation of the unity which stands in Christ; wherein we should all speak the same language, and harmonize in our various labors to promote the cause of truth in the Church and in the world. Our ancient testimony to the Light of Christ as the ordinary rule of faith and practice, and the subordination of the Scriptures to it, was held forth, and a general concern was manifest to keep Friends to our religious profession. Throughout the various sittings the meeting was favored with much solemnity."

"I attended Abington Quarterly Meeting, and was enabled to hold forth the doctrine of our Lord, when He thanked the Father that He had hid the mysteries of his kingdom from the wise and prudent, and revealed them unto babes. That unregenerate man, with all his wisdom and natural powers, was unable to discover the Truth as it is in Jesus. His pride led him to overlook it, as too simple and too little for him to believe in. It was only as he was brought down into the dust; in a humble, childlike state, that he could be prepared to have these things revealed to him. 'Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye cannot enter the kingdom of heaven'; and unless we enter the kingdom of the dear Son of God and come under his government, we cannot see the things that pertain thereto. When we are brought here, He will reveal the knowledge of God, and those things which belong to our everlasting peace; and this knowledge of God and of his beloved Son, as it is thus revealed, is life eternal to the soul. Much more was opened, and the meeting was brought under a solemn covering. A woman Friend closed the meeting in humble, fervent prayer that the solemn truths delivered that day, might be sealed on every heart, and that the praise might be ascribed to the Lord alone, to whom it belongs."

"I attended the Arch Street Meeting, where I sat some time under a consideration of my own weaknesses and imperfections. Clothed with these sensations, we feel entirely unfit for the Lord's work, and are disposed to retire from it, and keep silence before Him, with the mouth as in the dust. After a time, I was introduced into a different feeling, and seemed to be gradually prepared to speak; but something seemed to give me a gentle check; with the intimation to wait and examine the presentation a little further; and on recurring to the passage of Scripture before me: 'To obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams'; it appeared to be applicable, and perhaps designed for myself. I kept still; and was glad that my Divine Master was so kind and condescending, as to keep me and instruct me in this way. May I become more and more conformed to his Divine will, and prepared to hear and obey his voice."

1840.—"This morning I received the intelligence of the decease of my much beloved and honored friend and father in the Truth, Josiah Reeve, of Upper Evesham, New Jersey. Thus, one after another, the fathers and pillars are removed from among us, at a time when the Church seems greatly to need them. May the blessed Head of the Church, in mercy look down upon our poor Society, and arouse many to a lively sense of the course they are pursuing, and snatch them as brands from the burning; that during the day of grace, they may be induced to enter into the vineyard and labor. But oh! the humbling effects of this world; how it is slaying thousands who should be employed in the Lord's work, and under his direction, spreading the kingdom of righteousness and truth in the earth."

"Since my return from New York, I have passed through seasons of great poverty and desertion. But though closely proved in many ways, I have endeavored to keep patient, and wait for the return of the Beloved of my soul; having underneath all, a secret trust and belief that light would again break forth, and a renewed qualification be granted, to testify of his mercy and unfailing compassion towards his dependent creature, man. 'This day I went to the Arch Street Meeting, where, after a time of inward waiting, the testimony of an eminent apostle arose; That the trial of your faith being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honor and glory, at the appearing of Jesus Christ; and in the fresh openings of the Spirit, I was led to speak of the afflictions and provings of their faith, which the Lord's children and servants had to pass through. He only knew when, and how far to try their faith and allegiance, by withdrawing his sensible presence; but as they endeavored to possess their souls in patience, keeping their eye to Him alone, when He saw it had produced the effect designed, He would return with healing in his wings, and give these the joys of his salvation. These could then sing of his judgments and his mercies; and would know a growth, and an establishment upon the Rock of ages, and the Foundation of many generations. The trial of their faith worketh patience; patience experience; and experience hope; that hope which maketh not ashamed of the tribulations that pertain to the Gospel of Christ. I was also led to encourage the dear young people to keep to their exercises, and not to cast away their confidence in their Lord; and through obedience and submission to his baptizing power, they would advance until they should be prepared to endure hardness, as good soldiers of Jesus Christ.

"Being their Monthly Meeting, I remained with them. Towards the close, there arose the language of encouragement to the members, to devote themselves to the Lord's work, the few remaining years of their lives. Our religious Society had been signally blessed in this city, and within our Yearly Meeting, as well as in other places; but we had not brought forth fruits answerable to those blessings. Scattering and separation had taken place; but I believed if we were willing to submit to the necessary baptisms, and give ourselves up to his service, that his blessings would still be poured forth upon us, ungrateful as we had been; the waste places would be built up, and the doctrines and testimonies given to this Society, would not only be preached, but their nature and effect would be shown in the lives and conversation of our members; and living witnesses to those doctrines would be raised up, from age to age, and they should spread from the rivers to the ends of the earth."

1841.—“Our Yearly Meeting was unusually large on the men's side this year, and the business conducted with religious weight and much harmony. The state of the Society is not, however, settled, and all the members thoroughly united as branches of the true Vine; deriving strength and wisdom from the same Divine source. A painful sense is often attendant, that there are some who would exercise an influence that arises from a worldly spirit, that loves its own, and is at enmity with the cross of Christ, and the government of his Spirit. Such as these cry out for liberty and liberality. They are ready to confederate with men of the world in plans of benevolence; and could they have the predominance, they would draw the Society away from the sure foundation, and from an humble and steady reliance on the guidance of the great Head; whose right alone it is to direct the affairs of his Church. But there is also a body of exercised members, who desire to have their loins girded, and lights burning, waiting for the coming of their Lord, and who dare not be active in their own will and wisdom. These are baptized into death; having the sentence of death in themselves, not to trust in themselves, but in God who raiseth the dead, and giveth ability to stand for his cause. May their number increase, and the arms of their hands be made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob.”

[In reference to his son, Jonathan Evans' sickness and death, W. E. says:]

“He had lived an unblemished life; and though his business subjected him to the company of people of the world, of great variety of character, he was unusually circumspect in his department; and has drawn from many of them, sentiments of much respect for his example. He conducted himself with invariable respect for his parents and their judgment; and never departed in dress from the usual simplicity observed amongst us. Although he had thus lived, and was much beloved and approved by his friends; when he saw the inevitable result of his disease; his mind was brought under great exercise, that he might be prepared for the awful event. Speaking of previous exercises he underwent, he said: ‘The conflict I passed through for two days and nights, is indescribable. It seemed as if everything wrong that I had done, from my childhood to that day, was brought before me; and, at last, in mercy, I received an evidence that they were all forgiven and blotted out. I felt calm and peaceful.’ Notwithstanding this comfortable assurance, he underwent great reduction, and was often brought into close searching of heart, lest he should be deceived. Being thus left to struggle with the evil suggestions of Satan, and to feel his own weakness, he many times apprehended there remained a veil between him and his Heavenly Father, which he said he could not rend; and, at one time, under these sensations, he said: ‘I feel like a poor condemned criminal.’ He, however, experienced, at times, this state of mind to be changed; and was enabled to acknowledge the goodness and mercy of God; and when visited by some of his young friends, he imparted suitable counsel; particularly to those in business, against the spirit of the world; and their being drawn away after the acquisition of wealth. In such a situation as this, into which he was brought, he remarked, What would wealth do for any? It would then be found that earthly possessions were of no value whatever, to a soul in the prospect of eternity. He became more and more withdrawn from his outward concerns, and seldom said much about them. His time was chiefly spent in silent meditation; and he manifested a solitude of spirit, and deep feeling of seriousness, becoming the situation of one who was gradually approaching the termination of his earthly career. He appeared to have acquired much command over himself; so that he endured with patience the tediousness of a lingering consumption.

“At one time, he supplicated thus, in a very solemn and humble manner: ‘Oh, Lord Jesus, be with me through the valley and shadow of death! Oh, righteous Father, wash me and make me clean in the blood of the holy Jesus!’ After this, his mind appeared to be calm and settled; and near his close, when it was supposed he would speak no more, he seemed to receive a full assurance, that every obstruction was taken out of the way, and distinctly and audibly said: ‘I am now ready to go;’ and on the morning of the 5th of Seventh Month, 1841, his redeemed spirit was released from the conflicts and trials of time.”

FOR “THE FRIEND.”

The Eastern Shore of Chesapeake Bay.

In the last number of this article reference was made to a visit by George Rofe.

His residence was in Essex, England. He curly joined the Society of Friends, labored faithfully as a minister of the Gospel, and shared with many of his brethren in the imprisonments and other sufferings which were the portion of the godly in those intolerant days. He came to America on a religious visit in 1659. There is a poetical description of a voyage made from Chesapeake Bay to New England in a little boat of fourteen feet keel, which, as it may interest some of my readers, I propose inserting here:

GEORGE ROFE AND HIS LITTLE SEA BOAT.

A CHRISTIAN BALLAD, A. D. 1662.

Where many a wide-mouthed river flows on its sluggish way,
And yields with silent charity its waters to the Bay,
The Eastern Shore of Maryland, in Spring's deep verdure drest,
Looks lovely as a youthful bride, of health and bloom possess'd.

There the Chesapeake's green waters hath mimic swell and break,
As to cheer the sunny noontide the western breezes wake,—
And its snowy tufted billows curl softly to the land,
And spend with gentle murmur their force upon the sand.

And many a pretty shell-fish they gathered in their play,
As they came with shelling motion o'er the shallow-watered bay,
They bear with forceful impulse as they rush with gentle roar,
And strew them with white foamy hand along the sloping shore.

The sower of the fallow-ground as ever on he treads,
The seed of future harvests with joyful spirit spreads,
As in continuous motion around him sweeps his hand,—
So the wave's crest flings its circles as it breaks upon the sand.

And think not that the waters are sowing seed for naught,
To reap their bounteous harvest, you sea birds have been taught,
As the wave retires beneath them the living fish they seek,
And tear it from its shelly home, with hunger-pointed beak.

The children from the wigwam and the settler's huts are there
To choose among the shelly heaps the curious and the rare,
They string them for their jewelry, they use them for their play,
A harvest of right pleasant thoughts they gather every day.

The near approach of Summer is whisper'd by the breeze,
As its warm breath adds a deepness to the verdure of the trees;
In the settlers' narrow clearing, by the wigwam's sunny side,—
The young maize upward springeth in its beauty at its pride.

GEORGE ROFE who long hath labored in the Gospel of his Lord,
Along that green peninsula, hath preached the living Word.
He hath drawn full many a hearer from his forms afar
From his sin,
And brought him broken-hearted to Jesus Christ within.

Stripes and prisons were his portion within the English Isles,
And where cedar crowned Bermuda mid reefs of coral smiles—
He hath suffered where New-Amsterdam looks on her lotly bay,
Where Peter the hard headed,* still holds despotic sway.

But here in sunny Maryland, no open foes he met—
The hard strong hand of Bigotry is scarcely stirring, yet:
And though priest and judge may threaten and ignore aside deride,
Such arguments as lash and chains they have not yet applied.

Where Narraganset's waters flow out into the sea,
There is an isle of beauty, the refuge of the free, Free as the wave toss'd ocean its sandy shore than its sons and lovely daughters no king nor priest enslaves.

There in a Yearly Council the Friends of Jesus meet Safe in that free-souls citadel from all the storms the sea beat;
The blast of Eastons' malice, though in thunder it may roar,
Cause not the waves of Priestcraft to swell upon the shore.

'Tis there the Quakers gather, when early Summer strews
'Neath the deep green of the forest, her flowers of many hues;
'Tis there they meet to worship the God of human kind;
'Tis there they seek for counsel from his Almighty mind.

In many a Truth-bless'd dwelling within New England's bound,
In frequent social meetings the faithful gather round:
The Saviour whom they worship is with the two or three,
And He shows his quickening presence where many gathered be.

To Rhode Island George must venture, where his Master is, is Home!
There the firm in faith will gather, there the wise in spirit come.
When he thinks of these his brethren who look for rest above,
His spirit yearneth towards them, with the fervency of love.

His Master bids him hasten, and appointeth him the way,—
So he launcheth forth a little bark upon the mighty Bay;
But fourteen feet she measureth along her tiny keel,
A bark of little strength and depth the ocean swell to feel.
Two well tried friends of Jesus go with him o'er the deep,
Where on the dark green billows, the white caps gaily leap.

Before the breeze's freshness, the light bark flies away,
And dashes through the foaming crests, and scattereth them to spray.

They double soon the Southern Cape, they feel the Ocean's swell,
And like a bubble on the waves, their light craft
rideth well,
Eve blushed the west to glory, then quenched its rosy light,
Whilst darkness kindled over them the starry lamps of night.

They risk not life for evil, nor yet to gather gold,—
And He whose hand Omnipotent, the swift wind'd winds doth hold,
He guides them on their passage,—He guards them
night and day,
And giveth favoring breezes to speed them on their way.

We know not in their voyage along the Atlantic strand,
'Till they run their slender keel-piece upon Long Island sand,
How oft the rosy morning tipp'd the prow-dashed spray with red,—
How oft the golden evening its brightness round them shed.

To the west rose many a sand-hill, whose base the bil-lows beat,
To the east in seeming nearness, the sky and ocean blend.

They passed the wide-mouthed river, by many a seaward shoal,
Where with never-ceasing murmur the foam-hair'd breakers roll.

The sea was breaking heavily with deep continuous roar,
Where driven by an Eastern gale on Baraegat's low shore;

There the light bark caught new impulse from the wind's impetuous sweep,
And like a strong-winged sea-bird it skimmed along the deep.

Now breaking on their watchful ears there comes a cry
of woe,
And men upon the sandy beach are hurrying to and fro,
George runs the bark as near the shore, as in the storm
he dare,
To learn what means that cry for help and white men gathered there.

'Mid the loud voices of the surf but faintly he can hear,
Of storm-wrecked bark and seamen cast upon that coast of fear:

Between them and New Amsterdam are Indian warriors dread,
And low dark gloomy depths of wood where bears and panthers tread.

He gives them words of comfort, he promises to go
To Peter at New Amsterdam, and tell their tales
of woe;

Then fresh again before the gale, his little vessel springs,
As though to do a deed of love had added length of wings.

Still on their forward passage, the saving Power attends,
He treads upon Long Island, breaks bread among his Friends,—
His gospel message utters,—and then without delay
To do his deed of mercy, once more is under way.

Alone he went and suffered e'er he his work achieved,
For souls were heaped upon him, fierce beatings he received;—

Yet he fulfilled his mission, and when he came to part, Though scorned and evil treated, sweet peace was in his heart.

Now Northward of Long Island with tact and skill he guides,
Here through ocean's billows his little vessel glides,
And thoughts of all danger, a flaw of wind surprised,
And quick as falls a plummet, their trusty bark capsized.

Rescued by Indian kindness, and to their craft restored,
George and his tried companions were grateful to the Lord.

They felt no pledge of safety but what from Him was given;
They felt there was no danger when his right arm sustained.

Joyful with many brethren these rescued pilgrims met,
Partook of Christ's rich table by Heavenly goodness set:

Then strengthened and encouraged, with true and ferveat heart,
Each to their several services in distant scenes depart.

Again the three have voyaged amid old Ocean's foam,
And safe their light bark bore them to its wide-mouthed river home,
In faith George labored patiently, with grace by Jesus
given,
Till called to anchor suddenly in the peaceful port of Heaven.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The True Standard of Christian Living.

The writer is satisfied that among other things one reason of the low grade of Christian life seen in many professed followers of the Lord Jesus is a wrong conception of some of the expressions of St. Paul in the VII Chapter of Romans.

May we not truthfully say, there are two classes of professed Christians in the world? Those whom we may reckon as living according to VIII Chapter of Romans, and secondly, those who have advanced no further and no deeper in their Christian experience than what is expressed in the VII Chapter. Read thoughtfully and prayerfully, then to whom these lines may come, the VII and VIII of Romans, and see in which of these thou art living.

Does any one say that Paul meant to express the true ideal of Christian living in what he says in the VII Chapter? I do not so understand it, for, if so, how could he say just the opposite in the VIII Chapter?

I meet with many persons who ought to live far differently from what they do (persons who could, by the grace of God, lead concentrated lives, lives of service to their Master), contenting themselves with a rest short of the true rest, and excusing their shortcomings, they say, their experience is like Paul's: "The things I would not do I do, and the things I would do, these I do not."

It saddens my heart to know they think Paul advocated this low standard of Christian living. Awake! thou that sleepest, and shake thyself from the dust of a misconception of the Apostle's real meaning. Thinkest thou that that grand old Christian hero could be or was speaking of himself as a Christian when he said, "I am carnal sold under sin?" And did he mean to convey the idea that this was the state of the true disciple and that he could not rise above it? Listen to this same Paul in another place, where he says, "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me."

Is he not rather in this VII Chapter of Romans teaching us the inability, the utter impossibility for us to rightly serve God by the will of the flesh, or as we more perfectly understood in the early days, by the law. Notice how at the very beginning of this chapter he says, "Know ye not brethren (for I speak to them that know the law)."

Then mark the closing of the same chapter. After a long line of reasoning on the subject he says, "O, wretched man that I am (if I continue in this state) who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Let us note the answer, "I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord." And then he follows on immediately in the next chapter, "There is therefore now no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh but the Spirit." That is how we are to be delivered, whether it be from the deadness of sin and the unregenerate state, or the deadness of a half-hearted Christian walk.

This same Paul declares, "The law of the Spirit of Life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death." This law of liberty, this freedom from sin, is the position he constantly holds forth as the privilege of every believer.

Certainly when the apostle says, "The good that I would do, I do not; but the evil which I would not, that I do," he does not speak of his own present experience.

He here uses the present tense for the sake of the argument he is making throughout the entire context of these few chapters. The letter he is writing to explain to the Romans and to us, that the law is carnal and there can be no spiritual life except you abide in Christ.

He places himself in the position of one striving to live under the law and so follow Christ without an entire coming under his leadership and control.

He here shows how the flesh wars against such an one's own willingness to do right, until he finds he cannot overcome except by and through Christ.

Yet there are many to-day, I firmly believe, who I doubt not have come out on the Lord's side, who mistake the apostle's true meaning here in the language he makes use of, and therefore think there is no higher ground, but content themselves in their repeated failures with the thought that they have the same experience that Paul had, and consequently do not try to reach a higher plane.

I do not mean to be understood to infer that there is not any warfare in the Christian life. Far be it from me to create such an impression. There is a warfare, and we are told to "watch and pray," "lest we enter into temptation, for the spirit indeed is willing but the flesh is weak." Nevertheless this warfare should be a warfare of continual victory and not of defeat. God is able to keep his own from falling as they put their trust in Him, and we can come out more than conquerors through Him who hath loved us and washed us in his own blood.

This warfare is mighty through God to the pulling down of the strongholds of sin and Satan, the casting down of imaginations and every high thing which exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing every thought into captivity and obedience to Christ.

There is no excuse for our unkindness, our hasty temper, our disregard for the feelings of others, our giving way to many things we know are not right. We have a Captain who was never foiled in battle, and all these fleshly evils, if we give ourselves wholly to Him, will vanish as the morning mist in the bright glare of the noontday sun. What we need is to come under the full influence of the melting tenderness and sweetness of the beams of the Son of Righteousness, and we shall have the victory.

Those who content themselves with trying to live under this wrong understanding of the VII Chapter of Romans are never happy. These are not the joyful Christians, neither are they fruit-bearing branches of the True Vine. They are still to some extent under the yoke of bondage and they have not realized what it is to come so fully under the yoke of our dear Redeemer as to know that his yoke is indeed easy and his burden light.

Are there not many in danger of losing their final rest by thus indulging in a false hope of security?

They, thinking they can not overcome their fleshly weaknesses do not rightly strive to do so, and thus retrograde in their Christian life, if indeed they have ever entered into it.

"To be carnally minded is death, but to be spiritually minded is life and peace, for the carnal mind is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." But we can get where we are free from these things, "for what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son hath condemned sin in the flesh." Let us seek to know the Lord more fully and to live under the power of his Divine Grace, and we shall find that He is able to keep that which is committed unto Him until the day that He shall come to claim his own.

May I ask thee then, dear reader, where art thou standing to-day? Dost thou show by thy life that thou hast victory over sin day by day, or is thy half-hearted, indifferent Christian walk a stumbling-block to others?" Let thy light shine so that others may, through thy loyalty and happy service to thy God and King, be led to come also and taste for themselves, and see that the Lord is good, and that He is a sweet rewarder of all who faithfully obey Him.

NEW YORK CITY.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Home Life on an Ostrich Farm.

This is the title of a book published in London last year, and giving the experience in Ostrich farming of an English family, who settled in South Africa. It contains much interesting information respecting that section of country and its productions, and especially concerning the characteristics and habits of the very peculiar birds to whose cultivation the energies of these settlers were directed.

The authoress, Annie Martin, speaks as our writers have done, of the multitude of bright-colored, wild flowers which carpeted the ground near the Cape. In five minutes walk they gathered twenty-eight different sorts.

The tract of land selected for their ostriches included over twelve thousand acres, and was situated in a long valley running between two ranges of mountains, the steepness of which rendered inclosing unnecessary in many parts; thus saving much expense in starting the farm, an entirely new one, and chosen purposely by T—— on this account. For it sometimes happens that land on which ostriches have run for years becomes at last unhealthy for the birds. We were in that part of the Karroo which is called the Zwart Ruggens, or "black rugged country," so named from the appearance it presents when, during the frequent long droughts, the bush loses all its verdure, and becomes outwardly so black and dry-looking that no one unacquainted with this most curious kind of vegetation would suppose it capable of containing the smallest amount of nutriment for ostriches, sheep, or goats. But if you break one of these apparently dried-up sticks, you find it all green and succulent inside, full of a very nourishing saline juice; and thus, even in long droughts which sometimes last more than a year, this country is able to support stock in a most marvellous manner, of which, judging by outward appearance, it certainly does not seem capable. It seems strange that in this land of dryness the plants are so full of moisture; one wonders whence it can possibly have come.

The little karroo plant, from which the district takes its name, is one of the best kinds of bush for ostriches, as well as for sheep and goats; it grows in little compact round tufts not more than seven or eight inches from the ground, and though so valuable to farmers, it is but unpretending in appearance, with tiny, narrow leaves, and a little, round, bright yellow flower, exactly resembling the centre of an English daisy after its oracle has been consulted, and its last petal pulled by some inquiring Marguerite.

The fei-bosch is another of our commonest and most useful plants; its pinkish-lilac flower is very like that of the portulaca, and its little flat succulent leaves look like miniature prickly pear leaves without the prickles; hence its name, from Turk-pei, Turkish fig. When flowering in large masses, and seen at a little distance, the fei-bosch might almost be taken for heather.

The brack-bosch, which completes our trio of very best kinds of ostrich-bush, is a taller and more graceful plant than either of the preceding, with blue-green leaves, and blossom consisting of a spike of little greenish tufts; but there are an endless variety of other plants, among which there is hardly one that is not good nourishing food for the birds.

All are alike succulent and full of salt, giving out a crisp, crackling sound as you walk over them; all have the same strange way of growing, each plant a little isolated patch by itself, just as the tufts of wool grow on the Hottentots' heads; and the flowers of nearly all are of the portulaca types, some large, some small, some growing singly, others in clusters; they are of different colors—white, yellow, orange, red, pink, lilac, etc. They are very delicate and fragile flowers; and, pretty as they are, it is useless to attempt carrying them home, for they close up and fade as soon as they are gathered.

Thorny plants abound, especially on the mountains, where indeed almost every bush which is not soft and succulent is armed with strong, sharp, often cruelly hooked spikes. The wacht-een-beefje (wait-a-bit) does not grow in our neighborhood, but we have several plants which seem to me no less deserving of the name; and often, when held a prisoner on some ingenious arrangement of hooks and spines viciously pointing in every possible direction, each effort to free myself involving me more deeply, and inflicting fresh damage on clothes and flesh, I should, but for T——'s assurance to the contrary, have quite believed I had encountered it. The constant repairing of frightful "traps" and yawning rents of all shapes and sizes in T——'s garments and my own, took up a large proportion of time; and often did I congratulate myself on the fact that my riding-habit at least—chosen contrary to the advice of friends at home, who all counselled coolness and lightness above everything—was of such stout, strong cloth as to defy most of the thorns. Any less substantial material would have been reduced to ribbons in some of our rides.

On foot, you are perpetually assailed by the great strong hooks of the wild asparagus, a troublesome enemy, whose long straggling branches trailing over the ground are most destructive to the skirts of dresses; while boots have deadly foes, not only in the shape of rough ground and hard, sharp-pointed stones, but also in that of numerous prickly and scratchy kinds of small bush. At the end of one walk in the veldt, the surface of a kid boot is all rubbed and torn into little ragged points, and is never again fit to be seen. Fortunately, in the Karroo, no one is over-particular about such small details.

Among our troublesome plants, one of the worst and most plentiful is the prickly pear; and farmers have indeed no reason to bless the old Dutchwoman who, by simply bringing one leaf of it from Cape Town to Graaf-Reinet, was the first introducer of what has become so great a nuisance. It spreads with astonishing rapidity, and is so tenacious of life that a leaf, or even a small portion of a leaf, if thrown on the ground, strikes out roots almost immediately, and becomes the parent of a fast-growing plant; and it is not without great trouble and expense that farms can be kept comparatively free from it. Sometimes a little party of Kafirs would be encamped on some part of our land especially overgrown with prickly pears; and there for months together they would be at work, cutting in pieces and rooting out the intruders; piling the disjointed stems and leaves in neatly-arranged stacks, where they would soon ferment and decay. Labor being dear in the colony, the wages of "prickly-pear men" form a large item in the expenditure of a farm; in many places indeed, where the plants are very numerous, it does not pay to clear the land, which consequently becomes useless, many farms being thus ruined.

Sometimes ostriches, with that equal disregard of their own health and of their possessor's pocket for which they are famous, help themselves to prickly pears, acquire a morbid taste for them, and go on indulging in them, reckless of the long, stiff spikes on the leaves, with which their poor heads and necks soon become so covered as to look like pin-cushions stuck full of pins; and of the still more cruel, almost invisible fruit-thorns which at last line the interior of their throats, besides so injuring their eyes that they become perfectly blind, and are unable to feed themselves.

Many a time has a poor unhappy ostrich, the victim of prickly pear, been brought to me in a helpless, half-dead state, to be nursed and fed at the house. Undaunted by previous experience, I perseveringly tended each case, hoping it might prove the exception to the general rule, but never were my care and devotion rewarded by the recovery of my patient. There it would squat for a few days, the picture of misery; its long neck lying along the ground in a limp, despondent manner, suggestive of the attitudes of sea-sick geese and ducks on the first day of a voyage. Two or three times a day I would feed it, forcing its unwilling bill open with one hand, while with the other I posted large handfuls of porridge, mealis, or chopped prickly pear leaves in the depths of its capacious letter-box of a throat. All to no purpose; it had made up its mind to die, as every ostrich does immediately illness or accident befalls it, and most resolutely did it carry out its intention.

The prickly pear, mischievous though it is, is not altogether without its good qualities. Its juicy fruit, though rather deficient in flavor, is delightfully cool and refreshing in the dry heat of summer; and a kind of treacle, by no means to be despised at those not infrequent times when butter is either ruinous in price or quite unobtainable, is made from it. A strong, coarse spirit, equal to the aguardiente of Cuba in horrible taste and smell, is distilled from prickly pears; and though to us it seemed only fit to be burned in a spirit-lamp, when nothing better could be procured, it is nectar to the Boers and Hottentots, who drink large quantities of it. Great caution is needed in peeling the prickly pear, the proper way being to impale the fruit on a fork or stick while you cut it open and remove the skin. On no account must the latter be touched with the hands, or direful consequences will ensue. To the inexperienced eye the prickly pear looks innocent enough; with its smooth, shiny skin, suggestive only of a juicy interior, and telling no tale of lurking mischief, yet each of those soft-looking little tufts, with which at regular intervals it is dotted, is a quiver filled with terrible, tiny, hair-like thorns, or rather stings; and we betide the fingers of the unwary "new chum," who, with no kind friend at hand to warn him, plucks the treacherous fruit. He will carry a lively memento of it for many days.

My first sad experience of prickly pears was gained, not in South, but in North Africa. Landing with a friend in Algiers some time ago, our first walk led us to the fruit market, where, before a tempting pile of figues de Barbarie, we stopped to quench the thirst of our thirty-eighty's passage. The fruit was handed to us, politely peeled by the Arab dealer; and thus, as we made our first acquaintance with its delightful coolness, no suspicion of its evil qualities entered our minds. And when, a few days later, adding the excitement of a little trespassing to the more legitimate pleasures of a country ramble, we came upon a well-laden group of prickly pear bushes, we could not resist the temptation to help ourselves to some of the fruit, and woeful was the result. Concentrated essence of stinging-nettle seemed all at once to be assailing hands, lips and tongue; and our skin, wherever it had come in contact with the ill-natured fruit, was covered with a thick crop of minute, bristly hairs, apparently growing from it, and venomous and irritating to the last degree.

Our silk gloves were transformed suddenly into miniature robes of Nessus, and had to be thrown away, perfectly unwearable; and the inadvertent use of our pocket-handkerchiefs, before we had fully realized the extent of our misfortune, caused fresh agonies, in which nose as well as lips participated. For many a day did the retribution of that theft haunt us in the form of myriads of tiny stings. It was a long time indeed before we were finally rid of the last of them; and we registered a vow that whatever Algerian fruit we might acquire in future, it should not be figues de Barbarie.

In dry weather at the Cape these spiteful little stings do not even wait for the newly-arrived victim; but fly about, light as thistle-down, ready to settle on any one who has not learned by experience to give the prickly pear bushes a wide berth.

The leaves of the prickly pear are good for ostriches and cattle, though the work of burning off the thorns and cutting the leaves is so tedious that it is only resorted to when other food becomes scarce. One kind, the kahblblad, or "bald leaf," has no thorns. It is comparatively rare, and farmers plant and cultivate it as carefully as they exterminate its troublesome relative.

THE FATHER'S HAND.

I'm only an old wife now, sir, and I've time to sit on the strand

A-watching the boats come in, sir, and the children at play on the sands.

Seventy years, sir—all my days—I have lived beside the sea, And it has been neat and money and joy and sorrow to me.

Father and husband and boys, sir, there was not a man of them all

Could have lain still in the house, sir, when the winds and the waters call.

My father and my husband sleep in the graves of our folk by the shore;

But both of the boys who left me, they never came back any more!

Oh I've been ready to sink, sir, but one thought would keep me afloat:

I learned it, sir, as a little lass at play in my father's boat.

(Do you know, sir, it's often struck me the lesson of life is writ Plain out in the world around us, if we'd but give our minds to it?)

My father hadn't a lad, sir, so he paid the more heed to me;

He would take me with him in summer far out in the open sea,

And he'd let me handle the oar, sir, and pull with my might and main;

But if I'd been left to myself, sir, I'd ne'er have seen home again.

"Pull, little maid!" he would cheer me, but still kept his hand on the oar,

Though sometimes I'd try to turn us to some pretty nook on the shore;

Still straight went the boat to the harbor, and as I grew stronger each day

I found that the only wisdom was in rowing my father's way.

And I think, sir, that God our Father keeps hold of the world just so.

We may strive and struggle our utmost, that we may be stronger each day—

Stronger and wiser and humbler—till at last we can understand

The beauty and peace of his keeping the oar through all life in his hand.

For the Father knows what we really want is labor and rest with Him;

So He bears us straight through joy and loss, over discontent and whim;

Though oft it's not till we sit, like me, a-watching life's sinking sun,

We feel our best is our latest prayer, and that is, "Thy will be done!"

—Sunday at Home.

No order from Christ will ever involve the doing of that which is wrong in itself, nor will it involve a breach of trust in the sphere of present obligations. No emergency of Christ's cause ever justifies a dishonest transaction or an untruthful statement. No Christian mother ever yet received an order from Christ to neglect a sick child at her home in order to teach a Sunday-school class; nor did any Christian policeman ever receive an order from Christ to desert his beat for the hour in order to attend a prayer-meeting. It cannot be that a man is ever ordered of Christ to lack in true fidelity to his parents in their special need, in order that he may enter the ministry; nor can any call to the foreign missionary field be from Christ, if it involves a shirking of already existing obligations in the home field, on the part of him who is called. Every order which comes from Christ to any one of his disciples will be a call which is consistent with every existing duty of that disciple, and which in it self involves no violation of the teachings of [the Bible].—S. FOR "THE FRIEND."

Bearing and Receiving Testimony.

From time immemorial, it has been a fundamental rule in courts of law, that no testimony is received as coming with fully recognized authority, except that which the witness himself hath perceived, through the faculties of sight, hearing, &c; and the witness' repetition of what another said he saw or heard is inadmissible, and is regarded as carrying but little weight.—Abimazur ran fast in a smooth way, overtaking Cushai, who went the sure way, though it might be longer; but as eager as the former was to run, he could give no witness to the main question, and had to give place to Cushai, who was a living witness of what he had seen. So it is in spiritual matters. That, alone, reaches the true witness in the heart of every man, which is given forth by the Spirit of Truth, whether it be by direct revelation, or mediately through what has formerly been written, as the Holy Scriptures, or through our fellow-man who himself hath perceived and marked the Word of God. Thus the Judge of all mankind has left on record, "I receive not testimony from man." (Jno. v: 34.)

If, then, a true messenger of the word of the Lord, bears witness to the Truth, God's witness in the heart setteth his seal to that testimony; and "in the mouth of two witnesses shall every word be established." As it was said to the Jews in old Jerusalem, so may it now be said to the Jews spiritual, in New Jerusalem, where David their king now rules and reigns in righteousness, "Believe in the Lord, your God, so shall ye be established; believe his prophets, so shall ye prosper." (2 Chron. xx: 20.)

The men of Samaria felt the importance of hearing Christ for themselves, and on that hearing based their belief in Him; and said to the woman, "Now, we believe, not because of thy saying; for we have heard Him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world." (Jno. iv: 42.)

Paul, the apostle, addressing the Ephesians, (who had heard the word from his mouth,) as to how they had learned Christ, said "If so be that ye have heard Him, (Christ), and have been taught by Him, as the Truth is in Jesus." (Eph. iv: 21.) And the Apostle John declares, "But ye have an unction from the Holy One; and ye know all things;" (Jno. ii: 20.)—and of this unction he says, "But the anointing which ye have received of Him, abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you; but as the same anointing teacheth you all things, and is Truth, and is no lie; and even as it hath taught you, so shall abide in Him." (1 J. v: 27.)

The Apostle Peter foretells that as "there were false prophets among the people, so shall there be false teachers among you; * * * and many shall follow their pernicious ways; by reason of whom, the way of Truth shall be evil spoken of." (2 Pet. ii: 1, 2.)

How, then, may the bearers know and distinguish the false teachers? For, should we, with the many, follow them, our plea in the day of judgment, that so and so, a great preacher, said, if "I only believed, that then I might do anything else I had a heart to," will no more avail us than a similar excuse would a poor thief, sorry too late, who when brought into our courts of justice, should plead as an excuse, "so and so said, that I might steal."

This discernment of what is true, whether in ourselves or others, is given to such as abide in God's word;—God's witness to the truth in the heart. This word tries both the true and the false; acknowledging the one, and rejecting the other. For want of abiding here, the Jews, the Doctors of the Law, and the learned Pharisees rejected Christ, in their day, when He came in the flesh, as the same generation reject Him in this day of his coming in Spirit. It hath pleased God, that by the wisdom of man, Christ is not known. Those alone who receive the witness of the Holy Spirit, whom Jesus Christ sendeth, have the true wisdom and judgment, as the Lord said, "I thank Thee, O Father, Lord of Heaven and earth, that Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in Thy sight." (Matt. xiii: 26.)

Those mysteries which God hid from the wise men of Egypt, or the Assyrian astrologers, or the learned Pharisees, He made known to Joseph in the dungeon, to the captives Daniel and his friends, or to the fishermen of Galilee, esteemed by the worldly-wise men of the day as "unlearned and ignorant men." Men in fine clothing are found in spacious and ancient halls of learning, and there receive honor and emolument from men; but how long will it be, ere men learn the lesson, that those who seek and hope to find Christ to the comfort of their souls, must look away from man and his teaching, and follow that voice which is heard in the wilderness, calling men to true repentance toward God? To such as thus earnestly seek the Lord, in the way of his coming, this baptism of repentance (whereby the pride of man is humbled, the strength and glory of man laid in the dust, and the soul made to cry out for a Redeemer, a Saviour,) is found to be the fore-runner of the Messenger of the Covenant, whom the soul seeks; and this Messenger, who is none other than the Lord of Hosts, the Lord strong and mighty in battle, shall suddenly come to his temple. He it is who baptizes with the Holy Ghost and with fire. See Matt. iii: 1-6.

This "Holy Spirit, whom God hath given to them that obey Him," (Acts iv: 32,) is the Divine Messenger who comes direct from the Father and the Son—"He testifieth that which He hath seen and heard, and no man receiveth his testimony, (for it is only in that measure of the Spirit of God, a manifestation whereof is given to every man to profit withal, that the things of the Spirit can be heard, known, or received). But "he that receives his testimony, hath set to his seal that God is true." (Jno. iii: 32, 33.)

Such as are born again of the Spirit, see the kingdom of God, enter therein, and obeying the King that ruleth in righteousness and peace, receive the joys of the Holy Spirit, and bring forth fruits of righteousness, to the praise and glory of God.

Since, then, it is evident that in order to be a true witness to spiritual things, the witness must himself have seen or heard these things in the spirit, what shall we say of the man who denies that there is any revelation of the Spirit in these days to man?—He that, thus affirms, that he himself is blind, can he teach others? Is not this the very key of knowledge, which is essential to every believer, to open the door of heaven? Was not this the key which the Pharisees lacked, and so knew not Christ when He came in the flesh, but which Peter found and used to the saving of his soul? And are we any more likely, without this key, to be able to open the treasury of the knowledge of Jesus as He now comes in Spirit?—when Jesus himself says, that none can see nor enter the kingdom, unless they be born of the Spirit; that none abide there, unless they live and walk in the Spirit; and that they only are sons of God, who are led by the Spirit of God; and if any have not this spirit of Christ, he is none of his;—so neither will the Lord own him, nor can he truly call Jesus Lord, without that Spirit. But as "the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy," so equally true is it, that the Spirit of Truth can alone bear acceptable testimony to Jesus. It is God's Spirit in others witnessing to the Truth; and it is the same Spirit in us, setting his seal to that which is spoken, and also witnessing to our spirit that we are his. Then why should we follow blind leaders of the blind—if so shall we not, with them, fall into the ditch? "Christ, our life, and God hath revealed his Son unto us as such, by his Spirit. W. W. B.

Natural History, Science, etc.

At the meeting of the American Association of Science, Professor Upham described six classes of mountains.

1. The long mountain belts consist of folded rock formation—wave-like ridges with intervening troughs, the folds being sometimes closely pressed together. Examples are found in the Appalachian and Laurentian Systems of America and the grand Alp-Himalayan belt of the old world, reaching from the Pyrenees to the China Sea.

2. The Arched mountains are typified by the Uinta range in Utah, an arch having been raised 150 miles long and 40 wide, and about five and a half miles high. By erosion this arch has since been cut down to one-half its original height.

3. Domed mountains—such as the Henry Mountains in Utah—were formed by volcanic uplifts of previously horizontal strata, lava being injected between the strata.

4. The Wasawat Mountains and the Sierra Nevada are examples of tilted ranges—being in immense rocky masses, tilted by the upheaval of one border, with a corresponding depression of the opposite border.

5. Volcanic eruption on a grand scale along deep fissures, has made mountains like the Andes, the Cascade Mountains, 500 miles long, with lava beds 4,000 feet thick; also the volcanoes of Iceland, Hawaii, &c.

6. Mountains are sometimes made wholly by erosion—some of which in Montana are many thousand feet in height.—Scientific American.

A Floral Festival in Mexico.—The origin of this observance we did not exactly understand, except that it is an old Indian custom, which is carefully honored by all classes; and a very beautiful one it most certainly is. For several days previous to that devoted to the exhibition, preparations were made for it by the erection of frames, tents, canvas roofing, and the like, in the centre of the alameda and over its approaches. At sunrise on the day designated, the people resorted in crowds to the broad and beautiful paths, roadways, and circles of the delightful old park, to find pyramids of flowers elegantly arranged about the fountains; while the passage-ways were lined by flower-dealers from the country, with beautiful and fragrant bouquets for sale at prices and in shapes to suit all comers. Nothing but a true love of flowers could suggest such attractive combination. Into some of the bouquets, strawberries, with long stems were introduced, in order to obtain a certain effect of color; in others were seen handsome red berries, in clusters, like the fruit of the Mountain ash. We had observed the preparations, and were on the spot at the first peak of day.

The Indians came down the Paseo de la Reforma in the gray light of the dawn, and stopped beside the entrance to the alameda—men and women—laden with fragrance and bloom from all parts of the Valley of Mexico within a radius of forty miles from the city.—Astec Land.

Railroad Building in Mexico.—The descent from the high elevation of the Orizaba is continued, the route leading through groves of bananas, maize and sugar plantations, and creeping down the steep sides of the terrific gorge over a thousand feet deep, where the purple shadows look like shrouded phantoms hastening out of sight. This abyss is crossed by means of extraordinary engineering skill, much of the roadway along the nearly perpendicular side of the ravine having been hewn out of the solid rock. To accomplish this, it was necessary at first to suspend workmen by ropes over the brow of the cliffs, lowering them down until they were opposite the point to be operated upon, and, after making fast the ropes which held them, leave them there to work for hours with hammer and chisel. There was one piece of road-bed, not more than ten rods in length, where the track seemed to run on a narrow shelf, barely wide enough for the cars to pass, which is said to have required seven years to render available.—Astec Land.

Growth of the Banana.—From the centre of its large, broad, palm-like leaves, which gather at the top of the thick stalk, twelve or fifteen inches in diameter, when it has reached a height of about ten feet, there springs forth a large purple bud, eight or nine inches long, shaped like a large acorn, but a little more pointed. This cone hangs suspended from a strong stem upon which a leaf unfolds, displaying a cluster of young fruit. As soon as these have become fairly set, this sheltering leaf drops off, and another unfolds, exposing its little brood of young fruit, and the process goes on until eight or ten rings of small bananas are started, forming bunches, when ready to pick, of from seventy-five to a hundred of the finger-like product. After bearing, the stalk and top die, but it sprouts up again from the roots, once more to go through the liberal process of producing a crop of luscious fruit. It is said that the banana is more productive and requires less care or cultivation than any other food-producing growth in the tropics or elsewhere.—Astec Land.

An Intelligent Dog.—A gentleman in Southern Connecticut took not long ago a collie from the Lothian kennels at Stepey. The dog, after the fashion of his kind, soon made himself one of the family, and assumed special responsibility in connection with the youngest child, a girl three years of age.

It happened, one day in November, that the father was returning from a drive, and as he neared his house he noticed the dog in a pasture which was separated by a stone wall from the road. From behind this wall the collie would spring up, bark, and then jump down again—constantly repeating it. Leaving his horse, and going to the spot, he found his little girl seated on a stone, with the collie wagging his tail and keeping guard beside her. In the light snow their path could be plainly seen, and as he traced it back he saw where the little one had walked several times around an open well in the pasture; very close to the brink were the prints of the baby shoes, but still closer, on the very edge of the wall, were the tracks of the collie, who had evidently kept between her and the well. I need not tell you the feelings of the father as he saw the fidelity of the dumb creature, walking between the child and what might otherwise have been a terrible death.

A Remedy for the Scarcity of Grain.—Touching the recent prohibition by the Czar of the exportation of rye from Russia, because of the failure of the harvest, the National Baptist remarks: "If the Czar were to prohibit the distillation of spirits from rye and potatoes, he would go far to obviate the danger of famine, both because valuable articles of food would not be wasted, and also because his people would not so largely spend their wages upon that which only maddens and impoverishes them."

Gambling.—A recent report of a Baltimore Grand Jury speaks of the alarming extent to which the propensity to gamble has been developed in that city. It says:

There are two forms of gambling particularly calculated to bring untold evil in their train.

The first comprises those places where keno and hazard are played, frequented mostly by clerks and factory operatives of the ages between 15 and 30 years, and numbering nightly in attendance from 200 to 300.

The second is that of lottery policy playing, which is some special resort, being conducted by the system known as "walking books." The patronage of this game is drawn from all classes, both black and white, who yield blindly to its infection.

It is alleged that many of the gambling establishments in our midst are operated, or, when not operated, backed by men active in politics, whose influence acts as a powerful protection.

To abate the power or discover the hands that are mysterious, interested in their behalf is exceedingly difficult. Certainly this power exists, operating effectively as a shield. So long, therefore, as such covert influences are permitted to thwart the course of justice the present condition must continue and preliminary investigations be conducted under the most discouraging circumstances.

At the present time the gambling element is all powerful, with little prospect of its influence being essened until such time as the authorities shall see to a full appreciation of their obligations to the community and their unquestioned responsibility, by continually raiding the haunts, by arresting those who conduct the games, holding for proper identification all participants and lookers-on.

The Day of Rest.—Progress Made in Various Countries in Securing It.—As illustrations of the progress made within the past five years in various countries in securing Sunday as a Day of Rest may be mentioned the following:

In Austria a labor law protects women and minors from Sunday work, and makes the fiat of a Minister of the Government necessary for any manufacturing operations on that day. Postal deliveries are now limited to one. Sunday evening and Monday morning newspapers are prohibited because of the Sunday work necessary for their production. Many shops are now closed.

In Belgium a labor law has been passed to diminish Sunday work in factories, and work on the State railways has been very greatly reduced.

In Denmark a Sunday rest law has been passed, shops are closed at 9 A. M. for the day; factories and workshops are not allowed to be open between A. M. and midnight. All employees have at least alternate Sundays off, and postal work is limited to the work of the day.

The work of the French League for Sunday Rest, which was founded at the International Paris Congress of 1889, has spread with great rapidity in many parts of France. Railway, goods and parcels offices have been closed at 10 A. M. or at noon, and a labor law has been passed securing one day's rest in seven.

A labor law protecting the Day of Rest has been secured in Germany. The second delivery of letters has been suppressed throughout the whole empire.

Goods traffic is limited. Shops are now closed largely in Berlin and other cities and towns. Work is prohibited in mines, quarries, salt pits, collieries, foundries, timber yards, tile yards and factories of all kinds. Sunday race meetings have incurred the displeasure of the emperor and are dying out.

Goods trains do not run in Holland, and parcels and goods are delivered only early in the morning. A law has been passed securing rest for women and minors in factories and workshops.

A law has been passed in Hungary generally the same as for Austria, and in Norway too on tramways has been reduced. Labor in factories and workshops is greatly diminished.

In Russia no marked progress has been made, but on all parts of the empire petitions have been addressed to The Holy Synod asking for the closing of all shops and factories on Sunday. The movements in Sweden are of the same kind as in Norway and Denmark.

In Switzerland, by a law which came into force on December 1, 1890, "every servant of railway, steamer, tramway and other locomotive companies, and the employees of the Post Office, will have two days of rest, one of which will be on Sundays. The day's work cannot be lengthened merely by the will of the employer, and in no case may exceed 12 hours, and at least one hour's rest must divide the work. No wage is to be deducted for the rest day. Any breach of the law is to be visited with a penalty of from fr. 500 to fr. 1000."

A railway is in course of construction which connects Yverdon and St. Croix in the Canton Vaud, which by its constitution is to be free from all Sunday traffic for at least 25 years.—Public Ledger.

George W. Childs on Temperance.—I cannot lay too great stress on the matter of spirit temperance.

Drinking beer, wine, or spirits is a most dangerous habit. It does no good, and if the habit is continued, it is almost sure to lead to destruction and death. "Taste not, touch not, handle not." You should have courage enough to say, No, if you are asked to drink. In looking back over my life, I can recall many of the best and most promising of my companions who were ruined by the habit of drinking, and not one of whom I ever imagined that he would be wrecked in mind and body, and eventually fill a drunkard's grave. There is no safety in moderate drinking; every one who touches it at all is in danger.

The Unpopularity of the Army.—In an article in Blackwood, General French states that even during last year the net result of the War Office's utmost efforts to obtain the requisite number of men is that the establishment of the army is deficient by 4,693 men. And this very meagre result has only been obtained after having recourse to every imaginable device, such as paring the standards of enlistment measurements, and heightening the terms of enlistment, and worse than all, by drawing on the militia for as large a number of recruits as could be got from it.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 10, 1891.

When those who have been living as they pleased, with little reference to the Divine will, are brought under the controlling influence of the visitations of grace, they are soon made to feel that they are not their own masters, but that the life which they are now to live, must be by the faith of the Son of God: that the supreme question which is to govern all their thoughts, words and actions, is, "Are they such as are well-pleasing to my Heavenly Father? They find that there is no abiding comfort and peace outside of the fold of Christ; but that to enjoy this richest of blessings, they must be entirely devoted to Him and his service. The language of the Saviour comes home to them by a lively experience—"Whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple."

This "cross" of Christ is the inshing of his Spirit, which, if we are obedient to it, will check every evil thought or tendency to evil that arises in the mind, and will lead us in the way of redemption from evil—that highway of holiness, which conducts to eternal life.

To it the apostle refers, when he says, "The grace of God, which bringeth salvation, hath appeared unto all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world, looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ."

The Scripture declares that the lusts of the flesh, the lusts of the eye and the pride of life, are not of the Father, but of the world. And in accordance with this, we find that many of the most devoted followers of Christ have felt his restraining hand laid on them in respect to their manner of life, their apparel, and their style of living. Others, in their worldly wisdom, look upon these matters as of so little importance as not to require much thought or attention. But it is never safe to reject the guidance or restraints of the Spirit.

The following memorandum, written by Margaret Jackson, of Ireland, who died in 1822 in the prime of life, contain much instruction:—

"Tenth Month, 1820.—I wish that all the young people who call themselves Quakers, and who profess to be guided by the unerring Spirit of Truth, knew the concern that has attended my mind, that they should not launch out into gayety of dress; for, though I have no idea that religion consists entirely in a plain exterior, yet this I believe and am fully convinced of, that if our hearts be truly devoted to serve the Lord, and to love Him above everything, our inclination will not prompt us to follow the superfluous fashions of the world, the false pleasures of which can never afford us true and solid peace."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement shows that the interest-bearing debt decreased $25,504,700, and the debt on which interest has ceased since maturity increased $7,575,520 during the Ninth Month.

Total capital of the United States is estimated at $1,200,000,000. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in his sixteenth annual report to the Secretary of the Interior, suggested that the time has come for a declaration by Congress that hereafter it will not recognize the Indians as competent to make war; that the five civilized tribes should form a territorial or State government and be represented in Congress, and that the Pueblo Indians should be made citizens.

Ostrander and Trumppour, officers of the Ulster County Savings Institution in Kingston, New York, accused of stealing nearly half a million of the funds, have been arraigned and waived an examination. They were bound over to await the action of the Grand Jury next week. The other savings banks in Kingston have required from depositors 60 days' notice of intention to withdraw funds. A company of militia is held in readiness to suppress any outbreak.

The Commission appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury to recommend a site for the new $2,000,000 Mint in Philadelphia, has reported in favor of the block bounded by Sixth and Seventh and Walnut and Sanson Streets, facing Independence Square on the east and Washington Square on the south. About 50 separate buildings now occupy the site selected.

Chief Justice Green of the State of Oklahoma Territory, decided, on the 28th inst., that "when a saloon is run contrary to law any person, either an officer or private citizen, may destroy the business and no damage can be collected by the saloon keeper."

The North Philadelphia Baptist Association on the last instant adopted resolutions deploring the effects of the present High License law "in increasing and stimulating the use of intoxicants in the home" and reaffirming allegiance to the principle of the entire prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicants. A resolution condemning "the action of the Secretary of the United States and the Government to extend the beer trade among the South American Republics" was discussed and withdrawn.

The National Methodist Local Preachers' Convention, in session at Harrisburg last week, adopted resolutions against the liquor traffic, and requesting the Federal States and the Government to take measures to restrain the sale of ferments, ammonts and spirituous liquors in the Congo Free State.

An underground lake has been discovered three miles from Genese, Idaho. It was found by a well digger. At a depth of sixteen feet clear pure lake water came out of the machinery. The water settled back to the earth's level. The most curious part of it, says the Boise Steteman, is that fish were brought to the surface on the overflow. "They have a peculiar appearance and are sightless, indicating that they are underground fish. The spring has attracted much attention and many farmers in the vicinity fear that their farms will drop into the lake."

Gorham Gray, inventor of a kind of wire by which the conductivity is in the core instead of on the surface of the wire, says he is convinced that telephony is practicable not only between this country and London, through the Atlantic Ocean, for 9,000 miles from New York through to San Francisco and Hawaii.

Advices have been received at Ellendale, North Dakota, from the Missouri River country to the effect that a conflagration west of the Missouri River swept over a region 300 miles long and 200 miles wide, doing incalculable damage to crops and cattle, and probably resulting in the loss of many human lives. The fire is said to have been started by a buffalo lone picker that he might be the better able to find the objects of his search.

The Council's Survey Committee, on the 29th ult., approved an ordinance to place on the plan the proposed boulevard from City Hall to Fairmount Park, Philadelphia. The Chief Engineer and Surveyor said the opening of the proposed avenue with a width of 150 feet would cost for destroyed and damaged property upwards of $3,000,000. The number of deaths reported in this city last week was 340, being 29 more than the previous week, and 12 more than the corresponding week one year ago. Of the whole number, 183 were males and 157 females; 63 died of consumption; 23 of disease of the heart; 23 of cholera infantum; 15 of marasmus; 18 of diphtheria; 10 of influenza; 15 of scarlet fever; 10 of brain; 14 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 13 of old age; 12 of convulsions; 11 of pneumonia; 11 of Bright's disease; 11 of cancer and 11 of apoplexy.

FOREIGN.—In the Liberal Congress held at Newcastle, England, last week, among the resolutions adopted was one in favor of shorter terms of Parliament, pay for the members (the suggested limitation being £500 per annum), and the right for the general electors to elect members of Parliament. Resolutions were also adopted in favor of the "amending or ending" of the House of Lords, a reform of the land laws, a repeal of the laws of primogeniture and entail, home rule for villages, the enfranchisement of leaseholders and the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church of Scotland.

In his speech at the Congress, W. E. Gladstone said: "Those approaching my period of life may not witness it, but I trust we shall see through and effective reform of the laws connected with the traffic in alcohol, with an acknowledgment of the right of local populations to settle the question whether within their borders public houses shall exist." This declaration was greeted with cheers.

London, 27th evening Third Month 31, 1891, the inhabitants of Great Britain consumed 27,828,284 gallons of whiskey. Of this amount 4,121,146 gallons were disposed of in Ireland, almost a gallon per head. In Scotland the average was even greater, amounting to one and one-half gallons per head.

An identical note has been issued by England and Germany in response to the note issued by the Chinese Government, in which the Pekin authorities promised to protect the lives and property of foreigners in China. In this note England and Germany state that they accept the assurances of China's good intentions, but deprecate that they will be compelled to consult the Ambassadors at Pekin in regard to the ability of the Chinese Government to carry out its intentions. In conclusion, the note says that only the evidence of accomplished facts will satisfy the Powers.

General Boulanger has committed suicide.

On the 21st ult. the Guatemala, Capt. Francis Joseph arrived at Reichenberg, near Prague, and with his advent, the news of an alleged attempt upon the life of the imperial traveler spread all over Austria.

During the night, it appears, an attempt was made with a bomb, loaded with nitro-glycerine, to blow up the railroad bridge at Rosenthal, a suburb of Reichenberg. This outrage is said to have occurred shortly before the emperor's train, at an early hour (practically during the night), was to pass over the bridge mentioned. A subsequent examination revealed the presence of thirteen bombs that had been placed on the bridge, but only one exploded.

On the 21st ult., the Guatemala, Consul General at New York received a dispatch from President Barillas stating: "Absolute peace reigns in all Guatemala. Deny all rumors of revolution, which are false and malicious." A dispatch from the City of Mexico, received by the Guatemala, revolutionists succeeded in drawing Garibaldi's arms into the city on the 20th ult., and that the Government troops were badly used up, retreating to the capital, forty miles from the scene of the fight. The President of Salvador is quoted as saying that Guatemalans are ripe for a plan of conquest of Central America into one republic, and that he will not lose the opportunity of bringing about this result.

The Bureau of American Republics has been informed that an important deposit of that rare metal known as vanadium has been found in the province of Mendoza, Argentine Republic. This metal is one of the rarest of the natural kingdom, and is used for setting dyes in silks, ribbons, hosiery and other fine goods. The principal source of supply, until recently, has been a small deposit in the Cordillera Mountains, and it has been held as high as $1,500 per ounce.

An entirely new race of Indians is said to have been discovered in the mountains of the Andes.

A New York Tribune correspondent reports the arrival in St. Johns, N. F., of Bryant, of Philadelphia, and Professor Kenaston, of Washington, on their return from an exploration of Grand Falls, Labrador, in which they have been completely successful. "The party left the mouth of Grand River Eight and a half miles, and reached the falls, a distance of 200 miles from the mouth of the Lake Wana Kethow, 200 miles from the mouth of the river, Eighth Month 27th. Forty miles above the lake the party found an Indian trail to Fort Nascopee. They struck into the interior, carrying their canoe, provisions and instruments, crossed six lakes with inter-posing rapids, and fell into the lake at the seventh lake, and, after a two days' tramp, through a pathless country, reached the falls. The sight was magnificent. A half-mile above the falls the river is 400 yards wide. Three rapids, similar to that at Niagara, begin here. The banks narrow to the falls to a width of 150 to 200 feet, the water is 158 ft. in length. The water here rises into great cones, then falls over the granite ledge into a great basin. The height of the fall, 316 feet, was accurately measured. The banks widen below the basin. On the southern side of the river, below the falls, reddish cliffs rise 800 feet. Mist is thrown up in a narrow column over the falls, showing a rainbow. The deafening roar of the water is deafening. The party collected 260 specimens of plants and made valuable scientific records."

DIED, at the residence of her brother, Isaac B. Collins, in Norwich, N. Y., Fifth Month 13th, 1891, SUSAN COLLINS, in the ninety-fifth year of her age, who was a devoted member and many years Elder of Smyrna Monthly Meeting; was early convinced of the doctrines and testimonies of the Society of Friends, and conscientiously upheld them to the last. Many shared largely in her kindness and hospitality, her home was a home for strangers, while her quiet, unassuming manner bears the esteem of all who knew her. Her mental and physical powers held out remarkably to the last. Her only hope of salvation was in the merit and mercy of her loving Saviour. During her short illness love and sweetness were the covering of her spirit. Her end was peace.

at his residence, Kemp's Mills, Randolph Co., N. C., JOHN O. LITTLE, son of John and Thamer Little, was aged thirty-two years. A member of Holston Spring Monthly Meeting of Friends. More than seven years ago he met with an accident, by which his right arm was injured. A bone tumor gradually developed and he went to Philadelphia for medical advice. It was found necessary to remove the arm at the shoulder-into another operation, and he sought for relief for several months he was relieved from suffering. A return of the disease required a second operation which was performed, and he was once more hopeful of a permanent relief. Upon a reappearance of the disease a third time, he thought his strength unequal to another operation, and he sought for relief in the Divine will. The sweetness of his spirit and his consistent Christian walk endeared him to a number of Friends while in this city. After his return to his home in North Carolina his bodily sufferings at times were great, but he bore them with a remarkable degree of patience and quiet resignation, expressing a willingness for the disease to terminate as it might. At different times he applied for himself and others; at one time, near the close, saying he was not afraid to die. While his family who are left behind deeply mourn their loss, they are comforted with the belief that it is his eternal gain.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Selections from the Journal of William Evans.

1841.—In a religious visit to North Carolina Yearly Meeting, W. E. notes:

"This morning we stopped to view the astonishing, stupendous Natural Bridge over Cedar Creek. From the top of it to the water, is said to be two hundred and ten feet. The mass of stone forming the arch, thirty feet through; the distance from the under curve of the arch to the surface of the water below, one hundred and eighty feet; and the chord of the arch ninety feet. We are struck with admiration in standing under the huge superstructure, and contemplating the vast pile of stone so compactly placed; forming walls and abutments; and brown over such a space, an arch, of the enormous weight of stone, that rests upon them. Nor are the comparative perfectness of the arch, the regularity of the under curve, and the evenness of the surface less wonderful; when we reflect that it has not been effected by any force, acting according to the ordinary laws of nature; but by some extraordinary convulsion, of which we can have no adequate idea; but which we should suppose, would have left the standing masses of stone, craggy and without any such appearance of harmony and regularity as that which they now are. The length of time before we hear a stone, thrown from the top, strike the water below,—two or three seconds perhaps,—gives striking proof of the depth of the abyss into which it falls.

"The tavern keeper, with whom we last put up, enquired at the breakfast table, whether we were Quakers? and whether they always had preaching in their meetings? We replied that we were Quakers or Friends; but we do not appoint any to preach. We believe it right to meet together in silence to wait upon our Almighty Creator, to receive ability to worship Him in spirit and in truth; and that the Lord Jesus Christ, who is the Head of his church, gives the gift for the Gospel ministry to whom He pleases; and such whom He sets apart for that service, preach as they are moved to it by Him; but we often hold our meetings in silence. I also told him that we took no pay for preaching; that we followed some business for a livelihood; maintained ourselves, and when travelling, paid our own expenses. When a minister had not the means to do this, the Society took care that he should not want, but they paid him no salary. He was very ignorant of Friends, and seemed rather surprised at this. We gave him some books to inform him of our principles, for which he thanked us. He also enquired whether we approved of war? I told him that we do not. He supposed, as we do not fight, we paid the fine. I said, we neither engage in war ourselves, nor can we pay for a substitute; but when we are called on for a fine, we suffer our goods to be taken; and some are put in jail. This also puzzled him; as we knew the fine must be paid, he saw no reason why we should not do it. I observed there was the difference between voluntarily paying, and passively suffering the penalty prescribed by law."

"Attended Lost Creek Meeting. Being First-day, a large concourse of people assembled, but few of whom seemed acquainted with having their minds stayed upon the Lord. Accustomed to associate Divine worship with preaching and vocal prayer, the time of silence seemed long to some, and yet they behaved with propriety generally. The way at last appeared to open, to speak upon the effect of vital religion to bring the mind of man off from dependence upon man, who cannot save his brother, nor give a ransom for him; and to call them to Christ, the great mediator and minister of the New Covenant; that they might learn of Him. The doctrine of the universality of his appearance in the heart; of the angel which Job saw flying through the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach to them that dwell on the earth, of every nation, kindred, tongue and people, under heaven; of Christ, as the administrator of the baptism of the Holy Ghost and fire, by which He burns up the chaff; He who sits as a refiner with fire, and a fuller with soap, to purify and prepare the sons of Levi to offer offerings in righteousness; our propitiation for sin, and Advocate with the Father, were a little opened; and those who loved Him with sincerity, were encouraged to dedication. The Truth at times, seemed, in measure, to prevail over the meeting, and the people were solemnized; but after it was over, I felt tried, lest the humbling, tendering power of it, had not reached the heart, as much as is desirable; which depressed my spirits, and produced fear that I had not kept as close to my guide as I ought; but I could not discover where I had missed my way."

"In the course of the visit in Lost Creek Quarterly Meeting, we found Friends mostly in low circumstances, and living in a plain, rough manner; some of their houses having few lights of glass in them; their children partaking of little opportunity for education, either at home or at school. In many instances, this is occasioned by the want of means, and their time being mostly occupied at their work, to get bread and clothing. I felt sympathy with them, and could but contrast their condition with that of many affluent members in other parts of the Society, whose children are brought up in delicacy and luxury, and know nothing of the difficulties and privations to which the children of Friends in these parts are subjected. If a large part of the surplus wealth of rich Friends was applied to aid their fellow members, in educating their offspring, and in spreading the writings of Friends; much good would be done. It would tend to keep the hearts of the rich open to the trials of their fellow members, and to the great cause of the Redeemer's kingdom; which would be a blessing to themselves, by keeping out a covetous, parsimonious attachment to this world's treasures; while it would confer an important benefit upon others.

"We visited a school which was taught by a Friend, a few of the scholars being members. It was an open, log building, without a window; what light they had, came in through the openings between the timbers, and at the door; there was no floor but the earth; and no fireplace or stove. A little fire in the middle of the room, was the only means of warming it; the smoke passing out of any avenue it found. The children, though with cheerful countenances, were clothed with scanty covering, nearly all without shoes or stockings. Their situation appeared unfavorable for acquiring the necessary portion of useful learning, not only from these circumstances, but from the incompetency of the teacher, and the general habits and sentiments of their parents and caretakers. When we reflect upon the importance of a right education, and the little effort made by many to guard their children, by watching over and restraining, and instructing them in the great duties of life; cultivating their minds, and leading them into habits of cleanliness and industry, and warning them of the dangers of improper associations, and of every description of immoral taint; above all, by precept and example, inculcating the indispensable obligations of living in the fear of Almighty God, and working out their salvation, through the aid of his Spirit; we cannot but feel for children who partake of very few of these advantages; and desire that their parents were more aroused to a lively sense of the obligation which rests on them, towards their tender offspring. Many have difficulties in providing for their families; but were they more devoted to the love and service of their Heavenly Father, way would be made, either by his blessing, on their efforts, or through the help of the Society, to educate them in schools of suitable character, and to draw them into a love of our religious principles and testimonies. A blessing, I believe, has rested upon the honest concern and labor of Friends in many parts of our Society, in watching over and educating the youth; and in many instances, I trust, it will prepare the ground for the good seed which the Son of Man sows, and which will bring forth abundant fruit, under his blessing; and thus be instrumental in preserving many amongst us, who will be qualified to maintain the doctrines and testimonies of the Gospel, to the Lord's praise and the comfort and enlargement of the Church."

"At the Preparative Meeting at New Hope,

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Eastern Shore of Chesapeake Bay.

Among the interesting incidents connected with the history of Friends in Maryland is the fact, that Wenlock Christison, who suffered severely and was in imminent danger of losing his life among the bigoted officials of Massachusetts, found a peaceful refuge there and ended his days in quiet on the shores of the Chesapeake.

Wenlock had been cruelly beaten, imprisoned, nearly starved, and banished from the province of Massachusetts bay, on pain of death. While the case of William Leddra was before the court, who had been similarly banished because he was a Quaker, and had returned to Boston, Wenlock Christison came into the court. The marshal was ordered to bring him to the bar, and when asked who he did there, he replied, "I am come here to warn you that you should shed no more innocent blood; for the blood that you have shed already, cries to the Lord God for vengeance to come upon you." William Leddra was hanged and Wenlock sent to prison; and soon after was put on trial. In the trial he appealed to the laws of England, telling the magistrates that in condemning the Quakers to death, they went beyond the authority given by their patent. He was told that unless he would renounce his religion he should surely die. But with undaunted courage, he replied, "I shall not change my religion nor seek to save my life; neither do I intend to deny my Master; but if I lose my life for Christ's sake and the preaching of the Gospel, I shall save my life." He was sentenced to be hanged, to which he replied, "The will of the Lord be done, in whose will I come amongst you, and in whose counsel I stand, feeling his eternal power that will uphold me to the last gasp. Known be it unto you all, that if ye have power to take my life from me, my soul shall enter into everlasting rest and peace with God, where you yourselves shall never come. And if ye have power to take my life from me, the which I do question, I do believe you shall never more take Quakers' lives from them: note my words; do not think to weary out the living God by taking away the lives of his servants. What do you gain by it? For the last man that you have put to death, here are five come in his room! And if ye have power to take my life from me, God can raise up the same principle of life in ten of his servants, and send them among you in my room, that you may have torment upon torment, which is your portion; for there is no peace to the wicked, saith my God."

But though condemned, he was not executed; for by this time some reaction had been caused by the natural feelings of humanity; and by the evidence that the judicial murder of four of the Lord's servants had been without effect in preventing the coming amongst them of those, who at the Lord's command were willing to take their lives in their hands, proclaim the truths of his Gospel among the New England professors, and testify against the cruelty of their proceedings. It was proved there as in other places, that the blood of martyrs is the seed of the church, and the Friends took root and multiplied, in spite of the efforts of priests and magistrates.

Only five days after his conviction and sentence, Wenlock and 27 more of his Friends were released from jail. This was in 1661. Soon after a royal order to the New England authorities caused a respite of sufferings—but these were subsequently renewed—and Wenlock Christison, several times after his release from prison, was flogged at the cart tail and expelled from the province. The last of these scenes was in 1665. It is known that Wenlock was in Maryland in 1670, living in Talbot County. From the land records of that county it appears that Peter Sharpe, a wealthy Quaker surgeon and his wife, in the summer of that year, transferred to Wenlock Christison, "in consideration of true affection and brotherly love which we have and bear unto our well beloved brother Wenlock Christison, in Talbot County, and also for other divers good causes and considerations we at this present especially moving, one hundred and fifty acres of land on the south side of St. Michael's River, and known by the name of 'Ending of Controversie.'" There is little doubt that the Quaker physician presented him with this farm because of his sympathy with him in his sufferings and privations. Considerable additions were subsequently made to this tract. The esteem in which he was held by the community is shown by his having been elected Burgess and Delegate to the General Assembly of the Province. It was at his house that the first meeting of Friends in Maryland was held of whose proceedings any official record is preserved. This was about a mile and a half or two miles from the meeting house at Betty's Cove on the St. Michael's River, which was the first meeting house of Friends in Maryland, and where George Fox preached in 1672, as before related. He died about 1679, leaving behind him a widow and some children.

It is evident that in the course of time many meetings were established on the Eastern Shore as well as west of the bay; and that the number of Friends greatly increased. It appears to have become an established custom for the sober people in a circuit of many miles to gather to their places of worship, at the times of holding their annual assemblies, and on other occasions when ministering Friends from a distance were expected to be present; of this we have already seen instances in the great meetings held by George Fox. The people who seldom had the opportunity of listening to a sermon seemed hungry for the sound of the Gospel, and eagerly flocked to listen. William Richardson, of West River, in a letter to George Fox, in 1682, speaking of their Half-yearly Meeting held in the spring of that year, says: "We have had a very great meeting; for number of people never more in Maryland, and very peacable to hear the Truth declared."

A similar custom prevails in parts of Virginia and Carolina to this day; and in the portions of the Western States settled by emigration from those regions. It was a natural result of this custom, in a thinly settled section of country, where there were no large towns, that many persons found these occasions a convenient time to meet with each other for the transaction of business, and that the more thoughtless portion should indulge in horse races, or other sports. So troublesome did these excesses become, that in 1715 Friends complained to the Governor of Councils, and a law was passed prohibiting the erection of a booth for the sale of strong drink within two miles of their meeting houses; or the practice of wrestling, horse racing and other disturbing sports.

The records of the Society show that many of the most eminent ministers in the Society of Friends labored in the peninsula lying east of Chesapeake Bay; and there is no doubt that being impressed with a belief that Friends are suffering great loss in letting the Discipline fall, by passing over, in a superficial manner, marriages accomplished in violation of it, the way opened to set forth the importance of the church government, established in the wisdom and authority of Christ, amongst us. It is only as the members individually live under the subjecting power of the cross of Christ, that they are prepared to support the ark of the testimonies, and administer the discipline as it ought to be; in the same power and wisdom in which it was instituted. 'The righteous holdeth on his way, and he that hath clean hands shall be stronger and stronger.' These are not drawn aside from a firm and straightforward support of the cause of Truth, by a false tenderness towards others, whose eyes have become blinded; and in the faithful discharge of their religious duty, they grow in spiritual strength, and are a blessing to the church. Where a body of such members is preserved, and the discipline is rightly maintained by them, the Society is kept in a healthy and vigorous state. The young members growing up under their example, will receive right views of church government; the motions and openings of Divine Grace in their minds will be confirmed and enforced by the faithfulness of such upright men and women; and thus successors are prepared to receive gifts from the great Head of the church, to be occupied in his service, in their day. What a comfort and strength these are to one another, and to their elders in the Truth. When ministers who keep to their gifts, come among them, they partake of the help of their spirits, and the "spring shut up" is often opened, to the mutual refreshment of the visitors and the visited. How different from those meetings, where a worldly spirit has overspread, and darkened and benumbed the professors of the Christian religion.

"But where the rules of Discipline are let fall, or administered by those who have lost ground, through disobedience to the convictions of Divine Light, and whose hands are thereby weakened, desolation spreads; wrong things prevail; and though something of the form may be left, the power of godliness is lost amongst such a people. The young members, who are at times favored with the visitations of the love of God, are very likely to be turned aside by the evil example of older ones, who seem to be the leaders; and thus such meetings continue to dwindle, until they can no longer be held with reputation. The salt has lost its savor, and men of the world trample it under foot, because they can perceive such are no Quakers in reality. In this way many have become an ill-savor, and caused the way of Truth to be evilly spoken of, to the grief of the sincere-hearted, and the obstruction of the spread of the kingdom of Christ, through us as a people."

A DIVINE MEASURE.—Not only is there a balance of the sanctuary, to weigh in judgment, the things appertaining to God's house, but to each true Israelite is a portion of grace given, and a measure of faith to receive the same. Like the manna in the wilderness, each one gathers according to his capacity; "he that gathers much has nothing over, and that gathers little has no lack." But all these bounties flow from the fulness of the inexhaustible fountain of all goodness, the Lord Jesus Christ, to whom God giveth not the Spirit by measure." (Jno. iii. 34.)

the convincing power and Divine energy which accompanied their preaching were effectual in turning many to the gift of God in their own hearts, and leading them to submit to its restraining, cleansing, and changing power; so that there grew up a body of solid Friends, from among whom the Lord was pleased to raise up serviceable instruments to spread his cause in the earth.

Yet the social condition and surroundings of the people were not very favorable for the training up of the young in that watchfulness and self-denial which conduce to their preservation. Living on large plantations, amid forests abounding in game, and depending for the culture of the land on the labor of slaves, there was a natural tendency to cast off restraint, and to indulge in a roving and idle manner of life which rejected the Cross of Christ.

Job Scott, who travelled extensively in the Southern States in 1789, notes the decline of meetings in many places, and makes the following remarks: "There used to be many valuable Friends belonging to these meetings. We were very clear in our judgment, that Friends having formerly kept such numbers of slaves, did much contribute to the ruin of their posterity; for the poor Negroes were put to do nearly all the work, while the children of Friends were brought up 'in pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness,' riding about for pleasure, living at ease and in fulness. This was productive of many evils, and opened a wide door for unprofitable and pernicious intimacy with hurtful company; until, alas! the youth in some particular places are almost all departed from the way of Truth."

If we really believe that where two or three are gathered together in Christ's name, He is there in the midst of them, actually, though invisibly, present, we ought to feel that to us the place where He is now present in Spirit is more holy than the place where He was in person many hundred years ago; and thus the upper room, the open field, or our own private chamber where God condescends to meet with us, should be to us "none other than the house of God and the gate of heaven." I firmly believe, that if we seek to affect the mind by the aid of architecture, painting, or music, the impression produced by these adjuncts is just so much subtracted from the worship of the unseen Jehovah. If the outward eye is taken up with material splendor, or forms of external beauty, the mind's eye sees but little of "Him who is invisible," the ear that is entranced with the melody of sweet sounds, listens not to the "still, small voice" by which the Lord makes his presence known.—A Visit to my Father-land (in 1843), by Ridley H. Hershell.

The last word we have to say of our service is that we are unprofitable servants"—workers who amount to nothing in proportion to the work to be done. Even when our efforts seem to bear some noteworthy fruit, it is like the exploit of the child who launched the ship. It had stuck upon the greased tramway on its way from the stays to the waters, when he rushed forward to "push a pound," as he afterwards expressed it. And the great forces of inertia which held it back, and of gravitation which impelled it onward, seemed to be so balanced that the push of a child's hand turned the scales, and the ship glided onward to the water. That seems the kind of service we are permitted to do at the best. We "push a pound," and the Divine energy does all the rest

Another of our many eccentric-looking plants, the finger poll, is also used in very dry seasons to feed cattle; the men who go about the country cutting it up being followed by the animals, which are very fond of it, but which, owing to its excessive toughness, are unable to bite it off. It grows close to the ground; its perfect circle of thick short fingers, rather like gigantic asparagus, radiating stiffly from the centre. How the cattle manage to eat it without serious consequences has always been a matter of wonder to me, for the whole plant is filled with a thick, white, milky juice, which when dry becomes like the strongest india-rubber. We often used this juice for mending china, articles of jewelry, and many things which defied caustic, to which, indeed, we found it superior.

One of our plants always reminded me of those French sweets, threaded on a stiff straw, which often form a part of the contents of a bon-bon box. The thick, succulent leaves, shaded green and red, with a frosted, sparkling surface which increases the resemblance to the candied sweets, and all as exactly alike in shape and size as if made in one mould, are threaded like beads at equal distances along the stem, which passes through a little round hole in the very centre of each. They can all be taken off and threaded on again just as they were before.

Close to the ground, and growing from a little round root apparently belonging to the bulbous tribe, you sometimes—though only rarely—see a tiny mass of soft, curling fibres, delicate and unsubstantial-looking as a little green cloud. Even the foliage of asparagus would look coarse and heavy beside this really ethereal little plant, which yet is durable, for I have now with me a specimen which, though gathered five years ago, is still quite unchanged.

The wild tobacco is a common—indeed too common—plant in the Karroo; it has clusters of long, narrow, trumpet-shaped flowers, of a light yellow, its leaves are small, and it resembles the cultivated tobacco neither in appearance nor in usefulness. Indeed it is one of our worst enemies, being poisonous to ostriches, which of course—true to their character—lose no opportunity of eating it. We made deadly war upon it, and whenever during our rides about the farm we came upon a clump of its blue-green bushes, we would make up a little bonfire at the foot of each, and burn it down to the ground. But it is tenacious of life, and its roots go down deep, so its career of evil was only cut short for a time. Besides which, our efforts to keep it under were of little avail while our neighbors, "letting things slide," in true colonial fashion, allowed the plants to run wild on their own land; from whence the seeds were always liable to be washed down to us during "a big rain," when the deep sluits which everywhere intersect the country become, in its every rage, raging torrents, dashing along at express speed.

One more queer plant in conclusion of these slight and very unscientific reminiscences of our flora, which I trust may never meet the eye of any botanist. The kerbosch, or candle-bush, a stunted, thorny plant, if lighted at one end when in the green state, will burn steadily just like a wax candle, and is used as a torch for burning off the thorns of prickly pear, &c.

The dry climate of the Karroo is considered very healthy, especially for those suffering from chest complaints, of this our author says: "No one need die of consumption, however advanced a stage his disease may have attained, if he can but reach Cape Colony and proceed at once inland. He must not stay near the coast; it would be as well—indeed better—for him to have remained in England to die among friends; for in the moist neighborhood of the sea the disease cannot be cured, its progress is simply retarded for a while. But a railway journey of only a few hours lands the patient in the very heart of the Karroo; and once in its dry atmosphere, he may hope—nay expect—not a mere prolongation for a few months of such a life as one too often sees sadly ebbing away in Mediterranean winter resorts, but a return to health and strength."

The long droughts are certainly very trying; indeed they could not possibly be endured by any country less wonderfully fertile than South Africa, where it is calculated that three good days' rain in the year, could we but have this regularly, would be sufficient to meet all the needs of the land. But often, for more than a year, there will be no rain worth mentioning; the dams, or large artificial reservoirs, of which each farm usually possesses several, gradually become dry; and the veldt daily loses more of its verdure, till at last all is one dull, ugly brown, and the whole plain lies parched and burnt up under a sky from which every atom of moisture seems to have departed—a hard, gray, metallic sky, as different as possible from the rich, deep blue canopy which, far away to the north, spreads over lovely Algeria. The stock, with the pathetic tameness of thirst, come from all parts of the farm to congregate close round the house; the inquiring ostriches tapping with their bills on the windows as they look in at you, and the cattle lowing in piteous appeal for water; and you realize very vividly the force of such scriptural expressions as, "the heaven was shut up," or, "a dry and thirsty land where no water is."

Every Karroo house has a dam near it, and on a large farm there are generally three or four more of these reservoirs in different parts of the land. The selection of a suitable site for a dam requires some experience. An embankment is thrown up across a valley, where from the rising ground on either side the water is collected. The ground must be "brack," a peculiar kind of soil which, though loose and friable, is not porous. This brack is often used to cover the flat roofs of the houses; but unless it is well sifted and laid on thickly, dependence can not always be placed on it, as we have several times found to our cost. Rows of willows or mimosas are generally planted along the banks of the dams; and though the moisture which is sucked up by their thirsty roots can ill be afforded, yet in that most treacherous of lands, their bright, fresh green is of immense value; and the poor ugly houses, standing so forlornly on the bare veldt, with but the narrowest and scantiest of gardens—if any—between them and the surrounding desert, seem redeemed from utter dreariness and desolation, and some slight look of home and refinement is imparted by the dam's semicircle of trees. A good-sized dam is sometimes half a mile broad, and, when just filled after a good thunder-shower, is quite an imposing sheet of water. Occasionally, in very heavy thunder-storms, the glorious supplies pour in too lavishly; the embankment, unable to resist the pressure, gives away; and the disappointed farmer, who has ridden up in the hope of feasting his eyes on watery wealth, beholds his treasure flowing uselessly and aimlessly away across the veldt.

Then, too, even the noblest of dams must dry up in a long drought; and that landowner is wise who does not depend solely on this form of water-supply, but who takes the precaution of sinking one or more good wells. This is expensive work—especially when, as in our case, the hard rock has to be blown away by dynamite; a party of navvies, encamped on the farm for weeks, progressing but slowly and laboriously at the rate of about one foot per day. For the payment is £5 a foot; but the advantage is seen during the protracted droughts. Then, on farms which only possess dams, the ostriches and other stock are seen lying dead in all directions, a most melancholy sight. Where there is a well, however, the animals can always be kept alive. The water may go down rather low, and the supply doled out to the thirsty creatures may not be very plentiful; but with careful management no stock need be lost during the longest of droughts. But, even with our good well, we found it necessary to be very economical; and the few small eucalypti and other trees which, with great difficulty, we kept alive near the house, have often for weeks together been obliged to content themselves with the soapy water from the baths; while our poor little patch of kitchen-garden has more than once had to be sacrificed and allowed to dry up—the water necessary for its irrigation being more than we could venture to spare.

In a few days—incredibly few—the effects of a good rain are seen in the appearance of the wells, which rapidly loses its dry, burnt-up look. But, even before the perennial bush had time to recover its succulence and verdure, all the spaces between its isolated tufts are covered with the softest—and most delicate—looking vegetation, which, as if by magic, has sprung suddenly into existence. All these plants, which are of many different kinds, and some of which possess very minute and pretty flowers, are indiscriminately called by the Dutch, opvolg ("that which comes up"); and if you happen at the time of their appearance to have a troop of infant ostriches, there is no better food for the little creatures than this tender, bright-green foliage. They are but short-lived little plants; the hot sun soon drying them up.

ADVERSITY is very often a blessing in disguise, which by detaching us from earth and drawing us towards heaven, gives us, in the assurance of lasting joys, an abundant recompense for the loss of transient ones. "Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth." Many a man in losing his fortune has found himself, and been ruined into salvation; for though God demands the whole heart, which we could not give Him when we shared it with the world, He will never reject the broken one, which we offer Him in our hour of sadness and reverse. Misfortunes are moral bitters, which frequently restore the healthy tone of the mind, after it has been cloyed and sickened by the sweets of prosperity. The spoiled children of the world, like their juvenile namesakes, are generally a source of unhappiness to others, without being happy in themselves.—The Tin Trumpet.

DUELIST.—A moral coward, seeking to hide the pusillanimity of his mind by affecting a corporal courage. Instead of discharging a pistol, the resort of bullies and bravos, the really brave soul will refuse to discharge its duty to God and man, by daring to break the laws of both.—Selected.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Lines Inscribed to Dr. Rothrock.

Accompanied by two ears of yellow field corn which he wished me to bring him, the kind he so much relished when he pulled and boiled them in an old tin can during his boyish rambles in the country.

As the times that are past can return to us never,
We must note what we write on the page of each day,
For that page once turned over is thus, and forever;
For time as a ratchet wheel moves but one way.

Still "who would not welcome that moment's returning,"
When free as the wind e'er mountain or plain,
The vigor of youth in full ardor then burning,
Might make even yellow-corn relished again.

But vain is that thought, nothing here can restore us,
A moment that now and forever is past—
One morning, one noon, and one evening's before us,
To improve or neglect just so long as they last.

This spirit immortal—this elaborate frame,
An emblem of time and eternity combined;
From the hand of an Author immortal it came;
And must be for achievements immortal designed.

Then let us keep pace with the ranks on our way;
Undaunted the standard of virtue we raise;
In wisdom and knowledge and science each day,
March abreast with the times in their rapid career.

For there is no return to the days that are past,
To mourn or repair what never will undo;
The die must now stand as that die has been cast,
Of the shadows of Ahaz our dials have none.

But the shades of the night are approaching us fast,
More swift than the storm-driven shadows they run;
Then let us work on whilst the daylight shall last,
For the night must arrive when no work can be done.

C. S. COPE.

WEST CHESTER, Ninth Mo., 19, 1891.

CREEPING UP THE STAIRS.

BY N. S. McFERRIDGE.

In the softly falling twilight
Of a weary, weary day,
With a quiet step I entered
Where the children were at play;
I was brooding o'er some trouble
Which had met me unawares,
When a little voice came ringing,
"Me is creepin' up the stairs."

Ah, it touched the tenderest heart-strings,
With a breath and force divine,
And such melodies awakened,
As no wording can define:
And I turned to see who was crying,
All forgetful of my cares,
When I saw that little creature
Slowly creeping up the stairs.

Step by step she bravely clambered
On her little hands and knees,
Keeping up a constant chattering,
Like a magpie in the trees,
Till at last she reached the topmost,
When o'er all her world's affairs,
She delighted stood a victor,
After creeping up the stairs.

Fainting heart, behold an image
Of man's brief and struggling life,
Whose best prizes must be captured
With a noble earnest strife;
Onward, upward reaching ever,
Bending to the weight of cares,
Hoping, fearing, still expecting,
We go creeping up the stairs.

On their steps may be no carpet,
By their side may be no rail;
Hands and knees may often pain us,
And the heart may almost fail.
Still above and there is the glory,
Which no sinners can compare,
With its rest and joy for ever,
After creeping up the stairs.

THE PRINCE OF PEACE.

BY JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

"What means this glory round our feet,"
The maged mused, "more bright than morn?"
And voices chanted, clear and sweet,
"To-day the Prince of Peace is born."

"What means that star," the shepherds said,
"That brightens through the rocky glen?"
And angels, answering overhead,
Sung, "Peace on earth, good-will to men."

"'Tis eighteen hundred years and more
'Since those sweet oracles were dumb;
We wait for Him like them of yore;
Alas! He seems so slow to come.

But it was said, in words of gold,
No time or sorrow e'er shall dim,
That little children might be bold,
In perfect trust to come to Him.

All round about our feet shall shine
A light like that the wise men saw,
If we our willing hearts incline
To that sweet Life which is the Law.

So shall we learn to understand
The simple faith of shepherds then,
And kindly clasping hand in hand
Sing, "Peace on earth, good-will to men."

For they who to their childhood cling,
And keep their natures fresh as morn,
Once more shall hear the angels sing,
"To-day the Prince of Peace is born."

Sacerdotalism and Modern Unbelief.

From an article on this subject, written by James Brand, D.D., of Oberlin, Ohio, and published in The Independent, the following paragraphs are extracted:—

Ours is an age of mental unrest. Traditional beliefs are largely disturbed. There are those who feel that religious thought is drifting, as DeQuincey would say, down toward the Botany Bay of the Universe. The alarm, however, is groundless. As the human race cannot change its nature or stop thinking, neither can it drift into permanent infidelity if it would. There is a stubborn sentiment abroad in this world, that what fits man's moral nature and saves him from his sins, is not going to be overthrown either by infidel crowing or Christian weeping. Vast progress is being made in the establishment of Scriptural faith. Christianity is conquering the intellect of man in spite of himself. True science is now theistic. Rationalism is itself one result of the leaven of the Gospel. Agnosticism, the latest phase of unbelief, is a concession.

The drift of this age is away from ecclesiasticism, away from priestcraft, away from all official human mediators, away from sacerdotalism; toward individualism, reason, the rights of the laity, the equality of priest and people, Christian socialism, independent manhood.

Infidel attacks are, to-day, largely against the administration of religion rather than the principles of the Gospel. Of course the old positions of unbelief are not abandoned. There are still individuals doing desperate battle for all exploded theories. For unbelief is buttressed by natural depravity far more than by natural science. But the faith of the really evangelistic Church is stronger and steeper than twenty-five years ago. To men in earnest to save men, Christianity grows more and more invincible. The most striking feature of the Gospel is the imperturbable repose which sits upon its pages.

The words of Jesus rise amid the froth of human thinking like an island of marble above the foam of the sea.

In the secularizing and rationalizing tendency of our times the church has allowed the cardinal doctrine (of the place and the work of the Holy Spirit) to be pushed into the shade. Even practical Methodism is yielding to this general drift and is sorely tempted to worship its statistics and to bow down to its own "net and drag." In England, if we may judge by the late noble utterances of the Bishop of Liverpool, the case is quite as bad. He says that "Myriads of church members throughout the land know nothing of the work of the Holy Spirit in their hearts."

It is plain that the truth needs to be emphasized that Christianity is not simply truth, however reasonable. It is not simply men organized under certain rationally defensible doctrines and aiming to evangelize the world. It is all of these plus the presence and power of the Holy Ghost. Drop out that idea and we concede nearly all that rationalistic infidelity claims.

Still another comparatively neglected truth in vast portions of Christendom is our Saviour's conception of the necessity of the new birth as distinguished from what may be called the magical theory of the sacrament of baptism. Says Bishop Kyle, "Such is the intensity of man's natural tendency to formalism in religion that myriads have always clung to the idea that these two sacraments (Baptism and the Lord's Supper) necessarily confer grace independently of faith in those that receive them." This magical theory of baptism, a sort of holy witchcraft, the hearty acceptance of which, the Council of Trent made a condition of salvation, is accepted not only in the Roman, but in large sections of the Protestant world. Biblical faith cannot prevail till this pestilent feeder of superstition is put away.

The Desert State.

The State of Nevada has no counterpart in the Union. It has the smallest population of any; numbering only 45,761 in 1890, whilst its area is 112,000 square miles, ranking fourth in size in the catalogue of States, and being nearly 21 times larger than Pennsylvania or New York. Its plains are elevated about 4,000 feet above sea level over all its general surface, whilst the mountains rise from 1,000 to 5,000 feet higher; nevertheless it sends no water to the ocean, not being traversed by a single stream which flows beyond its borders, with the exception perhaps that a few small brooks descend from its south-eastern part into the Colorado River, which forms the boundary between this State and Arizona. Nevada is in fact part of a great natural basin, of which the western rim is the Sierra Nevada range, and the Wasatch the eastern. The northern and southern boundaries are likewise hemmed in by mountain elevations which are higher than the interior of the State. The rainfall is affected by this fact, as the surrounding mountain tops rising into regions of perpetual snow, precipitate the vapor from the passing currents of air from all quarters of the compass, and leave them to flow over Nevada bereft of moisture, so that the mean annual deposit of rain and snow at Carson City, on the west side of the State, is only 11.22 inches. What rain and snow do fall within its borders, although forming some considerable streams, as the Carson, Truckee, and Humboldt Rivers, which flow even for scores of miles, finally lodge either in shallow lakes, or sinks into the dry soil and disappears. Many of these lakes evaporate entirely away in the hot season, leaving vast beds of salt. One of these salt beds covers fifty square miles, over which the pure chloride of sodium lies dry and white to a depth varying from six inches to two feet. The deposits of salt are not confined to these beds or plains; it sometimes occurs in elevated positions, the strata often in the aggregate being many feet thick, and imbedded in hills and mounds of such extent as almost to justify their being called mountains. One of these, situated in the extreme south-east corner of the State, covers an area of several thousand acres, the layers being composed of cubical blocks of salt, often a foot square, nearly pure, and as transparent as window glass.

A recent journey over the Union Pacific Railroad through Utah and Nevada, to and from California, impressed the writer with the unique character of the natural scenery of both these divisions of the United States. After passing the great Salt Lake going westward, the traveller enters a region which has received the appellation of "the great American Desert," and it is well deserved. The mountains are in detached groups, rather than continuous ranges; their tops are flat, being composed of strata of rock, mostly level, each stratum a few feet in thickness, and extending down their vertical sides several hundred feet like courses of masonry in the walls of a mighty castle. Below these are buttresses of disintegrated rock and gravel, which have fallen from the tops of the mountains, reared up at an incline against their sides, the whole elevation above the plain being from two to three thousand feet. Here and there, as the eye runs along the summit, a sudden break will be seen in the outline of this crest of fifty or more feet in depth, cut down as square as if by hammer and rule, caused by the disintegration and collapse of the harder stratum. The scenic effect of this is to skirt the line of view with a long rampart, in portions horizontal, then broken with rectangular towers and turrets, and finally the whole elevation ending with a column of rock perpendicular to the plain upon which the railroad runs. The intervening plains are often many miles in width, not absolutely level, but the surface upheaved in conical tumuli of sand, soil and gravel from twenty to fifty feet high.

The mountains are bare and void of every vestige of vegetation for hundreds of miles in extent. The plains are almost equally barren. The sage plant, and cactus, which in their wonderful varieties are conspicuous everywhere else, here dwindle away to mere flat excrescences, perhaps an inch or two high, sparsely tufting the dark soil. No tree or shrub or grass relieves the tired vision. The sun glares from a cloudless sky throughout most of the summer months, and the temperature rises to 100 degrees not seldom. As our train sped over this arid desert, suddenly the horizon became obscured, a brisk gale sprung up, the porter of the Pullman car hurried to close all the windows and ventilators and the air became so filled with dust that all objects were invisible a few yards from the train. The fine sand and alkaline dust penetrated the car and settled on everything, obscuring eye-glasses so much that reading was only practicable by constant wiping, and the whole scene reminded one of the dust storms encountered by travellers on the Sahara.

Occasionally in our journey over this desolate country a line of green vegetation would be seen in the distance: as we neared it the thread of a small water course which issued from the remnants of last winter's snow in the higher mountains, revealed the cause of the verdure. Dwarf cottonwoods and willows grew on its margin;

the railroad company utilized the water for supplying their locomotives, and a dining station, a grove of trees planted around it, with beautiful lawn grass underneath, proved the magic power of moisture and irrigation to transform the desert into an oasis of beauty. Mostly a few of the Piute, Bannock, or Shoshone Indians who are native to these regions would be seen around the stations. A few ranches with cattle and some growing crops would complete the evidences of life, and then in another mile's progress the railroad would again plunge into the desert to run perhaps one hundred miles before the recurrence of human settlements.

The construction of a trans-continental highway over such an uninhabitable domain as lies between the City of Ogden on the Eastern part of Utah and the Sierra Nevada Mountains on the West boundary of Nevada, a distance of six thousand miles, is a work of greater magnitude than can be appreciated unless one personally views the vast physical obstructions that had to be overcome by its pioneers. The very preliminary operation of surveying and locating the line was rendered almost impossible by the simple fact that suitable drinking water could not be obtained for man or beast for distances occupying more than a day's journey; and the advance surveying parties must have incurred imminent risk of perishing from thirst and heat in venturing far from their base of supply.

Nevada owes what little value she has as a habitation for man to the precious metals that have been found within her borders. The renowned Comstock lode or vein of ore, chiefly composed of rich sulphuret of silver with some gold intermixed, is situated in Storey County about twenty-five miles from the Western line of the State and in its north-western portion. It is on the eastern slope of Mt. Davidson, about six thousand feet above sea level, and is about fifty feet in average width by a mile and a half long, and has been excavated in some points to a depth of three thousand feet. It was discovered in 1859, and by the year 1867 it was computed that $66,000,000 of bullion had been taken from it; as appears by the Report of J. Ross Browne, Commissioner, to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, on the Mineral Resources of the States and Territories West of the Rocky Mountains in 1867. This report states that the Comstock lode "equals perhaps any deposit of the precious metals ever encountered in the history of mining enterprise; its productive capacity, as now being developed, surpassing that of the most famous mines of Mexico and Peru."

This wonderful body of ore continued to produce immense quantities of silver for several years after the above report was made; as much as $20,000,000 per annum being taken from it by several companies which worked claims on its entire length. The most perfect and expensive machinery was constructed to facilitate the work; the Suto Tunnel was excavated horizontally from the base of the mountain at a depth of two thousand five hundred feet from the top of the mining shafts, and made to penetrate them in order to drain off the water, at a cost of millions; but alas for human hopes, which in those palmy days predicted that this mass of treasure was inexhaustible; the Report made to the United States Government in 1883 on the Production of Gold and Silver in the Union states, that only one of the forty-five mines on that lode had paid a dividend to its stockholders since the year 1880; and that the assessments made on the stockholders of these forty-five mines during the previous five years to enable the companies to pay working expenses had been $29,367,000, whilst the dividends of profits during the same period had been only $3,732,000. Virginia City, which had grown to a town of 25,000 inhabitants chiefly on account of the business and wealth arising from these industries, has since declined to 7,000 or 8,000. The total value of the silver mined in Nevada in the year 1889 was only $6,206,000, and of gold $3,000,000. The population of the State, which was 62,000 in 1880, was reported by the late Census at 45,761.

These facts serve to indicate the instability of the mining business in the precious metals. It is not peculiar to Nevada, but has been the experience of all the States in this country. California produced $65,000,000 of gold in 1853, in 1889 only $13,000,000. The great cause of such decline in mining profits is that the first results come from superficial deposits of the precious metals which can be cheaply obtained. As the excavations go deeper the labor and cost naturally increase. A productive vein is followed downward, or horizontally for a time and then often lost by reason of the stratum of rock to which it belonged dropping downward or being thrust upward or sideways by the forces of nature, so that much labor is spent in excavating unprofitable material in the search for the broken end. As the depth of the mining shaft increases, water penetrates it in greater volume and must be pumped out to enable the men to work at all. In the Comstock mines the water at the depth of 1,500 feet became so hot as to raise the mercury to 100 degrees and over. This affected the workmen seriously, and compelled a resort to some means for supplying the bottom of the mines with cool fresh air from the summit, which was done, but at a heavy expense. The heat was supposed to be generated by the chemical action of the water on the limestone rock of the mountain. Travel through the mining regions of the Western States gives striking proof of the vast amount of labor spent in digging and removing earth and rock by the immense heaps of such material visible in valley and on mountain sides which in many instances, yielded no profit, and perhaps not any gold or silver at all. Even if the ores do contain a portion of these metals, it must amount to a considerable per centage or it will not leave any profit after transporting it to the smelters and paying the cost of reduction and assaying. So great, indeed, is the expense of producing the precious metals, and so large the proportion of the work done in prospecting and searching for them without any success, that some have asserted that the value of all obtained so far in the United States would not equal the outlay of money involved in the process.

THE 30 ARTICLES OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.—Nerves, we are told, ordered the non-conforming waves of the ocean to be scourged with rods, and confined within certain boundaries: in imitation of which sapient example, our Church has provided a cat-o'-thirty-nine tails to lash back the tide of human thought, and circumscribe the illimitable range of opinion. In both instances the success has not been worthy the attempt.—Tu Trumpet.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Iowa Yearly Meeting—(Conservative).

Assembled this year at West Branch, Cedar County. The company was larger than on any former occasion since reorganization,—quite a number of Friends from distant parts being present. Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, New York, Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Canada were represented. From the two last named places ministers with credentials from their Yearly Meetings were present. Hickory Grove Quarterly Meeting—part of Ohio Yearly Meeting in Iowa—as usual, contributed largely to the attendance.

Epistles were read from all of the five Yearly Meetings with which this body corresponds, and were acknowledged to be of unusual interest as a means of bringing all into touch on the basis of true Christian fellowship, reference being made to the varied and special conditions of each. Glad response was made to all of these tokens of Christian love. As last year, an interesting communication was received from Friends at Pasadena, California, which also had sympathetic acknowledgment.

The state of Society as brought to view by the Answers to the Queries, was a matter of serious concern to most of the company. One of the smaller Quarterly Meetings, which for some time past had been on the decline, was discontinued. It appeared, however, that meetings for worship and discipline were attended by nearly all members, and while shortcomings and some unfaithfulness were manifest, the general feeling was that of hopefulness in regard to the cause of Truth and righteousness among them. A renewed sense of responsibility was felt touching the testimonies of the Society in their relation to the world and to others professing the same faith.

The interest shown at former Yearly Meetings for the religiously guarded education of the youth, has now in some degree developed. The committee appointed last year to have care in the matter, made report that a building suitable for the purpose was erected at a cost of $2700, and that school work had commenced.

As the time for holding this Yearly Meeting and that of Ohio is nearly the same, and so hindering an intercourse very desirable, this Meeting, after serious deliberation, concluded to meet one week later, namely, on Fourth-day, after the first First-day in Tenth Month.

It may be well to mention, that after this decision was come to, information was received that Ohio Yearly Meeting had been engaged in consideration of the same subject, and appointed a committee to act with a similar appointment of Iowa Yearly Meeting, to approach the other fraternal Yearly Meetings, with a view to rearrangement. A committee was appointed.

Christian love and unity was a marked feature of the meeting during all its sittings, which extended over five days, and concluded under a strong sense of privilege, hoping to meet again at North Branch next year. A. C.

EDUCATION.—Rough-hew their purposes how they will, individuals, classes, nations, are all receiving an unconscious education, over which they have little control, from the Divine School-master, who, looking upon the whole human race as his scholars, and generations as his successive classes, is preparing us, by the gradual development of our energies and talents, for that loftier position in the scale of existence, to which man is eventually destined.—The Tu Trumpet.

Natural History, Science, etc.

The Blue Titmouse.—When the blue titmouse has taken possession of a hole, she is not easily induced to quit it, but defends her nest and eggs with great courage and pertinacity, puffing out her feathers, hissing like a snake, and trying to repel the fingers of the intruder. . . . The branch containing the nest may even be sawn off and conveyed to a distance (a cruel experiment), without the mother leaving it, and cases have been known in which, when this has been done, she has still continued to sit on her eggs, hatch them, and rear her brood. With equal persistence will this species year after year, use as a nursery the same hole; and a remarkable instance of this kind is on record. In 1779, according to one account—in 1785, according to another, it is said that a pair of these birds built their nest in a large earthenware bottle which had been left to drain in the branches of a tree in a garden at Oxbridge, in the township of Hartburn, near Stockton-on-Tees, and safely hatched their young. The bottle having been allowed to remain in the same position by the occupiers of the farm, then and still a family of the name of Callendar, was frequented for the same purpose and with a like result, until 1822, when, the tree becoming decayed, the bottle was placed in one near by, and the tenacity continued until 1851. In that year the occupiers of the farm omitted drawing out the old nest, as had been the constant practice before the breeding season, and in consequence the birds chose another place; but in 1852 they returned to the bottle, and have annually built in it, or in a second bottle, which has lately been placed close by it, up to the present year, 1873, with the exception of one season, when a pair of great titmice took possession of their inheritance. The intruders were shot, and the tenacity, it is hoped, will not be again disturbed.

Introduction of the Potato.—The circumnavigator, Francis Drake, has the credit of introducing the potato in Europe, but the Spaniards had brought it with the tomato from the Andes some while before, and it was established there and in Italy, where they called it tartuffol, long before Sir Walter Raleigh shipped his cargo in 1626, from Virginia to England. According to Humboldt it had been cultivated in England since 1684; in Saxony since 1828, and since 1838 in Prussia.

There was much difficulty in introducing the potato into France. It was only toward the end of the reign of Louis XIV that it began to be used. The learned had opposed its introduction systematically, saying it produced leprosy, and the common people refused to test it even on their live stock.

A trick at last established it. Fields were planted all over France with potatoes and carefully guarded till the tubers were ripe, it being given out that these fields were growing a new thing specially for the king, and that trespassers would be prosecuted. Now, the laws at that time were severe. A man might be hung when he hunted in the wild forest, for the game was the seigneur's, almost each one of whom kept his private gallows. Trespass against the king implied, therefore, terrible punishment.

The danger of the punishment proved itself an alluring bait. As the contriver, wise in human nature, had foreseen, the fields that were purposely left unguarded were pillaged right and left, the potatoes eaten, some kept and planted, and the tuber at last effectively introduced in France.

Growth of Catholicism in England.—An article in The Independent, of New York, states, that while there can be no doubt that that Church has grown absolutely to a noteworthy degree, it is equally certain that it has not grown relatively and that its increase in England has not been in proportion to the increase of the country as such, nor does it enjoy that proportion of influence and power which its numerical strength would lead one to expect. The merit of having demonstrated this anew is that of Professor Dr. Baddensieg, of Dresden, the leading Wickliffe specialist of our times and one of the most thorough students of English ecclesiastical affairs in the present century. In a long article in Die Zeit for the 10th of October, he writes in the Freussische Jahrbucher for the current year, he discusses the question in all its details, the characteristic features of the essay being its statistics and the quotations from English Roman Catholic papers in confirmation of his views.

Among the prominent journals of the Roman Catholic Church cited by Dr. Baddensieg is also the Tablet, the official organ of Cardinal Manning. "It is not counting the conversions of immigrants, the annual losses of Anglo-Romanism far exceed the annual gains." A leading contributor to the Catholic periodical, The Month, in 1855, states that in 1841 the Roman Catholic population of England and Wales was 800,000. As the total population from 1841 to 1885 increased from 18,850,000 to 30,540,000, or 62 per cent, the growth of the Roman Catholic contingent ought to have been 496,000; i. e., not counting the conversions of immigrants, the Roman Catholics in 1885 ought to have been 1,296,000. But it is statistically proven that since 1845 over one million Irish Roman Catholics immigrated to England, so that the Catholic population in 1885 at the lowest ought to have been considerably over two million. Instead of this, it was only 1,362,700. As these data and their lesson are from a Catholic author in a leading Catholic journal, no complaint of anti-Catholic interpretation can hold here.

Training to Selfishness.—It is a question worth the asking, whether a child's best interests are not sometimes destroyed by the very means which a parent uses for their defense and preservation. A child's instincts are usually generous, and this very generosity, when joined with the natural impulsiveness of childhood, may lead to acts of indiscretion; but, at the most, these instincts call for regulation only, not suppression. There could be no better means for training a child into habits of selfishness than the custom which some parents have of offsetting every indiscretion to which a child's generosity may be prompted him by some piece of worldly wisdom relative to a proper care for number one, or to the place where clarity begins, or to some other of the principles by which the world justifies its selfishness. There are influences enough around the young which tend to slay their childhood, with its simplicity, its selflessness, and its faith in God and man; its parent should be the first to join with those forces that war against the child's soul. If a child's generosity prompts him, in his childish ignorance, to unwise acts, each him to be generous wisely, but never teach him to suppress his generosity. There is none too much unselfishness in the world; and he who cuts down a single growing blade of that rare plant sows against God, and wrongs universal man. Unwise generosity is not the highest kind of generosity; it is a hundredfold wiser and loftier, that our worldly wisdom which saves its money-bags and crushes out its heart.

War Under Democracy.—In a "Fourth of July War," delivered at Boston, U. S., last month, by Hon. Josiah Quincy, he said: "Even our own recent experience in the United States, has shown that the waging of war under a democratic Government, seems to involve, through the payment of pensions, a new and unforeseen expense of vast proportions, continuing for half a century or more of time, has been established. Our pension roll today is a hundredfold larger and loftier, than that our worldly wisdom which saves its money-bags and crushes out its heart."

any army but that of Russia. To-day pensions and interest on war debt, we are to pay making an annual payment of over 150 million dollars ($20,000,000), for a conflict which closed more than a quarter of a century ago. Expensive as is the conduct of a war under a monarchy, our experience has shown that its cost is greater yet under a democracy."

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 17, 1891.

OHIO YEARLY MEETING.

From several sources we have received information respecting the late Ohio Yearly Meeting, the sessions of which convened at Stillwater, near Barnesville, on Seventh-day, Ninth Month 26th, with a Meeting of Ministers and Elders.

The meetings for worship on First-day were, as usual, largely attended; but the crowd was not so great as sometimes has been the case. The meetings were quiet and orderly. In the morning the nature of Gospel worship was opened to the people; that the time had come when the true worshippers shall worship in spirit and in truth—that now no person and no thing stood between the soul and its Creator—"no ordinance, no law, no priest—for 'he is not a Jew that is one outwardly,' &c. We must spiritually know Christ through the baptism of the Holy Spirit, which is the one saving baptism.

The vocal services in the afternoon were largely in the line of affectionate exhortation—"Come unto Me all ye ends of the earth, and be saved."

The Meeting for Business opened on Second-day morning. The representatives were all present but one. Epistles were read from the five Yearly Meetings which correspond with that of Ohio. Their reading, as an aged Friend in attendance remarks, "was, with little exception, to good satisfaction,—a manifest sense of sober reflection was in a marked degree evident."

On Third-day, Barclay Stratton was re-appointed clerk. The Queries and Answers were read, and much counsel given on the deficiencies noted in the Answers. The reading of the Holy Scriptures was urged on the attention of Friends, and the necessity of making the root good, so that the fruit also might be good.—"Oh, that our soul's breathing may continually be for an increase and growth in the pure seed's life." The number of children of a suitable age to attend school was reported to be 605.

On Fourth-day, a meeting for worship was held, "in which the doctrines of the Gospel, as held by Friends, were preached with power and clearness."

The minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings showed that that body had appointed a committee to prepare a memorial to the United States Senate, urging the ratification of the treaty to exclude liquor from the Congo.

One hundred dollars were appropriated for the use of the Book Committee, and a donation of £10 had been received from England for the same use. Two hundred and fifty dollars were given to the committee to aid primary schools. The Book Committee was encouraged to procure copies of John Wilbur's Journal, for each of the libraries [of Monthly Meetings].

A joint committee was appointed to consider the propriety of changing the time of holding the Yearly Meeting—to report next year. The meeting was "favored to conduct the business in much harmony, and to feel the Divine presence to be near."

An elderly Friend, who attended that Meeting the present year for the first time, writes to us, that the contrast was very apparent between the light and airy conversation at some Yearly Meetings he had before attended, and the sober appearance of the older Friends and the quiet and respectful address, as well as the large number of plainly dressed young and middle-aged men and women at Ohio. It was an encouragement to him to believe "that the principles which we as a Society profess, are yet in a little measure maintained by those who, as coadjutors and fellow-workers with John Wilbur, lifted up a standard against Gurneyism."

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING.—(PROGRESSIVE.)

Having received no definite account of the proceedings of this body, we copy the following points from the Christian Worker:—

1. Western followed Iowa in changing its name from "Society" to "Church."
2. It struck out from the Query addressed to ministers and elders, the following words:—"That the outward rites of water-baptism and the supper, and all other types, shadows and ritualistic ceremonies, in worship, having been fulfilled and ended by [Christ], should not be advocated nor observed by ministers and other official members of the Friends' Church."—As the Christian Worker says: it "ceases to lay its hand upon any one, until he teaches or seeks to lead others into the use of the outward rites." But it appears to leave even its ministers and elders at liberty to sanction these shadowy rites, by their own practice, without rebuke.

3. A full recognition of the system of providing pastors is placed in discipline, and encouragement is given to meetings to avail themselves of the benefits [and evils] of this system."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The War Department has received a report in regard to the recent Indian troubles in the Calispel country, Washington, from which it appears that the Indians are incensed at the white men because of the alleged unlawful seizure of their hay land on the north and east sides of the Pen d'Oreille River. This land has never been acquired by the Government, and the chieftain of the Indians seems convinced that his people are to be driven from their homes by the whites without any compensation. A troop of cavalry was sent to the scene to preserve the peace.

The Ecumenical Methodist Council began its sessions in Washington, D.C., on the 7th inst. This will be the second council of this kind in the history of the Church, the first having been held in London ten years ago. All branches of the Church are represented by nearly five hundred delegates. The council will be confined to discussion. There can be no legislation. No delegate or organization will be bound by what is said or done.

Lieutenant Schwatka, who has been conducting an exploring expedition to the St. Elias Alps and Northern Alaska, reached Victoria on the 8th inst. His party succeeded in breaking through the St. Elias Range, a feat said to have never before been accomplished by man.

It is reported from West Superior, Wisconsin, that the Farmers' Alliance of Minnesota will build a million-bushel elevator at Victor, commencing this fall and having it ready for next season's crop. The elevator will be built by a stock company composed wholly of grain growers. The capital stock, $1,000,000, is to be divided into shares of $10 each.

John G. Otis, the Alliance Congressman elect from the Fourth District of Kansas, has prepared a comprehensive financial bill for presentation to the next Congress. "It provides for pennies and nickels, silver and gold coins, and the free and unlimited coinage of both, and also for $2,000,000,000 of paper money, each bill being absolutely money and not in the form of promise. It provides that the kind of money of the kind mentioned in this section shall be interchangeable with each other at par and a full legal tender for all debts, both public and private." It provides further for three Treasury funds, the general revenue fund, the real estate and revenue fund and the national food and clothing fund.

There are many miles of excellent forest timber in the vicinity of Biglerville, Southern Pennsylvania, which will never be disturbed by forest fires, in consequence of cattle being carried on in connection with forestry. Cattle being allowed to graze under the trees keeps down all underbrush, and when there is no dead underbrush there can be no forest fires.

A dispatch from Napa, California, reports that the heaviest earthquake shock ever felt there was experienced on First-day night. The Masonic Temple and several other buildings were shattered, and much damage was done in drug stores and dwellings. The shock was also felt at Sonoma and at other points.

Deaths in this city last week were reported to number 372, which is 32 more than the previous week, and 50 more than the corresponding week last year. Of the foregoing, 197 were males and 175 females; 62 died of consumption; 35 of diseases of the heart; 19 of cancer; 19 of marasmus; 17 of diphtheria; 17 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 15 of cholera infantum; 14 of old age; 12 of pneumonia; 11 of apoplexy and 10 of apoplexy. Markets, &c.—U. S. 25, 100 a 100; 45, 116 1/2 a 100; currency 65, 111 a 120.

Cotton was quiet but steady on a basis of 91c per pound for middling uplands.

FEED.—Winter bran, in bulk, $17 a $17.75; spring barley, $18 a $18.75.

FLOUR.—Western and Pennsylvania super, $5.60 a $5.85; do. do., extras, $5.90 a $4.25; No. 2 winter family, $4.25 a $4.60; Pennsylvania, roller, straight, $4.50 a $4.85; Western winter, clear, $4.50 a $4.65; do. do., straight, $4.65 a $5.00; winter patent, new, $5.25; do., straight, $5.00; $5.25; do., patent, $5.25 a $5.50; do. do., favorite brands, higher. Rye flour was firmer and ranged from $4.75 a $4.85 per barrel. Buckwheat flour moved slowly at $2 a $2.10 per 100 pounds, as to quality.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, $1.05 a 1.00 1/2.

No. 2 mixed corn, 62 a 63 cts.

No. 2 white oats, 36 a 36 1/2 cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, none here; good, $5 a 5 1/2 cts.; medium, 4 1/2 cts.; fair, 4 a 4 1/2 cts.; common, 4 a 4 1/2 cts.; culls, 3 1/2 a 3 1/2 cts.; Texans, 3 a 4 cts.; fat cows, 2 1/2 cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5 1/2 a 7 cts.; good, 4 a 5 cts.; medium, 4 a 4 1/2 cts.; common, 3 1/2 a 4 cts.; culls, 2 1/2 a 3 cts.; lambs, 4 a 6 1/2 cts.

HOGS.—Good Western, 7 1/2 a 7 cts.; other Western, 7 a 7 1/2 cts.; State hogs, 6 1/2 a 7 cts. Deaths.—William Henry Smith, first Lord of the Treasury, Warden of the Cinque Ports and the Government leader of the British House of Commons, who has been ill for some time past, suddenly suffered a relapse on the morning of the 6th inst., and died the same afternoon.

The death of William Henry Smith, who was universally popular, has excited the most profound regret in Conversative and other circles. He, who was one of the representative business men of England, is $140,000,000.

Charles Stewart Parnell, the great Irish Nationalist, died on the evening of the 6th inst., at Brighton, Eng. His system had been broken down for a long time, and his illness was of about a week's duration. He was buried at Dublin, on the 12th. His death produced a profound sensation throughout the British Empire.

Sir John Pope Hennessy, Member of Parliament for North Kilkenny, deceased the same day, at S. Parnell.

A dispatch from Dublin, dated the 12th inst., says: At midnight the colleagues of Parnell gave out a manifesto announcing their determination to continue the contest with the opponents of Parnell. The manifesto begins by saying: "Ireland was first united, not by the cause of Ireland's freedom remains. We have a duty to the living and the dead. That duty is to maintain erect and unswayed the flag of National independence you, the people of Ireland, gave into the hands of Charles Parnell and his Parliamentary colleagues." The manifesto was signed by eight out of thirty-one Parnell colleagues. It is believed by many that, notwithstanding this manifesto, the Irish party will be reunited.

A dispatch from St. Petersburg announces that the Russian Amir of Transcaucasia, under the command of Prince Tsaltsin, has safely traversed Kishlagh, Yarkand and Karghalich.

The London Standard, usually a very conservative journal, publishes a communication in regard to this so-called aggressive movement of the Russians. The letter is dated from Bombay and the writer points out that the presence of the Russians in the Pamir is tantamount to the annexation of 22,000 square miles of Chinese territory and 10,000 square miles of Afghan territory. More than this, the Russians "have within the last month had the stupendous audacity to order two British officers off the ground belonging to a neutral power." Obviously Russian aggression must be checked, and Lord Salisbury will doubtless ask for explanation, assuming that the facts are correct. But the prophet disdains slow methods of diplomacy.

"The time has come," he says, "long though it has been procrastinated, when the supremacy of England in Asia must be, once and for all, so firmly established that the world which has flowed so steadily eastward throughout the last fifty years may not be checked, but sent sweeping back to the Caspian. We have in Lord Salisbury a Foreign Minister imbued with the highest traits of the national character, bold, brave and just. We have a navy the envy of the world. We have in France, Germany and Russia, some of the finest quality and organization to any that Russia can bring against us, under command of and enthusiastically devoted to one of the ablest generals of the day. We may never hit upon such a fortunate era again."

Attention has been called to the serious diminution of birds in France, and in other parts of the nests. Some injurious species are becoming very rare, while plant parasites are increasing. Cats and dogs are the chief destroyers.

The daily papers of Madrid quote from a recent circular of the Governor General of Cuba that after the lapse of the commercial treaties in Second Month after the "most favored nation clause" will cease to operate. The United States alone will thus reap the advantage of the concessions granted by the special treaty with Spain.

After a long recess the Bundesrath, or legislative body representing the individual States of Germany, reassembled on the 7th inst. The House considered, as the first order of the day, the projected law to repress drunkenness, which, as is well known, is a pet measure of the emperor. The fact that the initiative proposals came from the emperor failed to command the bill to the Bundesrath. A majority of the plenipotentiaries declared their opposition, and would not accept the project in its present form. The member appointed to the Bundesrath by the Bavarian Government intimated that the State he represented desired no such liquor legislation as the bill provided. The bill, ought, he declared, to be withdrawn. The Prussian member, acting under instructions from the emperor, was the only plenipotentiary who defended the measure.

The bill was finally referred to a commission. It is certain that it will appear in the Reichstag transformed from a rade, through attack upon the liquor trade into a mildly beneficent bill for the protection of the public health, and the law, though feeling repressed as regards the adoption of the bill as a sweeping reform, are arranging for the holding of a congress at Stuttgart for the purpose of organizing a political defence of themselves.

The King of Wurtemberg, died at Stuttgart, on the 7th inst.

Advices received in London from various points in Russia state that great masses of peasants are flocking into the towns from the country districts, perishing from the want of food. At least 55,000 have passed through Tuimlen alone seeking food. Many are falling from exhaustion and dying in their tracks. The wanderers have no fuel, and the cold is intense. Incendiarism and pillaging are spreading.

This year's sugar crop in Cuba amounts to 827,000 tons, an increase of 267,000 tons over the product of 1890.

ERRATUM.—On page 73 of Tenth Number of "THE FRIEND," near bottom of third column, for Secundo Month, read First month.

DIED, Twelfth Month 31st, 1890, at the residence of her son-in-law, Abel Roberts, Abington, Pa., HANNAH E. BUCKRIS, in the seventy-eighth year of her age. A beloved member and Overseer of Abington-particular and Abington Monthly Meetings of Friends.

—, after a short illness of typhoid fever, ALBERT H. HAYES, son of Ericson and Harriet H. Hayes, of near West Chester, Penna., on the morning of Tenth Month 3, 1891, in his twenty-seventh year. Though his sufferings were severe, he bore them patiently and without a murmur. He was a devoted son and brother, and to the last was thoughtful for those around him. Near the close he said, "Give all glory to God," and after, "Great God, I suffer affliction with the people. His relatives and friends have the comforting belief that all is peace.

—, at her residence in Moorestown, N. J., Tenth Month 4th, 1891, HANNAH WARRINGTON, a member and minister of Chester Monthly Meeting, New Jersey, in the ninety-ninth year of her age. She was made willing in early life to take up the Cross, and followed a crucifix, but now risen and glorified Lord, choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. Believing herself called to the work of the ministry, she passed through deep baptisms preparatory thereto; feeling her own insufficiency for the work, and that others were more eloquent than she; until the Master was pleased to confer upon her his devoted servant to speak to her state, and assure her, that if she would yield to his requirements she should be brought through, and enabled to sit among princes.

Being made willing to go down into Jordan, the river of judgment; she was enabled to bring up stores of mental, to the service of Him who had called her out of darkness into his marvellous light, that she might tell unto others the unsearchable riches of Christ. She was acknowledged a minister in the Third Month, 1823. She was frequently liberated for service in her own Yearly Meeting, and sometimes in others; and these visits were paid to the peace of her own mind, and the comfort and satisfaction of those among whom her lot was cast. She was a firm and upright pillar in the Church; standing firmly against all innovations from the trials of 1827 to the close of her life. Having filled up her measure of suffering for the body's sake, which is the Church, she was enabled partly to wait and quietly to bide, until He whose right it is to claim his own, was pleased to say, "It is finished;" and to release her spirit from its tenement of clay. "To him that overcometh, will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it."

For "THE FRIEND,"

Selections from the Journal of William Evans.

1841.—"At New Garden, I apprehended it was my place to advert to the conversation, which our Lord gives, as having taken place between the rich man and Abraham; when he solicited him to send one from the dead to his five brethren, that they might not come into the place of torment; and Abraham finally relented to him, 'If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead.' From which it is evident, if man will not embrace the means already appointed for his salvation, no other will be granted; and that while he refuses to comply with the terms of acceptance, he would be likely to reject a miraculous visitation, sent for their reformation. The grace of God appearing in the hearts of all men, was held up as the immediate means; and denying self, taking up the cross daily and following Christ, the terms laid down upon which alone we can hope to partake of that salvation, which He has purchased for all those who obey Him. Christ's incarnation, offerings, death, resurrection, ascension and glorification, wherein he is our propitiation for sin, and our intercessor with the Father, and his inward and spiritual appearance, knocking at the door of the heart for an entrance; his office as the great Baptizer of his people; sitting as a sinner with fire and a fuller with soap, in which He administers the one saving baptism with the Holy Ghost and fire, and prepares the heart as a temple for Him by his Spirit to dwell in, thus setting up his kingdom there, and ruling as Lord, Judge, Lawgiver and King, were treated on and supported by Scripture testimony. The Truth rose into a good degree of dominion, and our ancient friend Nathan Hunt, expressed his satisfaction, saying, 'They were the doctrines he held and believed, and he was opposed to all innovation upon them.'

"At Springfield, a considerable number of friends and others convened; some of whom appear to be a seeking people, and not knowing where to find what they longed for, are wandering from place to place, and from one preacher to another. These were recommended to the gift of Grace in their own hearts; by receiving which they would come to have their eyes opened to see their conditions, and true faith be given them to believe in Christ their Saviour; who would feed them with the bread of life, and open in them the spring of living water; by which their souls would be refreshed and nourished up unto everlasting life. Christ was preached as the Author of this true faith, as the Rock on which the church is built; as the Captain of salvation, who only can arm his soldiers for the spiritual warfare; and who gives them victory over their soul's enemies. No man can come to the Father, but by Him; and it is only as He is revealed in the heart, by the same spirit which revealed Him to Peter, that any can have true and saving faith in Him; by which they lay hold of the offers of his love and mercy, and through the obedience of which, they obtain victory over the world, the flesh and the devil; and persevering to the end, inherit the promises, and are made partakers of that salvation, which He purchased for all those who receive and obey Him. It was a season of Divine regard; wherein I was greatly favored with utterance, and the presentation of many passages of Scripture, to show the nature of the Gospel dispensation, and to confirm the principles of Friends. It was cause of humble gratitude to our Holy Helper, that He was pleased to open the treasury of things, new and old, and qualify to exalt his great name, and call upon the people to come and enlist under the banner of the Prince of peace."

"Attended Marlborough Meeting; in which the state of things was felt to be low. It appeared proper to sound an alarm amongst them, lest they become swallowed up by the world, and lost in a state of indifference to the work of their own salvation, and support of the cause of Christ. The right education of their children, which is often neglected by parents becoming engrossed with schemes of business, was plainly spoken to, and parents solemnly called upon, to give more close and serious attention to the cultivation of the minds of their children, the proper care of their persons, and to subjugating their wills and passions, at an early period of life. They were urged not to withhold from them a suitable share of school instruction; so that they might not be sunk in ignorance, and feel themselves lessened by it. The happiness which resulted to parents and children, where they were joined in walking together in the right way of the Lord; promoting each other's best welfare; far outweighs any pecuniary advantages, arising from entire devotion to the pursuit of business. The toil and watchful care of such pious parents, would generally be amply repaid in old age, by the fruits of it in their offspring. Then would these, under the influence of the power of religion, cherish and console their valued and declining parents; whose joy it would be, to see their sons and daughters established in the Truth, and as upright pillars, supporting the ark of its testimonies."

"At Holly Spring Meeting, the injunction of Christ, 'Take no thought saying, what shall we eat? what shall we drink? or wherewith shall we be clothed?' for after all these things do the Gentiles seek; for your Heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. But seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you,' was treated on. It was shown where this was carefully attended to in early life, and faithfully persevered in, the follower of Christ was preserved from the entanglements and perplexities, which the disobedient often become involved in. While these run into the inordinate pursuit of the world, after they had been visited in early life, and lost the life and greenness which they once had, the dedicated sons and daughters of God, are enabled to keep their worldly concerns in their proper place, and to fulfil their social and religious duties, in the right time and manner. The young people were earnestly pressed to mind the openings of Divine light upon their understanding; and to walk in obedience thereto; that so they might grow in the knowledge of the Truth, and become established in it. The solemnizing power of the Blessed Head was felt among us, and I hoped some of the young ones would be aroused to increased devotion and zeal."

"At Rich Square, there was given me unexpectedly an intimation to stand up with the testimony: 'There is none other name under heaven given amongst men whereby we may be saved,' but the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth. The way was opened to preach Christ Jesus as the only way to the Father, and his spiritual baptism with the Holy Ghost and fire, as the appointed means by which sin and corruption are to be purged out of the heart of man; and he prepared to be made a partaker of the fulness of the blessings of the gospel of Christ; both in what He did and suffered for us, in the prepared body, and the glorious reward at the end of the race; laid up for all those who love and serve Him with sincerity and faithfulness. The current then turned to the exercised remnant in this meeting; who were encouraged to increased dedication in the occupancy of their gifts, and to be willing to be again and again baptized into suffering on their own account, and for the body's sake, the church. The young people were also invited to receive Christ in his visitations to their souls; to take his yoke upon them and learn of Him, that they may be made servants in his house, and qualified to support the doctrines and testimonies given to us to bear. Some of the sincere-hearted were tendered, and manifested their unity, in seeming unwillingness to part from us, as well as by expressing their satisfaction with our company."

"At Newhagan Creek, the duty of silent waiting, and introversion of mind before the Lord, that we may hear and understand the still small voice which speaketh as never man spake, and by obedience thereto, be brought to the knowledge of God and Jesus Christ, whom He hath sent, which is life eternal; was opened and enforced. It was shown that, however valuable the knowledge communicated by the Scriptures, and highly to be prized and cherished, yet this of itself was not sufficient. The saving knowledge of the Father is received by and through the Son; who is the way, the truth and the life, communicated by the operations of his Spirit in the heart. It was a time of renewed favor.

"After dining, we rode to Symond's Creek, where we had the company of nearly all the members of the two meetings last visited. It was satisfactory to have them together; giving the opportunity of entering into feeling with them, in their reduced condition; in which the way was opened to encourage the honest-hearted to keep hold of the shield of faith; whereby they might quench the darts of the enemy, who seeks to discourage and turn aside from the path of duty. The necessity of watching over, and restraining the children from the corruptions which abound in the world, and of Friends coming under religious exercise, that they may be qualified to bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, were pointed out; and the danger of being overwhelmed by the pursuit of business and the love of money, impressed upon some. The Truth rose into dominion, and brought some into tenderness, and they took leave of us in near affection and unity, desiring our preservation every way."

"At Black Water Meeting, in Virginia, I was led to speak to some respecting the feeling which they were brought under, in the midst of their efforts to obtain happiness from worldly enjoyments. That there is at times a longing desire in the soul after substantial food which none of those earthly delights can satisfy. However they may be pursued with avidity, they all fail; leaving the soul empty and destitute; often followed by the convictions of Divine Grace, that the work of salvation is neglected, and these delights are leading their votary in the broad way which must terminate in destruction. Some of this description were earnestly labored with, to arouse them to a sense of their danger, and the necessity of giving heed to the warning voice of the Lord's Holy Spirit while the day of mercy lasts. There were a few exemplary young Friends present, to whom the language of encouragement was extended, to dedicate themselves to the cause of Christ; and taking his yoke upon them, openly confess Him before men. It was a comfort to meet with such, where the Society has become almost extinct."

In seeking a sphere of usefulness, do not look too far away. Closer inspection may discover your field of labor just where you are. God's providence determines your lot, and generally purposes work for you in your immediate surroundings. It is hard for the ambitious and future-scanning to realize this. They want some opening in a distant clime, or in "the good time coming." They are so concerned about the great destiny awaiting them, and so expectant of a certain order of opportunity, that they overlook the work and place of activity near at hand. Too often the agency for their development, and the season for their best exertions, and the place of their life-work are lost through neglect of their present environments.

EVERY young man is speaking by his daily example to every acquaintance of his; and he is winning his fellows to a higher plane of living, or encouraging them to be satisfied with life on a lower plane. Not merely when he rouses himself to active effort in behalf of a companion, but in his ordinary conduct, and in the spirit which he illustrates in all his course, he is influencing individuals, and he must give account of that influence by and by.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Eastern Shore of Chesapeake Bay.

We have already referred to the visit paid to Friends in Maryland by John Burnyeat, George Fox, and their companions, about the year 1678.

William Edmundson mentions in his Journal that about the year 1676 he travelled among Friends on the Eastern Shore of Maryland, "where we had many precious heavenly meetings for the worship of God, and men's and women's meetings to order the affairs of the Church. A blessed time we had together, to our mutual comfort."

After laboring on both sides of the bay, he went southward to Virginia, and his narrative of the journey shows some of the hardships to which travellers in those times were exposed. He says: "As we crossed the mouth of York River, a storm took us, and the wind came against us, so that we were hard put to it to escape the breakers; yet the Lord's eminent hand saved our lives."

"A report went to Friends in Maryland, that we were drowned, but we got to a little creek in a small island, uninhabited, and were forced to stay there three nights; the wind being against us, also the weather foul and stormy, with rain, sleet and snow. We had no shelter but the open skies, and the wet ground to lie on, this augmented my cold and pain, but the Lord bore up my spirit, and enabled me to endure it, as He had done in many other afflictions." When the weather became more favorable they took boat and came, towards morning, to the house of a Friend on Elizabeth River. Here "they took me out of the boat, and led me into the house, for I was not able to go alone, and set me on a chair, but presently my spirit was uneasy and greatly disquieted, being sensible things were wrong in that house." After the people were up in the morning, he admonished them, was helped into his boat and went on.

In 1682 William Penn visited Lord Baltimore, to confer with him on the disputed boundary line between their respective settlements. On this occasion he held an appointed meeting at Choptank. He remarked, in a letter to a friend, that he "had good and eminent service for the Lord," but we have not met with any particulars.

In 1691 Thomas Wilson and James Dickinson visited the meetings in America, and in the course of their travels T. W. says he "had many blessed meetings among Friends on both sides of the bay." Of these but few particulars are preserved; yet we may well believe that they were especially serviceable and comforting, for Thomas Wilson was one eminently qualified and gifted of the Lord, with ability to promote his blessed cause. His friend, James Dickinson, says of him: "I know there was not anything more delightful to my dear companion, than to be under the influence of God's Holy Spirit, wherewith he was often filled. The power of the Lord was wonderfully with him, and made him as a cloud full of rain, carried by the breath of the Almighty, to water the ground."

Thomas Story says that Thomas Wilson "was to me the most able and powerful minister of the Word of Life in the age." He mentions being with him in 1693, at Oxford, "where we had a comfortable open meeting; for though many of the collegians were there, who used to be rude in an extraordinary manner, yet the invisible power of the Word of Life being over them at that time, they were quiet under the testimony thereof, in the authoritative ministry of Thomas Wilson; whose voice was as thunder from the clouds, and with words penetrating as lightning, saying, 'It is the pride, luxury and whoredoms of the Priests now, as in the days of Eli the high priest, which deprive them of the open vision of Heaven.' Upon this many of them were struck with amazement and surprise, and their eyes were filled with tears."

When Thomas and James were about to come to America, it was a time of war between France and England, and, "and," says T. Wilson—"the rumor was, that the French fleet lay about thirty or forty leagues from the Land's End of England, in the way we should pass, which brought a very great concern upon us, with many inward seekings and supplications to the Lord, that if it was his blessed will, He might be pleased to preserve us; and being strong in faith that it was easy with the Lord God to deliver us, we trusted in his holy power. I being in deep travail of soul, had an opening from the Lord, that it was his holy will to deliver us, and we should live to see it, which I believed and was humbly thankful to the Lord, and told my dear companion thereof with great joy. He also told me, that being under a travail of soul, the Lord had showed him that the French fleet would encompass us on both sides, and also behind, and come very near, but the Lord would send a great mist and darkness between us and them, in which we should sail away, and see them no more." All this came to pass as he had foreseen. Of the fleet that left England together, their vessel and two others were all that escaped.

In 1714, the same two Friends again came to this country, and were at the Yearly Meeting at Choptank, on the Eastern Shore of Maryland, "which was very large, many people besides Friends flocking to it from several parts of the country, and the doctrine of Truth was largely opened to them." In 1696 James Dickinson also crossed the ocean and held meetings in Maryland, where he found "great openness in the hearts of many to receive Truth's testimony."

Another faithful laborer in those parts was Thomas Chalkley, a native of London, who afterwards made Philadelphia his home—although much of his time was spent on the ocean in trading voyages to Barbadoes and other West Indian Islands—and in religious visits. In 1698 he found many Friends about the River Choptank. In 1703 he again travelled southward through Maryland into Virginia and North Carolina. He says: "One day, going out of our course through a marsh, I trod on a rattlesnake, which is accounted one of the most poisonous snakes; but it only hissed at me, and did no harm. This was one deliverance, among many, which the Lord, by his providence, wrought for me; and I bless his holy name for all his mercies. We lay two nights in the woods, and I think I never slept better. It was the eighth hour in the evening when I laid down on the ground, one night, my saddle being my pillow, at the root of a tree; and it was four o'clock in the morning when they called me. When I awoke, I thought of Jacob's lodging on his way to Padan Aram, when he saw the holy vision of angels, with the ladder whose top reached to heaven. Very sweet was the love of God to my soul that morning, and the dew of the everlasting hills refreshed me."

Being on the Peninsula in or about the year 1705, Thomas Chalkley had some controversy with a priest named Crawford, who said he would prove them to be no ministers of Christ. "I bid him," says T. C., "prove himself one, and he would do the business." "Well," says he, "how shall we know who are Christ's ministers?" "Why," said I, "art thou willing to be tried by Christ's rule, for he hath given us a plain rule to know them by." "What is that rule? Let us hear it," says he. It is short but full, namely, "By their fruits you shall know them; for men do not gather grapes of thorns or figs of thistles; wherefore by their fruits they are known." "I deny it," says priest Crawford, "that they are known by their fruits." I answered, "then thou deniest the plain and naked truth of Christ. So I called aloud to the people to take notice what a blind guide they had; and indeed he was wicked as well as blind, and his fruits not good. For soon after, news came that he had a wife in England, and as he had another here, his fruits were wicked with a witness." This incident illustrates the truth of the remark, that several ministers of the Church of England, who were tempted to go to Maryland by the bounty given by the legislature, were men of poor character.

Thomas Chalkley adds, "that we got a meeting, called Little Creek Meeting, settled near this place (near the town of Camden in Delaware), and a meeting house built at Duck Creek (a few miles further north). The people in those parts about this time began mightily to see through the formal preaching of such as preach for money."

In 1706 he was again in Maryland, and had "many good meetings" at a house built by Aquila Paca, head sheriff of the county, who lived at the head of Bush River.

In 1725 this indefatigable laborer for the good of souls was at a general meeting in Cecil County, which was "large and quiet." It held several days, and the gospel dispensation was set forth, and the love of God in Christ exalted. From Cecil we went to Chester River, and had a meeting there, at which the people were exhorted to come to Christ, the eternal rock and true foundation, and to build their religion on Him, against whom the gates of hell can never prevail; and they were so much affected, that they did not seem forward to leave the house after the meeting was over. From Chester River we went to Third Haven, to the general meeting of Friends for Maryland, which was very large, some Friends from Pennsylvania and Virginia being there, and many people of other societies. Many testimonies were borne to the work of Christ by His Spirit in the soul, and Friends were earnestly desired to be diligent in reading the Holy Scriptures, and to keep up the practice of our wholesome Discipline; by the neglect of which a door would be open to loose living and undue liberties.

From Third Haven we travelled into the great forest, between the Bays of Chesapeake and Delaware, and had a satisfactory meeting. There was no public house in this place, therefore I told the people of the house I was obliged to them for the use of it; but they tenderly answered, they were more obliged to me for my kind visiting of them; and truly we had a solid, good meeting there; the people being generally poor, they had but little notice taken of them by the money-loving teachers, who preach for hire.

Peculiarities of Friends.

THEIR OBJECTIONS TO CONGREGATIONAL SINGING.

It may be said that instruction is imparted by singing. Children are taught to sing hymns containing important religious truths, which are thereby impressed on their memories, and were they not taught to sing the hymns, they would never learn them at all. But over against this rises the question, Is singing a desirable method of imparting instruction? Viewed simply as a hymn lesson, in a Bible narrative for instance, there seems little to object against singing; but it is impossible to maintain this simple view, except abstractly, for any length of time. Cultivate the taste for what is called sacred music, and sacred songs will be sung, not for any good they may do, nor for the sentiments they express, but for the pleasure the singing affords. After the art of singing has been acquired, it is uncommon for the singer to make nice distinctions between the songs he sings, provided the language be unobjectionable. In sacred song he will sing anything. Begin with a simple narrative or declaration of Scripture, such as is contained in the 1st Psalm or the child's hymn, beginning—"When mothers of Salem their children brought to Jesus," and he will not hesitate to go on and sing any other psalm or hymn in the collection, it matters not whether it be historical or devotional, or whether it express joy or repentance, want or fulness, a sense of sin and shortcoming, or a sense of holiness and satisfaction. It may be the 23d Psalm, or it may be the 42d, and as a rule, it depends on the tunes to which they are sung, and not on the condition of heart which they express, which of them it shall be.

In this expression of unexperienced emotion lies one of the main objections of Friends to congregational singing. The congregation is called upon to sing the Psalmist's experiences while strangers to his condition of soul. Indeed, in a large number of cases, it is not the spiritual condition of the congregation that is taken into consideration at all, but the subject of the preacher's discourse, the psalms or hymns being chosen according to their fitness to illustrate the sermon.

I have never heard it pleaded that congregational singing in meetings for worship was observed for any other purpose than that of praising God. Yet that more than any other is the purpose which congregational singing as presently conducted does not and cannot serve. On the contrary, instead of being a means of uttering praise, the conclusion cannot be avoided, that it is more often a means of uttering what is not true in pretence of praise. How inconsistent it is with the views of Friends, how much at variance with the principle of Truth, may be estimated by a consideration of the following circumstances:—It presupposes a form of words prearranged and set to a tune. It presupposes also that, on being called upon, the congregation can and will immediately unite in spirit with the sentiment of the song and join heartily in singing it. It presupposes, almost invariably, further, that the leader of the meeting may select any psalm or hymn in the collection, and as many or as few of them as he pleases, and call upon the congregation to sing them. If they respond, they will thereby praise God; if they do not, they will render themselves liable to the charge of declining to praise God!

Perhaps no one who has been brought up in a religious denomination outside of the Society of Friends can have failed to observe this, and also to have had brought home again and again to his mind the fact that congregational singing was simply a pleasant mode of filling up time, and, although prefaced by the formula, "Let us praise God by singing," or "Let us worship God by singing to his praise," etc., the song was sung as a matter of course, irrespective altogether of its subject or its sentiment, and very often, especially during the hymn before the sermon, the minister himself did not join in it, but while the congregation was so occupied, busied himself in preparing for his discourse.

If congregational singing be right, it cannot be wrong to have it of the best quality. This depends not on the preparation of the heart, but on the training of the voice. We hear of many complaints regarding religious meetings, that the singing is poor, wretched, disgraceful, never in tune, etc., and of as many attempts to remedy such a state of matters. First, a conductor is appointed; then a choir; choir practice follows, and afterwards an instrument is provided in order to furnish a suitable musical accompaniment. In some cases the singers are hired for their services, and paid according to their ability to sing, and in almost every case the slow-going psalms are superseded, and more enlivening hymns take their place.

All this has been witnessed in the Presbyterian churches of Scotland within very recent memory. Even still in many country districts the hymn book is to a large extent unknown, and in our cities an occasional meeting is to be found where hymns are not permitted to be sung, they being regarded as "human inventions," and where the congregational singing is restricted to psalms and paraphrases of Scripture; while as for musical instruments in these congregations, the thought of them could not be endured; but it seems as if the innovation is spreading so fast that in a comparatively short time most of the congregations of all the Presbyterian denominations in Scotland will have musical instruments employed in their meetings. In cities the beginning has commonly been made by introducing an organ or harmonium into the mission meeting held in the hall connected with their regular place of worship. After it is here the congregation get accustomed to it, and most of them learn to like it, and then it becomes an easy matter to get it transferred to the regular service.

Is there not a similar movement going on among Friends? Singing has been introduced into many of our mission meetings. Instrumental music has been introduced also. But there is this difference between Friends and Presbyterians: In the case of the latter there have been but an enlargement and elaboration, and, in some respects, a perfecting of the system of praise which had previously obtained among them; whereas in the case of Friends, the foundation on which according to their profession, all true worship and praise are based, is subverted, and another, which they have hitherto borne a testimony against, is laid in its place.

ENDOWMENTS.—Church.—See Poison; but do not see the Bible. An old tradition bears, that when Constantine, the emperor, first endowed the Church, a voice was heard from heaven, crying out, "This day is poison poured into her!" Whatever may be thought of the tradition, no one can doubt the fulfillment of the prophecy. Wherever Religion has been the mother of Wealth, the daughter has invariably devoured the parent.—Selected.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"
THE MIGRATION OF THE BIRDS.

BY C. S. COPE.

O! sweetest song 'twixt heaven and earth,
The firewell of the feathered choir,
It gives the holiest feelings birth,
That can my inmost soul inspire.
I hear you chant the solemn stave,
And feel your song inspire my theme,
As balanced on the ether wave,
Or lasking in the solar beam,
It bids me hope, if heavenly care
Is thus ordained by high decree,
That I may justly claim a share
In that Divine economy:
One instance 'mid the countless host
That tells me of omnipotence,
And bids me more devoutly trust
His overruling providence.

These myriads in flocks congregating on high
The summer's sad requiem sing;
And are taking their leave for a sunnier sky
To await the return of the spring.
They feel in their hearts, from the finger of God,
The approach of this season of strife;
Unmistaken they turn from this stormy abode
To a smiling volume of life.
The wild howling tempest is at its raging past
Can give them no cause for alarm,
Through the broad fields of ether they ride the rude blast
And sport with the lingering storm.
From the home in the hills 'mid the snows of the north,
For the ravage of winter is there,
From the crags of the cliffs where her brood is brought forth,
Sweeps the freebooter pirate of air.

Now hovering low at the face of the earth,
Now perching on some moss-covered spray,
Or swooping afar as an arrow of wrath
A sure missile of death to her prey.
These lofty migrating triangular flocks
With their patriarch leader in the van,
Bred high 'mid the desolate icebergs and rocks
Beyond the adventures of man,
Behring, Hudson and Barrow strove hard in their day
To be where your fathers have been;
Kane, Franklin and Hayes gave the prime of their days
To see what you often have seen.
The snow from these hills, and the ice from these shores,
The sun of no summer can clear
Since the poles have been set as they now are inclined
To the plane of our orbit, they're there.

The poor little snow-breasted bird of the north
Has left his Canadian home,
Preparing to take up his boarding with us
When the storms of the winter shall come.
The woodpecker now with his ivory beak,
No milder more busy than he,
Is driving the forest nuts into the cracks
Of some desolate time shattered tree.
All the different tribes of the swallows and martins
Have reared up their broods and away,
They bathed in our streams, skimmed our valleys and mountains,
Through the heat of a bright summer's day.
In the wild windy days, in the rains of the autumn,
Ere the frost of the season begin
The cat-bird and thrush their long journey have taken
With a gay polyglott, their kin.
The bluejay stays late with his quarry-tool note,
As if drilling away at a stone,
But he leaves us at last ere the terry-blast
From the rocks of the mountain is blown.
Bobolink and the plover, curlew and killdeer
With others one thousand and one,
Have taken an out for the woe-ber pewee
Now chirps to a vertical sun.
For instant as true as a gun to her charge
Will protect all her subjects from harm,
Scarcely one of the far-scattered myriads at large
Is left in the rear of the storm.
Through our fields and our meadows, our orchards and groves

That so late rang vociferous in song,
Soon no chirp can be heard, not the voice of a bird
Our hills and our valleys among.

Still we trust in the One that has ordered their flight
And by his decree we can learn
That seed-time and harvest, the cold and the heat,
And the birds of the spring shall return.

WEST CHESTER, Tenth Month 2, 1891.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

INVOCATION.

O, Thou whose power is greater than man knows, Whose love, though strong and pure, is sweet and mild,
To Thee my heart in supplication flows,
O Lord, have pity on Thy erring child.
I know Thy love is like a golden chain
To bind our human hearts to heaven and Thee,
To win us from a world of sordid gain
To dwell in mansions blest, from sorrow free.

O, take away my heart, so cold and proud,
And give me one as white as driven snow,
To see Thy lying to earth's darkest cloud,
And trace Thy hand in all things here below.

To give to Thee the praise; to whom alone
Our thanks are due; to live in Thy great light,
And offer all that I have called my own
If it will help one soul to robes of white.

To help the world from sorrow, sin and pain,
To live in true light of holiness,
That we may barter all for heavenly gain,
And know "salvation from our selfishness."

The life without—the type of that within—
Is but a fleeting show of earthly things;
What is it if it do not turn from sin,
And live our lives unto the King of kings.

Teach me to pray not for myself, but those,
Now over all the world, whom Thou dost love;
That, where the light of love forever flows,
They may be gathered home in heaven above.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

TEACHING.

How can we teach of that light Divine
When the soul is dark and blind?
How can we tell of that wondrous love
Without its power within?

'Tis useless to offer to others
A balm for a wounded heart,
Unless we have tested its virtue
And tried it in every part.

We never can lead another
A path we have not trod,
And how can we win to the Saviour
If we do not know our God.

Oh, vain is our every effort,
We shall both fail together still,
'Tis like a beautiful structure
With no corner-stone at all.

However fair the profession
'Tis sadly a power for ill,
Unless life's daily record
Shows forth the Father's will.

'Tis true that the blessed teaching
Of a godly life can't die,
Is a sermon that reaches farther
Than aught the lips can say.

DEAD, BUT ALIVE.—As an old minister was trying to comfort a doubting Christian woman, who was in deep despondency, she cried out, "Oh, I'm dead, dead, twice dead, and plucked up by the roots!" He replied, "Sitting in my study the other day, I heard a scream, 'Johnny's fallen into the well!' Before I could reach the spot, I heard the mournful cry, 'Poor little Johnny's dead—poor little Johnny's dead!'
Bending over the curb, I called out, 'John, are you dead?' 'Yes, grandfather,' he replied, 'I'm dead.' I was glad," said the old man, "TO HEAR IT FROM HIS OWN MOUTH!"—Selected.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"
Home Life on an Ostrich Farm.

During the first two years the sex of the ostrich cannot be distinguished, the plumage of all being a dingy drab mixed with black; the latter hue then begins to predominate more and more in the male bird with each successive moulting, until at length no drab feathers are left. At five years the bird has attained maturity; the plumage of the male is then of beautiful glossy black, and that of the female of a soft gray, both having white wings and tails. In each wing there are twenty-four long white feathers, which, when the wing is spread out, hang gracefully round the bird like a lovely deep fringe—just as I have sometimes in Brazilian fringes, seen fringes of large and delicate fern-fronds hanging, high overhead, from the branches of some giant tree.

The ostrich's body is literally "a bag of bones," and the enormously developed thighs, which are the only fleshy part of the bird, are quite bare, their coarse skin being of a peculiarly ugly blue-gray color. The little flat head, much too small for the huge body, is also bald, with the exception of a few stiff bristles and scanty tufts of down; such as also redeem the neck from absolute bareness. During the breeding season the bill of the male bird, and the large scales on the fore-part of his legs, assume a beautiful deep rose-color, looking just as if they were made of the finest pink coral; in some cases the skin of the head and neck also becomes red at that time.

On a large farm, when plucking is contemplated, it is anything but an easy matter to collect the birds—the gathering together of ours was generally a work of three days. Men have to be sent out in all directions to drive the birds up, by twos and threes, from the far-off spots to which they have wandered; little troops are gradually brought together, and collected, first in a large enclosure, then in a small one, the plucking-kraal, in which they are crowded together so closely, that the most savage bird has no room to make himself disagreeable.

Besides the gate through which the ostriches are driven into the kraal, there is an outlet at the opposite end, through the "plucking-box." This latter is a most useful invention, saving much time and trouble. It is a very solid wooden box, in which, though there is just room for an ostrich to stand, he cannot possibly turn round; nor can he kick, the sides of the box being too high. At each end there is a stout door; one opening inside, the other outside the kraal. Each bird in succession is dragged up to the first door, and, after more or less of a scuffle, is pushed in and the door slammed behind him. Then the two operators, standing one on each side of the box, have him completely in their power; and with a few rapid snips of their shears his splendid wings are soon denuded of their long white plumes. These, to prevent their tips from being spoilt, are always cut before the quills are ripe. The stumps of the latter are allowed to remain some two or three months longer, until they are so ripe that they can be pulled out—generally by the teeth of the Kaffirs—without hurting the bird. It is necessary to pull them; the feathers, which by their weight would have caused the stumps to fall out naturally at the right time, being gone. The tails, and the glossy black feathers on the bodies of the birds, having small quills, are not cut, but pulled out; this, everyone says, does not hurt the birds, but there is an unpleasant tearing sound about the operation, and I think it must make their eyes water.

After a plucking, would come several very busy days of sorting and tying up the feathers in readiness for the market; for T——, whenever he could spare the time, preferred doing this work himself to employing the professional sorters in Port Elizabeth, who charge exorbitantly. During these few days everything had to give way to feathers, large piled-up masses of which crowded the rooms, till we seemed to be over head and ears in feathers. Feathers covered the floor and invaded every article of furniture, especially monopolizing the dining-table; and when, at all sorts of irregular hours, we grudgingly allowed ourselves time for rough, impromptu meals of cold or tinned meat, we picked among feathers. It was useless to attempt keeping the rooms either tidy or clean while sorting was going on; and we resigned ourselves to living for those two or three days in a state at which owners of neat English homes would shudder—indeed, those only who have seen the process of sorting can form any idea of the untidiness, the dust, the fluffs, and the sneezing.

If an ostrich-feather is held upright, its beautiful form—graceful as the frond-like branch of the cocoon palm, which it somewhat resembles—is at once seen to be perfectly even and equal on both sides, its stem dividing it exactly in the centre; whereas the stems of other feathers are all more or less on one side. The ancient Egyptians, observant of this—as of everything in nature—chose the ostrich-feather as the sacred emblem of truth and justice, setting it upon the head of Thmei, goddess of truth.

After a good rain, ostriches soon begin to make nests; the males become very savage, and their note of defiance—brooming, as it is called by the Dutch—is heard in all directions. The bird inflates his neck in a cobra-like fashion, and gives utterance to three deep roars; the two first short, the third very prolonged. Lion hunters all agree in asserting that the roar of the king of beasts and that of the most foolish of birds are identical in sound; with this difference only, that the latter, when near, resembles the former very far away. T——, when hunting in the interior, has often been deceived by the sound—expecting a lion, and finding only an ostrich.

When the birds are savage—qui, as the Dutch call it—they become very aggressive, and it is impossible to walk about the camps unless armed with a weapon of defence called a "tackey." This is simply a long and stout branch of mimosa, with the thorns all left on at the end. It seems but a feeble protection against a foe who, with one stroke of his immensely powerful leg, can easily kill a man; the kick, no less violent than that of a horse, being rendered infinitely more dangerous by the formidable claw with which the foot is armed. Those, however, who are well practised in the use of the tackey are able, with the coolness of Spanish bull-fighters, to stand and await the charge of the terrible assailant. They allow him to come to what, to the inexperienced eye, seems unpleasantly close quarters; then, just as he prepares to strike, the tackey is boldly thrust into his face. The thorns oblige him to close his eyes, and he can only run blindly forward; the bearer of the tackey springing on one side, and gaining time to proceed some distance on his way, before the silly bird has recovered from his bewilderment and makes a fresh charge, when the weapon is again presented.

Fortunately, you are never assailed by more than one ostrich at a time; for in the large camps of some two thousand acres each—in which the birds are not fenced off in pairs, but live almost in the freedom of wild creatures—each one has his own domain, separated from those of others by some imaginary boundary-line of his own, visible only to himself, but as clearly marked out as the beat of a London policeman. There, in company with one or perhaps two hens, he dwells monarch of all he surveys; any other ostrich daring to invade his territory is at once attacked; and the human intruder is closely followed, his tackey in constant requisition, until the feathered lord of the land has seen him safely off the premises. Immediately after thus speeding the parting guest, the most savage bird is quite harmless; he dismisses you from his thoughts, and walks quietly back, feeding as he goes. And in the distance you see the head and long neck of his neighbor, whose kingdom you have now entered, and whose sharp eyes spied you out the instant your foot crossed his frontier. He now advances towards you with jerky, spasmodic movements, as if he were bowing you a welcome; this, however, is far from his thoughts, and after sitting down once or twice to give you his challenge—whereby he hopes you will be intimidated—he trots up defiantly, and the tackey's services are again required. Thus, during a morning's walk through the camps, you may be escorted in succession by four or five vicious birds, all determined to have your life if possible, yet held completely in check by a few mimosa thorns.

When an ostrich challenges he sits down; and flapping each broad wing alternately, inflates his neck, and throws his head back, rolling it from side to side, and with each roll striking the back of his head against his bony body with so sharp and resounding a blow that a severe headache seems likely to be the result.

A person on horse-back is even more obnoxious to the ostriches than a pedestrian; and a ride through the camps enables one to realize how true to life is the description, in the Book of Job, of a vicious bird: "What time she lifteth herself up on high, she scorneth the horse and his rider." The creature, when preparing for an attack, draws itself up, stands on tiptoe, stretches its neck to the full extent, and really seems to gain several feet in height. And, indeed, it does its best to knock you off your horse.

As the new arrival in a country subject to earthquakes begins by thinking very lightly of these disturbances, but finds his appreciation of their importance increase with every successive shock; so the new chum in South Africa, inclined at first to look with contempt on the precautions taken against savage ostriches, learns in time to have a proper respect for the foolish, innocent-looking creatures, whose soft, dark-brown eyes look at him so mildly (when he is on the right side of the fence) that he finds it impossible to believe the stories told him of their wickedness, and nothing but a closer acquaintance can undeceive him. On one of the farms a sturdy new-comer, six feet in height, starting for an early morning walk, was cautioned against going into a certain camp where the ostriches were dangerous. He laughed at his friends' advice, told them he was "not afraid of a dicey-bird!" and—disclaiming the proffered tackey—started off straightway in the forbidden direction. He did not return home to dinner; a search was made for him; and eventually he was found, perched up on a high iron-stone boulder; just out of reach of a large ostrich, which was doing sentry, walking up and down, and keeping a vicious eye on him. There he had sat for hours, nearly roasted alive (iron-stone boulders in the Karroo can get so hot in the sun that it blisters your hand to touch them); and there he would have had to sit till sundown, had not the timely appearance of his friends relieved him of the too-pressing attentions of the "dicey-bird."

Another gentleman had a theory that any creature, however savage, could be subdued—"quelled," as he said—by the human eye. One day he tried to quell one of his own ostriches; with the result that he was presently found by T—— in a very pitiable predicament, lying flat on the ground; while the subject of his experiment jumped up and down on him, occasionally varying the treatment by sitting on him.

Hints on Education Addressed to Parents.

A four-page Tract with the above title, published by the Tract Association of Friends, is now ready for distribution. Feeling the importance of the subject, the essay as originally prepared, was submitted to several parents and teachers, whose experience with children was felt to be valuable and practical, and their suggestions were made use of. The result is commended to the attention of all who are willing to circulate the Tract where it is needed; and truly this field of service is a wide one.

The importance of the best early training of children, is one that it is difficult for us fully to realize. Impressions made in infancy, and the influence of surroundings at that period of their lives, are seldom if ever wholly eradicated. This brings to mind the remark of a Roman Catholic, to the effect that, if he had the entire charge of a child up to its ninth year, he would not be afraid that future events would take it away from his church.

The prosperity of our beloved country is dependent upon the purity and true patriotism of the coming generation. And the purity and patriotism of the children is largely dependent upon the atmosphere, moral and religious, of their homes. For as the essay truthfully says: "Above everything else, those who have the care of children should set a good example. They should strive to be themselves what they would wish those to be who look to them for guidance. * * * The influence of a truly Christian example cannot be measured."

I was recently witness to the following occurrence: A little boy in short dresses, between three and four years old, came up to his mother and asked her for a cigarette. She refused to give him one, telling him he was too young to smoke; whereupon he went into a paroxysm of passion, and ran out of the house. Not unlikely he was pacified with the thing he wanted, after I had left; for my impression is that he was refused because of my presence. It is not difficult to picture to ourselves the probabilities of that boy's career. Since the incident occurred, I have been informed that an older child of the same family has been arrested by the police.

Are there not readers of this paper who know of individuals and families, where the "Hints on Education" may have a place? It ought to have an annual circulation of thousands of copies.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Night.

We are expressly told by the Lord, "My spirit shall not always strive with man." This should be a solemn warning not to resist the precious visitations of his grace, and an inducement to close in with the offer of his mercy while vouchsafed, not to do as Felix, who reasoned with of temperance, righteousness and judgments to come, tremble; but answer, "Go thy way for this time, when I have a convenient season I will call for thee." We are not told that this season ever came to him, and we know not that it ever will to us.

Esau found no place of repentance though he sought it carefully with tears.

Many bolster themselves up in the pseudo-belief of a future state of probation. "Give me ten thousand thousand years of punishment, if you please, after death, but it will not be forever," remarked my next door neighbor to me; "there will be an end to it and happiness be mine."

It is said by high authority, "The wicked shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal." Even according to the creed of my neighbor, how infinitely wiser it would be to heed the admonitions of Truth, obey and walk in the Light, and be a child of God—ready to wing our flight to Him when the silver cord is loosed, or golden bowl broken, the brittle thread of life slowly unwooled, or suddenly snapped, than to exist hereafter "ten thousand thousand years," or even one hour in punishment, alienation from heavenly harmony and love.

Believing as I do, that my neighbor was in error, how much better it would be for us, "to choose this day whom we will serve, remembering, 'It is for you Oh! house of Israel to choose the good and reject the evil.'" The latter we cannot pursue with impunity. "Every transgression of disobedience receives its just recompense of reward."

"Work while it is day for the night cometh wherein no man can work." Dark indeed is the night in that soul from which the Lord has withdrawn his Light—the grace of his holy Spirit—the true Light that enlighteneth every one.

Ah! there are eclipses of the sun and moon, but nothing comparable to the darkness in the hearts of that person who suffers self to intervene and cut off from the Light, who turns his back to it and falls into his own shadow, attempting to walk therein.

"It is a fearful thing," for those who have gone counter to the law, which is perfect, and the counsel which the Author thereof giveth—"to fall into the hands of the living God." We are to strive against sin in every presentation. If yielded to, it becomes master, and impels its followers onward.

Some years ago there was a small vessel found out at sea with only one aboard. He had murdered the rest. Conversing, he said, "we did this and that." When asked "why he said 'we,'" as he was the sole perpetrator of the crime?" "No," was his response, "Satan was with me and helped." Yes, he lures to evil till he has his prey captive to his will, then he leaves them to pay their own penalty—the reverse of a guilty conscience.

A noted murderer who had taken the lives of a family near Philadelphia, was asked "How he could do it, especially of the little child?" His melancholy reply was, "After he had slain the first, he could do any thing."

Beware of the first wrong step, the next is oft easier, and the poor beguiled soul is lured on to the pit of destruction where hope and happiness never come. "As death leases, so judgment finds." "As the tree falls, so it lieth." No coming back to do what we have left undone, or to undo what has been done amiss. It behooves us all to "work while it is day, for the night cometh wherein no man can work."

WINONA.

A Glimpse of the Old Dominion.

BY A. ROBINSON, D.D.

R. T. M.—was the son of a Methodist preacher of Kentucky, known for his unflinching fidelity to his convictions and his independent habit of doing his own thinking. R. T. was like his father. At the age of nineteen he was teaching school. One evening a slave, owned by their nearest neighbor, a warm friend of his father, came to him and said: "Massa Robert, I want to learn to read and write, and I want you to help me."

"But, Adam," said Robert, "you know it is contrary to law, and liable to be visited with a heavy penalty to teach a slave to read."

"I know dat, but wha's de harm? I just wants to learn to read de Bible."

"Yes, but the law makes no exceptions; but, Adam, I don't believe the law is right, I have no respect for it, and on one condition I'll agree to teach you to read and write, if you have the patience to learn."

"What's dat condition, Massa Robert?"

"It is that you will never write a pass for yourself or any one else to be out after nine o'clock at night."

"All right, sah; I'll never do it."

Accordingly, night after night, the slave followed the directions of the young school-teacher, fashioning pot-books after his copy, and laboring through his ab, abs, until, as the reward of his patient toil, he could write fairly well and read the Bible. But such a flagrant crime could not go unpunished. The alert prosecuting-attorney got hold of the facts, and the case of Robert was presented to the grand jury and witnesses summoned. Robert, learning of what was brewing, mounted his horse and rode to the county seat, and went to the hotel and put up his horse, and got his dinner, and there met the foreman of the jury, who was a warm friend of his father and the owner of Adam. As he came up to him he said:

"Hello, Bob, what are you doing here?"

"I came to court."

"Who are you courting?"

"Nobody."

"But what are you here for?" he continued, uneasily.

"Well, sir, I understand I'm indicted before the grand jury for teaching your slave, Adam, to read and write, and I propose to go before them and give all the facts. If this State will send a man to jail for such a thing as that, I'm their man."

"See here, Bob, get on your horse and go home."

"No, sir; I shall do nothing of the kind. I propose to see the bottom of this business."

The foreman turned away, greatly perplexed, for he had no idea of allowing the son of his friend and neighbor to be subjected to any penalty for what he had done. When the jury convened after dinner, the first case brought forward by the prosecutor was Robert's, and a witness was put on the stand who told all he knew. At this juncture the foreman, though it was wholly irregular, said:

"Gentlemen of the jury, and Mr. prosecutor, I know all about this case. The young man is the son of my friend and neighbor, and he is here, and proposes to come before you and plead guilty to all that is charged in this indictment. This slave is mine, and the facts connected with it pertain to nobody's business but my own. Now I want this case colled or withdrawn, right here."

Such was his influence, that the prosecutor promptly did as he was requested to do, and Robert quietly returned home the same evening.

Years and years afterward, when slavery had long become a thing of the past, Robert met a slave of long ago on the street in the city where he was residing. The man recognized the benefactor of his boyhood at once, and made himself known by calling up the facts we have given.

"What are you doing here?" said Robert.

"I am here to preach," said Adam.

"You a preacher? I should like to hear you."

"I would like to have you to hear me to-night, at the little brick church on — street."

"I'll be there," said Robert.

At the time appointed, a large congregation, Robert among them, listened to the melting story of the cross. In concluding his sermon, the preacher gave the facts about his learning to read and write; and said: "And now, friends, the man is here who taught me, and I want you to know him."

At the close of the service, the congregation gave an ovation to this modest man, who as a boy, dared to do right because it was right. And so he does yet. What a delightful commentary upon the promise: "Cast thy bread upon the waters, and thou shalt find it after many days."—Christian Advocate.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

John H. Vincent, Chancellor of Chautauque University, in his paper to the "The Forum,"

"HOW I WAS EDUCATED," says:

The chief value of my almost continuous school-life as a student for the first fifteen years, and of my school-life as a teacher for nearly four years that followed, lay in my home life and its rare opportunities. My father was a reader, and had a small but valuable library which he required his children to use. He had given much attention to the matter of correct pronunciation and expression, and made a point of holding his children to the use of good English. All mispronunciations and all "bad grammar" which he detected were condemned, and we, the children, were not only allowed but encouraged to call attention to whatever we thought improper in the speech of each other, and of father himself. To this habit of parental carefulness I owe more for what little knowledge of English I have than to all my teachers and text books put together. Living for several years in a community where the worst provincialisms prevailed, I was kept to a great degree from falling into habits which it would have been hard in the after-years to correct.

The religious element was an important factor in my early training. My father was a strict disciplinarian and a firm Christian believer. Family prayer twice a day was the invariable rule. The first-day of the week was a day of public and domestic worship, and careful searchings of heart. The work of the weekday in school, in business, and in recreation was then brought to a rigid, religious test. In all this there was no harshness or severity; it was simply placing emphasis upon the greatest reality of human life. My mother was an incarnation of consistency, fidelity, self-sacrifice, and generosity. I never heard her speak one harsh or foolish word. She believed with her whole soul in the truths of religion as taught by Jesus of Nazareth, and her daily life was controlled by her faith. Therefore I could never think of education as a mere disciplining or furnishing of the intellect. To my thought, it embraced the developing and ordering of the whole manhood. This was my mother's doctrine, continually reiterated by my father: education without religious faith and life is valueless. To my restless, undisciplined, selfish boy-nature, all this seemed hard and impracticable. To her it was easy, but it was beyond my grasp. Therefore life was to me a struggle, full of Divine aspirations and of all too human grovelings, of promise and of failure; and I suffered much from a conscious contrast between the best I dreamed of and the shabby best I did attain. False motives in study hampered me. It seemed to me that I had no right to gain mental power through selfish ambition. Education was my idol, and yet I could not conscientiously give myself wholly to it. * * *

I do not regret the faithful teachings which brought me thus early face to face with religious realities; but had this discipline lacked the demonstration of the pure and consistent life of my mother, it would have been disastrous in the extreme. Supported as it was by her living example, and by the real tenderness and integrity of my father, I was saved from morbidness, and from the reaction which often comes to a man when the religious instruction of his youth has been a discipline of legality without love, and of dogmatism without the vitalizing and vivifying power of personal example.

Myrrh and Frankincense.—Facts about Two very Curious Gums from Eastern Trees.—One recently hears of frankincense and myrrh, said a botanist to a Star reporter; "but few people know what they are. Both are gum resins obtained from trees. That from which frankincense is derived grows chiefly in Arabia, though it is also found in certain parts of India and elsewhere. On the coast of Adel, it is said to be found sprouting from between marble rock, without soil, appearing to spring from a mass of substance resembling a mixture of lime and mortar. The purer the marble the finer the growth of the plant. Young trees furnish the gum, to obtain which a deep incision is made in the trunk, a milk-like juice exuding. When it has time to harden, the large, clear globules are scraped off into baskets, and the inferior quality that has run down the bark is collected separately. Anciently it was reported that the gum which produced frankincense was one of the gems and darkness, where slaves, as a punishment, were compelled to collect the gum from trees infested by winged serpents of various brilliant colors, which could only be driven away by smoke. These beliefs were probably invented by Arab spice producers of fertile imagination, who were desirous to avoid competition.

"Fifteen centuries before Christ, an Egyptian queen named Hatsa, made an expedition to the Arabian coast of the Red Sea, and brought back with her thirty-one incense trees. The gum was much employed of old in sacrifices, its use arising primitively from the belief that pleasant smells were agreeable to gods in general. Trade in such produce must have been very extensive in those times. One thousand talents' weights of frankincense was brought every year to Darius, by the Arabs, as a tribute. As much as this was burnt annually in Babylon, on the great Altar to Bel. Thus it is seen to have been in days of antiquity one of the most valuable products of the East. It was used by the Egyptians in their religious rites, and was in high repute for medicinal purposes. Sometimes blazing lumps of it were employed for illumination. In China it has always been considered a remedy for leprosy.

"Myrrh is the gum of a tree that grows in Southwestern Asia. Until within the present century, its botanical source was in some degree a mystery. The plant in question is scrubby, not exceeding twelve feet in height. It is from what is called the Somali country that the product is chiefly obtained, being sent to a great annual fair at Berbera, where it is bought up by agents of the East India merchants. Bombay and Aden are the chief centres of the trade. At these places it is sorted, the best quality being sent to Europe and the poorer kind to China. Once a year the queen of Great Britain, on the occasion of the Feast of the Epiphany, makes an offering of gold, frankincense and myrrh at the Chapel Royal, London. This custom has been pursued since the time of Edward I. Taken medicinally, myrrh is believed to act favorably upon the appetite and digestion. It also has a special effect upon the mucous membrane, so that people use it to harden gums which are readily made to bleed by the toothbrush."—Washington Star.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 24, 1891.

Several inquiries have recently been made by younger Friends and others, as to the cause of the separation in 1827, which divided the Society of Friends into two bodies, called by way of distinction Orthodox and Hicksite Friends; and it has been suggested that it would be expedient to insert an article on this subject in "THE FRIEND" by way of information.

Some reluctance to respond to this request has been felt, because the Editor was unwilling to do anything which might unnecessarily wound the feelings of any, or awaken a spirit of controversy.

The request, however, is a reasonable one in itself, and it is hoped that a brief explanation may be made which will not give offence to any one.

The groundwork or root of the trouble was a difference that arose in opinions on doctrinal subjects of the very highest importance.

Elias Hicks, who had long been in the station of an approved minister in the Society, and had acquired great influence, after a time adopted views in reference to the nature and Divinity of Jesus Christ our Saviour, the doctrine of the atonement, and as to the authority and authenticity of the Holy Scriptures, which were not in harmony with the doctrines always held by the Society and watchfully guarded.

Elias Hicks appears to have regarded Jesus

Christ as a frail creature like other men, and that He became the Son of God through obedience to that portion of Divine Light which was manifested to Him; and he declared that this Light would do the same work for every creature that submitted to it. Hence all mankind might become Divine in the same way that Christ was Divine. So that when Elias Hicks acknowledges the Divinity of Christ, he refers or seems to refer to the Life of God in the soul of man. This explains the remark of one of his numerous followers to this purport, "that she as fully believed in the Divinity of Christ as in the Divinity of every human soul."

Such a dangerous doctrine is totally unlike that expressed by William Penn, who, in an epistle to John Collins said as follows: "I do heartily believe that Jesus Christ is the only true and everlasting God, by whom all things were made that are made in the heavens above or in the earth beneath, that He is, as Omnipotent so omnipresent and omniscient, therefore God."

The Prophet Amos long ago used this language, "Can two walk together except they be agreed?" It can be no just cause for surprise, that when doctrines were assailed which were and are held in reverence, as among the vital and fundamental principles of Christianity, that very great alarm and uneasiness, discussion and controversy should be the result.

In Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, where probably a larger number of persons were carried off with the ideas of Elias Hicks than in any other part of the United States, a large number of his adherents issued an address, explaining the ground on which they were about to separate from their brethren, in which they say: "Doctrines held by one part of Society, and which we believe to be sound and edifying, are pronounced by the other part to be unsound and spurious."

The Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia in 1828 issued a "Declaration," setting forth the causes and some of the proceedings connected with this separation, in which it says of Elias Hicks' doctrines:

"Under the plausible pretext of exalting 'the light within' as the primary rule of faith and practice, he endeavored to lessen the authority of the Holy Scriptures; and when he had greatly impaired the sentiments of reverence justly due to their Divine testimony, he proceeded to speak of our blessed Saviour, as being merely an example or pattern to us, and denied that his death was an offering for the sins of mankind, except for the legal sins of the Jews, calling Him the Jewish Messiah. Faithful, experienced Friends, who were established in the doctrines of Christ and his Apostles, and who saw the baneful consequences that must result from the promulgation of such opinions, were brought under much painful solicitude, for the preservation of the Society. Having proceeded further in avowing his disbelief in our Lord Jesus Christ as the Saviour of men, publicly declaring that the same power that made Him a Christian, must make us Christians, and that the same power that saved Him must save us; he was again privately labored with, in order to convince him of his error."

The statement made by the adherents of Elias Hicks as to the existence of a marked difference in doctrinal belief was generally accepted as correct on all sides; and in view of it, we think a separation became inevitable, unless the members of the Church were prepared no longer to regard it as a "pillar of the Truth."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Postmaster General Wamaker was in correspondence with the Postmaster General of Canada with reference to an agent of the Louisiana Lottery who is said to be flooding the United States mails with his circulars, &c., from Toronto. It is suggested that such letters might be stamped with the words: "Supposed liable to custom duty," so as to bring them under the supervision of Government officials of the office.

The United States Grand Jury at El Paso, Texas, reported four indictments against Paul Conrad, President of the Louisiana State Lottery Company, and other officers and employes of the company, for violation of the anti-lottery law. In the case against Lieutenant others of the Juarez Lottery Company, of Mexico, 555 indictments were returned.

The Post-office Department has received a number of reports from postmasters indicating that the lottery business is dying out.

The Commission appointed by the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the Shoshone and Arapahoe Indians of Wyoming for a cession of a part of the Wind River Reservation has affected an agreement with the Indians under which they cede to the United States more than half the reservation, or about 1,100,000 acres out of a total of 2,000,000 acres. For the cession the Indians receive $300,000, or about fifty-five cents per acre.

The Census Office has made public a bulletin showing the population of Utah by minor civil divisions. The total population is 207,905, an increase of 44.42 per cent.

A letter has been received in Seattle, Washington, from Lieutenant Russell, chief of the party sent out by the Smithsonian Institution to survey Mount St. Elias, in Alaska. The letter is dated Yakutat, Ninth Month 23d. The attempt to reach the summit of Mount St. Elias was unsuccessful. A height of 14,000 feet was reached, but 1,000 feet to be surmounted.

The New Orleans Times-Democrat asks: What is the world's beer bill? The Gambrius, the organ of the Austrian brewers and hop-growers, answers this question every year by publishing a conspectus of the annual production of beer all over the civilized globe. The total quantity brewed in 1890, says the Gambrius, was inferior to us, was 1,956,000,000 hectoliters, or 51,834,000,000 gallons, whereas in 1889 it was only 1,736,000,000. Great Britain and Ireland held the pre-eminence, with 567,000,000; the German Empire followed next, with 523,000,000, and Austria-Hungary came third, with 469,000,000. The average hectoliter is equal to nearly 261 gallons, wine measure.

The number of deaths in this city last week was 398; being 26 more than the previous week, and 77 more than the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number, 297 were males and 101 females; 61 died of consumption; 46 of diphtheria; 25 of diseases of the heart; 21 of marasmus; 17 of cancer; 16 of cancer; 15 of convulsions; 15 of cholera infantum; 14 of old age; 13 of pneumonia; 10 of apoplexy and 8 of typhoid fever.

MARKETS.—U. S. 2s, 100 a 100; 4s, 116 1/2 a 117 1/2; cotton, 11 1/2 a 12.

COTTON was quiet but unchanged. Sales on a basis of 8c. per pound for middling uplands.

FEED.—Winter bran, in bulk, $17 a $17.75; spring bran, in bulk, $16.50 a $17.

FLOUR.—Western and Pennsylvania super, $3.60 a $3.70; do., do., extra, $3.40 a $3.50; do., do., No. 2 winter family, $4.25 a $4.50; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $4.50 a $4.85; Western winter, clear, $4.50 a $4.65; do., do., straight, $4.65 a $5.00; winter patent, new, $5.00 a $5.25; Minnesota, clear, $4.75 a $5.00; do., straight, $5.00 a $5.25; do., patent, $5.25 a $5.50; do., do., favorite brands, higher. Eye flour was in fair request and firm, and some of the best. Whole wheat flour was scarce and firm at $2.25 a $2.30 per 100 pounds for new.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, $1.03 1/2 a $1.03 1/2. No. 2 mixed corn, 62 a 63 cts.

No. 2 white oats, 30 a 37 1/2 cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, one head, 51 a 54 cts; medium, 41 a 51 cts; fair, 41 a 42 cts; common, 4 a 4 1/2 cts; culls, 31 a 33 cts; Texans, 3 a 4 1/2 cts; fat cows, 21 a 31 cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 41 a 51 cts; good, 4 a 5 cts; medium, 31 a 41 cts; common, 51 a 4 1/2 cts; 4 a 2 1/2 cts; lambs, 4 a 6 cts.

HOGS were active at 7 a 7 1/2 cts. for Western.

FOREIGN.—On the 18th inst., it was officially announced that Arthur J. Balfour, Member of Parliament for East Manchester, and at present the Chief Secretary for Ireland, has been appointed First Lord of the Treasury.

C. S. Parnell's death has failed to heal the breach in the Irish party. This touch is delicate, but the verdict of the correspondents is that the members of what is still known as Parnell's party must finally yield, and that the nation as a whole will support O'Brien and Dillon in supporting Gladstone's Home Rule Measure. The Parnellites will probably be defeated at the general election, but a general feeling of relief will be felt at the faction quarrel.

The substance of the reply of Lord Salisbury, on behalf of England, to the Porte's note, sent to the Powers regarding the passage of the Dardanelles of vessels belonging to the Russian volunteer fleet, does not imply any modification of the restrictions existing here. But, Lord Salisbury added, it is assumed that privileges conceded to other nations in regard to the straits of the Dardanelles, would belong equally to Great Britain. In other words, Lord Salisbury has politely informed the Porte that if vessels of the Russian volunteer fleet are allowed to pass the Dardanelles, Great Britain claims the same right for her "volunteer" vessels.

Portions of Great Britain have been swept by a storm of unusual violence, lasting with slight interruptions from the 14th to the 19th instants. The damage to shipping has been especially great. On the west coast of Ireland, a vessel is accounted to a hurricane, most severe in that part of the country for twenty years.

Dr. Kanthack, an English member of the Indian Leprosy Commission, claims to have succeeded in his experiments in the artificial rearing of the leprosy bacillus. He is a pupil of Dr. Vichow, of Berlin. The earthquake shocks at the island of Pantellaria and its vicinity continue. A volcano has arisen in the bed of the sea off the coast of Pantellaria, which ejects masses of stone to a great height.

The Chinese Minister to Germany has arrived at St. Petersburg from Berlin, in consequence of sudden news from Peking that the Chinese Government has Russian encroachments upon Pamer, the extensive table land of Central Asia, called from its altitude "the roof of the world." The Chinese Government became alarmed over the advices that the Russians had penetrated far beyond the frontier of this district, and the Minister was positively requested to proceed to Peking and obtain positive assurances with regard to the intentions of the expedition. China and England are acting in concert in the matter, owing to the receipt of trustworthy information to the effect that the territory of Afghanistan has also been violated.

The famine prevails in thirteen different governments of Russia, and 14,000,000 persons are in urgent need of succor. The Government is negotiating for the purchase of large quantities of breadstuffs in the United States. The sufferers in the Volga district will be the first to receive assistance, as it is considered absolutely necessary to succor them before the Volga freezes over. Twenty pounds of wheat will be given to each person.

The peasants of Satara, a province in the eastern part of Russia, have dispatched an urgent address to the Czar, in which they say: "We are suffering from famine. The Government does nothing to help us and we only have to die." Our Father and Czar, don't let us die of starvation!"

A dispatch from Shanghai dated Tenth Month 14th, says: The foreign Ministers have broken off negotiations with the Government, and have announced to China that now their own governments must act.

WILLIAM EVANS, Clerk.

Tenth Month, 1891.

DIED, at his residence in Haddonfield, N. J., on the 16th of Fifth Month, 1891, LEITCH EVANS, widow of Amos Evans, in the eighty-first year of her age. A member of Haddonfield Monthly Meeting of Friends, at his late residence near Coal Creek, Iowa, on the 1st of Seventh Month, 1891, JOHN VAIL, in the seventy-eighth year of his age. A member of Coa Creek Monthly Meeting of Friends. Having been favored throughout a lengthened life with almost uninterrupted health, he was concerned as the pains of age were favored with a sense that he had prevailed in his many blessings, craving strength, resignation and patience to enable him to bear the conflict of flesh and spirit. Earnest were his petitions that he might be enabled to see to it that there was anything for him to do before it was too late. He wrestled long and patiently and was favored with an answer upon him, to number his days those he supplicated. "Into thy tender keeping, oh Heavenly Father, I commit my spirit, trusting in thy mercy and in the redeeming power of thy beloved Son Jesus Christ." He retained his mental faculties to the last, and calmly descended into the dark valley and shadow of death, and we doubt not but that he triumphantly emerged from among those who have been washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb. Thanks be unto Him who giveth us the victory.

—, on the 5th inst., at her residence in Wes Chester, Pa., RACHEL M., wife of J. Jones McFadden in the sixty-seventh year of her age. A member of Birmingham Monthly Meeting of Friends. Her illness was long and painful, but patiently borne "with all a murmur," and we trust she is now entered into unending rest and peace.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Selections from the Journal of William Evans.

1842.—In this year our beloved and honored friend received a minute to pay a second religious visit within the limits of Ohio Yearly Meeting. Attending Flushing Monthly Meeting, he says:

"I determined to strive to draw near to the Master, and to do nothing without his bidding; and after a time, the direction of the prophet, to bring empty vessels not a few, was presented, with an intimation to rise with it. By keeping low, to the gentle openings of Divine life, I was enabled to preach the Gospel; and the power of Truth rose and spread over the meeting. The humble traveller was encouraged not to be alarmed with seasons of poverty and emptiness, when the Master withheld the manifestation of His presence, and there seemed not the least capacity to attain to any good. But patiently abiding here, He will reward these sooner or later, with the smiles of His approbation, and renew their spiritual strength. I was humbly thankful for the evidence which He condescended to give, that He had not forsaken me; and I desired to be more given up to endure whatever I see proper, for my good. I know that I cannot bear much favor, but often need stripping; and if I am but kept in the life, and from uttering words without the power, so that the living may savor it, and the negligent be quickened, it is enough, with His approbation."

"Attended Stillwater Quarterly Meeting; wherein, though under fear and emptiness, a renewed qualification was unexpectedly furnished, to preach the Gospel of life and salvation through Jesus Christ our Lord; showing that in order to be made partakers of that salvation which He purchased for us, we must be in the daily practice of waiting upon Him for the renewal of strength, by the bread of life and the water of life, which He gives; both for our own growth, and to fit us for every good work in His use; and to perform that worship to Almighty God which is in spirit and in truth. The rebellious were warned and pleaded with, to turn their backs upon the corruptions of the world, and take the yoke of their Redeemer upon them. The blessedness of the religion of Christ was opened; being inward in its operation; every one receiving Him in his spiritual appearance to the heart, may become possessed of it; and, through perseverance, experience the old man with his deeds to be put off, and the new man put on; and thus be brought under the flaming sword, which separates between the precious and the vile, into the paradise of God, and into the image which Adam was created in. It was a solid time, and the power of Truth went over the meeting.

"The subject of education engaging my mind in the second meeting; I endeavored to press on the fathers the great necessity for, and the blessings of a good home education; wherein, with love and firmness, a steady restraint is kept over the children, with relation to dress, company, and indulging them in other things not suitable for them. With the unity of the men and women, I went into the apartment of the latter, and affectionately enjoined this duty upon the mothers also, who are more with the children, and have opportunity of early commencing the regulation of their will and temper; and, by a religious concern and firmness, of bringing them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord."

"At Painsville, after much suffering, from the outward and unsettled state of many, it seemed necessary to rise and open the object of our religious meetings; not to utter words nor to hear words, but to worship God in spirit and in truth. The need of stillness of body, as well as of mind; the benefit of self-control; having our thoughts restrained, and maintaining a patient waiting upon the Lord, were impressed. Every one being gathered to the gift of God in themselves, there would be a united travail to gain ascendancy over the roving thoughts; and to experience the solemnizing presence of the Head of the church, to arise into dominion in each one, and over all. The benefit of accustoming children to restraint at home, and to sit still in our religious meetings, enforced by the example and authority of parents; the importance of parents discharging their duties to the children, and of the children submitting to their parents, were affectionately pressed upon them. The prodigals were warned of the fearful consequences of evil company, and pleaded with to come out of it, and return to the path of rectitude, that they might escape the inevitable results of disobedience and rebellion. It was a solemn time in the felt, wherein the humbling power of Truth was seen."

"At an appointed meeting at Somerton, I waited to see whether the Master would call for any vocal service; and his language to his immediate followers, 'Without me ye can do nothing,' revived; with an intimation to stand up, which I did, and communicated it with fear; adding, if they can do nothing without Him, neither could we. I remembered the expression of an experienced minister, in relation to the early ministers in our Society, that, 'As it was once a cross to us to speak, though the Lord required it at our hands, let it never be a cross to us to be silent when He does not.' If we are baptized into the likeness of Christ's death, we shall be, also, in the likeness of His resurrection; and those who are baptized into Him, are baptized into His death. As we abide here, his time, we shall know Him to be unto us the resurrection and the life; when He sees fit to arise, we shall also be raised into newness of life. Other matter to different states opened, and was delivered under the humbling hand of the Lord upon me, and reached the states of some. It appeared afterwards, that I was introduced into sympathy with a young Friend who had been exercised in the ministry."

"At West Grove, I was led to bring to view the circumstance of the original members of our religious Society, being gathered from the various professions, to sit down in silence, and wait upon the Lord. They had been strict in the different ceremonial performances, and tried the most eminent preachers; but failed to find what their longing souls wanted. After they were brought to see their own inability, and that of others, to supply what they ardently sought, they were drawn to wait upon the Lord Jesus Christ, and fount Him in their own hearts. Thus they were gathered to a teacher that could not be taken from them; who could speak to their condition, and give them power over Satan and all his temptations. They received gifts, and were prepared to occupy them to the honor of their Lord and Master, and to the furtherance of others in the way of salvation. So I was led to preach Christ to the people, as their present Saviour; as well as the one offering for sin, without them; by whom the Father hath forever perfected them that are sanctified, by the spirit of judgment and of burning. And I was enabled to pray fervently to God that He would strengthen the weak hands and confirm the feeble knees; visit the rebellious with his Day-spring from on high; gather the children under the yoke of his dear Son, and increase and preserve a band there, to stand for his blessed name and cause; and glory and honor were ascribed unto the Lord God and the Lamb for ever. Amen."

"Had an appointed meeting at Plainfield; in which my dear Lord and Master renewedly furnished ability to dip into the states of some; and to show that as He declared to his disciples, 'Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain;' so it was applicable to every regenerated child in his family, in their respective measures and places. He chooses them, as they submit to his heart-changing power; ordains them for the place He allots to them in His church, that they should bring forth fruit to His praise, and their own everlasting peace. Many things were opened pertaining to the Christian warfare; and our hearts were tendered and bowled together before the Lord, to whom alone belongs the praise of His works."

"Many enter upon active life with small means, and are necessarily obliged to make their wants few. When a guard is not strictly kept, this frugal habit may produce a contracted mind, watching at every point to save; and in this way persons often deprive themselves of those means of comfort and mental improvement, which they have within their power; and which they ought to use to qualify them more fully for usefulness in the world, and to prepare the minds of their children to receive right impressions and views, so as to fulfill their duties in civil and religious society. For want of a proper cultivation and expansion of mind, the nobility of man and the glorious design of the Creator in making him a little lower than the angels, may be lost sight of. When parents suffer themselves to be enslaved by this kind of life, the education of their children is much overlooked; they sometimes grow up like wild plants, and either run out into unsuitable company and practices; or follow the example of the parents in grovelling in the earth. Thus even if the form of religion is kept, the life and power are lost, and degeneracy is spread in our religious community."

"In sitting with Friends at Short Creek Monthly Meeting, I was gradually opened on the doctrine of Christian redemption, and enabled to show that Christ gave himself for our sins; not to allow man to sin with impunity; but to bring him out of it; and that it is only as we submit to the sanctification of the Spirit, that we can have ground to hope that our past transgressions will be washed away by the blood of the Lamb. Many passages of Holy Scripture were brought before me, showing the necessity of being made free from the practice and habits of sin; and it seemed to me, there were those who had great need to know the powerful operations of the Divine Word, like fire, to purge away the corruptions of their hearts; that they might be brought into acceptance with Him, who is of purer eyes than to look on iniquity and transgression. The attempts of some, of the present day, to destroy our faith in the spiritual appearance of Christ in the heart, as the hope of glory; which the Apostle denominates the mystery hid from ages and generations, but is now made manifest to the saints, were exposed; and this Christian doctrine, which is the glory of the Gospel dispensation, was supported by Holy Scripture. The efforts of some to invalidate other doctrines and testimonies of the Gospel as held by our ancient Friends, and to tarnish their reputation, were declared against; and I believed it proper to state that history furnished no evidence, so far as I was acquainted with it, that those of us, who had once been in measure subjected by the power of Christ, and afterwards turned against the principles of the Society, ever came to anything in a religious sense, while they remained in that opposition; but I believed that the Lord, in his own way and time, would bring a blast upon such; especially on those who had received spiritual gifts, and occupied prominent stations in the Society. It was very unexpected to be thus led forth, but I believe it was the Lord's doings; and the young people were solemnly warned to beware of all those who seek to weaken their attachment to our religious Society and its Christian principles."

ERROR OF CALCULATION.—The life of nine-tenths of mankind is a gross error of calculation, since they attach themselves to the evanescent, and neglect the permanent, accumulating riches in a world from which they are constantly running away, and laying up no treasure in that eternity to which every day, hour, minute brings them nearer and nearer.

From the "CHRISTIAN STATESMAN."

The Grave Peril of the Pension Legislation.

A political convention was lately held in one of our States, for the purpose of nominating candidates for two important offices. The names accepted by the convention were, it is stated, the candidates put forward by the secret, military organization known as the Grand Army of the Republic. The men selected may be fair, representative citizens, fully up to the average in integrity, capacity, and moral worth, yet that must be obviously a perilous custom which places the favorites of such an organization in power, and in effect, bids them remember and gratefully serve the friends to whom they may have owed their political elevation. It will be admitted that we have had military men, generals of wide renown, who have with general acceptance filled the highest office in the gift of the people, yet this fact does not affect the principle involved, nor lessen the peril which, from this quarter, menaces our free institutions.

The foregoing reflection occurred to me, in reading a recent timely and thoughtful article by H. H. Hinman, entitled "The Grand Army of the Republic and Pensions." It is found in the columns of the "Christian Cynosure," a weekly paper of reform, which takes advanced ground upon the subjects of war and secret societies.

"Believing as I do," says the writer above named, "that all wars are intrinsically wrong, and that all ceremonies and organizations that tend to glorify war are injurious to Christianity and inimical to the public welfare, I cannot but regret that the many excellent citizens connected with the G. A. R. should continue in that relation, and that through their influence the Sons of Veterans, and other kindred organizations, should be raised up to promote the war spirit and to add to the vast network of secret societies that honey comb every department of civil society. Wars and war preparations have for their ostensible object the preservation of peace; but experience shows the effect to be the reverse. War promotes war. Public executions were designed to diminish crime, and especially to prevent murders. But the experience of centuries shows that they have tended powerfully to increase crime and promote murder; so that most of the States have found it necessary to have the death penalty carefully hidden from public view. The same principle applies, in a still greater degree, to all wars and military parades.

"But the question which is now arresting public attention is the relation of the G. A. R. to the pension list and taxation. No one questions the propriety of giving pensions to disabled soldiers; but that more than one half of our vast national revenue should be appropriated to the payment of claims, many of which have not the slightest semblance to justice, is exciting astonishment and indignation. I am glad, too, to hear that a good many of the old soldiers not only wash their hands of the whole conspiracy, but are openly protesting against it."

Quoting from an article by Prof. W. M. Sloane in the "Century" magazine for Sixth Month, we are reminded that "General Grant thought that $27,000,000 annually was not only an ample, but a lavish provision for those who had suffered in the last war, barring all schemes of back pay, service and dependent pensions, which he denounced as highway robbery. Garfield, in 1872, said that nothing but unwarrantable extravagance would increase the pension list above $29,000,000 a year."

But what now is the present demand in the matter of pensions? The government, or more properly the people, are paying yearly an aggregate on pension account equal to at least five times the highest estimate above given, while there are pending in the Pension Commissioner's office upward of 500,000 applications, which when determined, will almost certainly make a total yearly charge upon the country of $200,000,000. Back of this remain yet a number of schemes, claiming or to claim the attention of Congress, and which the recipients, in that bod of favors at the hands of the military organizations generally will be expected to support. Let us also reflect that the enormous collections of the government from the importers and manufacturers of alcoholic beverages, cigars, cigarettes, etc., pay in large part the pension bill. The receivers of pensions and the dealers in and users of strong drink, are in the main interested that the present order of things should not be interfered with. Little need therefore to extend the word of censure to the practice common in Rome's degenerate days, when contestants for the imperial purple, the commanders of cohorts and legions, and senators of wealth, gave largely lavishly to win the support of the populace. The same bribery and venality are witnessed in our day, and, though seemingly not so gross in form, are covered from sight, for very shame, under the mantle of secrecy. Well may War and the Drink Traffic be looked upon as twin "daughters of the horse leech," for truly their insatiate cry is ever "Give, Give."

JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

PHILADELPHIA.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

In the Divine economy the power of Jehovah is wonderfully manifest. Whatever is foreign to the all-wise purposes of God, is evil in its character and tendencies, even if its claims may be high—even to uphold and uphold that which has the appearance of being good. Hence the necessity of observing the Divine command given through the Apostle Paul—"Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit yourselves like men, be strong." When made strong by power Divine to resist evil of every kind, we find that temptation is not to be trifled with. The voice of the charmer may soothe the senses and lull into a feeling of false security. Human minds bear semblance one to the other—but being complex and varied in character, are prone to opposite extremes. The manner and form in which temptation is presented is not the same in all cases. One may be charmed with what another has no inherent liking for. Another may better understand that which the angel pronounced to St. John, the Revelator—"Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth."

"Still let us on our guard be found,
And watch against the power of sound
With sacred jealousy,

Let haply sense should damp our zeal
And music's charms bewitch and steal
Our hearts away from Thee."

Away from the Giver of every good and perfect gift. Immortal interests so far outweigh considerations of time and sense, that the Christian redeemed and set free—no longer follows cunningly-devised fables—but by a living faith is found following on after the companions of Christ's flock—having the patience of the saints and a continued hope of gaining final victory.

P. R. GIFFORD.

PROVIDENCE, Ninth Month 30, 1891.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

The Eastern Shore of Chesapeake Bay.

About the year 1738, this industrious servant of the Lord again visited Maryland and the parts of the country further south. For he was a man whose love to God was abundantly manifested by his labors on behalf of his fellow-men. The poet Whittier very pleasantly describes his home near Frankford, then a suburban village of Philadelphia:

"Beneath the arms

Of this embracing wood, a good man made
His home, like Abraham resting in the shade
Of Mamre's lonely pines.

Here, from his voyages on the stormy seas,

Weary and worn,
He came to meet his children, and to bless
The Giver of all good in thankfulness
And praise for his return.

And here his neighbors gathered in to greet

Their friend again,
Safe from the waves and the destroying gales,
Which reap untimely green Bermuda's vales,
And vex the Carib main.

To hear the good man tell of simple truth,

Sown in an hour
Of weakness in some far-off Indian isle,
From the parched bosom of a barren soil,
Raised up in life and power.

How at those gatherings in Barbadian vales,

A tendering love
Came o'er him, like the gentle rain from heaven,
And words of fitness to his lips were given,
And strength as from above.

How the sad captive listened to the Word,

Until his chain
Grew lighter, and his wounded spirit felt
The healing balm of consolation melt
Upon its life-long pain.

How the armed warrior sat before him to hear

Of peace and Truth,
And the proud ruler and his Creole dame,
Jewelled and gorgeous in her beauty came,
And fair and bright-eyed youth.

Oh, far away beneath New England's sky,

Even when a boy,
Following my plough by Merrimack's green shores,
His simple record I have pondered o'er,
With deep and quiet joy."

John Fothergill, of England, paid three religious visits to this country, and on each of these occasions visited the meeting in Maryland. Of his services during the first of these journeys in 1706 and 1707, he gives but few particulars. During his second visit in 1721, he mentions being at the Yearly Meeting at Tredhaven, "which continued five days successively, where a great number of Friends and others were gathered; and the Lord's goodness and majesty manifested among us." On this occasion he was at many other meetings in those parts, as one of which held at Joshua Kinnersly's, across the Choptank River, he says, "the glorious Gospel life and testimony ran freely forth, and prevailed in a great degree over many souls."

He again attended the Yearly Meeting at Tredhaven in the next year, 1722: "Great numbers of almost all sorts of people came thither, and the Lord God was pleased to open the glorious testimony of Truth, and the way of life, in his mighty power."

During this visit John Fothergill was much exercised in endeavoring to encourage the honest hearted, and rouse up the negligent.

During his third visit in 1736, besides holding meetings in other places, he went into the southern part of the peninsula, claimed by Virginia, and came one night to a Friends near

Muddy Creek, where formerly a meeting had been settled, "but by gradually mixing with the spirit of the world, and so into marriages with others out of the way of Truth, the elders being dead, the youth turned their backs on Truth, and the meeting was quite dropped." At Newadocks, "the meeting was held in the meeting house where formerly there had been a pretty number of Friends, but now they are nearly gone, through the love of the world, with its enjoyments and liberties; so that a meeting is hardly kept there. A pretty many of the neighbors gathered, though they seemed to have but little sense of God, or the operation of Truth; for indeed a cloud of carnal indifferency appeared to me to have overspread almost all that part of the country in an uncommon manner."

Among those who were early called to cross the ocean and proclaim the spiritual nature of the Kingdom of Christ to the inhabitants of the American provinces, was John Richardson. He was in Maryland in 1701; and found many "who loved to hear the testimony and doctrines of Truth, but too few who took up the cross daily, and followed Christ in the way of self-denial." He was afterwards at a Yearly Meeting at Tredhaven, "to which meeting for worship came William Penn, Lord Baltimore and his lady, with their retinue, but it was late when they came, and the strength and glory of the heavenly power of the Lord was going off from the meeting. The lady was much disappointed, as I understood by William Penn, for she told him she did not want to hear him, and such as he, for he was a scholar and a wise man, and she did not question but he could preach; but she wanted to hear some of our mechanics preach, as husbandmen, shoemakers, and such like rustics; for she thought they could not preach to any purpose. William Penn told her, some of these were rather the best preachers he had amongst us.

While in these parts, J. Richardson was in much danger on one occasion. He desired to visit a meeting on the west side of the Choptank River, and being on the east side, set forward with several friends in a small boat, not in good condition, with only one small sail. The river was about ten miles over, and after a time, the wind turned against them. It rained hard, and was very dark, and the water broke into the boat, so that it was one man's work to heave it out. The company became discouraged, and most of them very sen-sick. The man on whom they most depended gave out, and said that he could not steer the boat any longer. "Then," J. R. says, "notwithstanding the extreme darkness, the roughness of the waves, boisterousness of the wind and hard rain, as well as I was, I was obliged to undertake the steering of the boat, and not without some conflicts of mind, having no certainty, from any outward rule, which way we went. Having no fire and the boat being open, we could not have any light to see our compass; and my faith was in the Lord, that He would bring us to shore; and I kept the boat as near the wind as she would sail, and told my poor, sick and helpless company, I believed we should not perish, although we might miss our port. The like imminent danger, I think, I was never in before upon any water; but renowned over all be the great name of the Lord forever, we put into the mouth of our desired river as though we had seen it in the day, or steered by a compass, neither of which we had the benefit of for several hours.

"Here we went on shore and made a great fire under the river's cliff, and about midnight the moon rose, it cleared up and froze, and was very cold. My companions falling asleep, I turned them over and pulled them from the fire as it increased, and put them nearer as it failed, but could not keep them awake. I sought logs of wood and carried them to and minded the fire, which was work enough for the remaining part of the night; but morning being come, we got into our cold, icy boat and sailed away towards the meeting. When we were come, among Friends, notice was given of a stranger being there, and a heavenly and sweet meeting it was, so that we thought we had a good reward for all our trouble."

In reading the narratives of the labors and exercises of those who were instruments in laying the foundations of the Church in this country, one can see the truth and force of John Richardson's expressions, when he says, "Those whose eyes are truly opened cannot but see it is the love of God, and love to the souls of men, that constrains us thus to take our lives as in our hands, and labor through many weary steps, in many perils by sea and by land, and in the wilderness; sometimes in tumults and noises, sometimes in watchings and fastings, and we have sometimes been made spectacles to men; but the Lord hath given us faith and patience to bear and overcome all, as we have singly stood in his heavenly counsel, and been truly devoted to his will in all things."

Samuel Bonwas was another English Friend whom a sense of duty drew across the ocean. He was twice in this country—in 1702, and afterwards in 1726. His Journal does not enter much into details when speaking of Maryland, but in a general way, he remarks that there were very few meetings of Friends in this country which he had not visited, two, three, four and some of them five and six times—so that he was a diligent laborer.

It was not only European Friends who were drawn by the love of Christ to labor in Maryland, but these parts were frequently visited by ministers from other American provinces. In 1740, John Churchman, whose home was at Nottingham, near the boundary line between Maryland and Pennsylvania, felt a concern to labor in the parts south of his dwelling. After attending Cecil and Sassafras Meetings, he attended the head of Chester River on the bridge. "John Browning, a Friend from Sassafras, going with us as a guide, who some time before had been convinced of the blessed Truth, by the inward operation of the Holy Spirit, without any instrumental means. He had been a member of the Church of England, and for his sobriety was chosen a vestryman; but after a time felt a scruple in his mind about taking off his hat when he entered the church-yard, so-called, fearing it was a superstitious adoration of the ground, from its supposed holiness; but would take it off when he entered the worship-house, and walk uncovered to his pew. But after a time he could not uncover his head, until what they call Divine service began; which, as he kept attentive to the scruple in his mind, became very lifeless to him, who was inwardly seeking for substance and life. He therefore withdrew from it, and after some time went to one of our meetings, rather out of curiosity than expecting any good, but felt himself owned, and had a taste of the peace which the world cannot give, and from that time became a constant attendant of our meetings.

"We had a meeting at Queen Anne's, amongst a people who for want of keeping to the life of religion, had almost lost the form."

At Tuckahoe Meeting, "I stood up with an

Home Life on an Ostrich Farm.

A few of our birds were fenced off in breeding-camps; each pair having a run of about one hundred acres. One of these camps was directly opposite the house; and from the windows we could observe the regularity with which the two birds, sitting alternately on the eggs, came on and off at their fixed times. The cock always takes his place upon the nest at sundown, and sits through the night, his dark plumage making him much less conspicuous than the light-colored hen; with his superior strength and courage, too, he is a better defender of the nest against midnight marauders. At nine in the morning, with unflinching punctuality, the hen comes to relieve him, and take up her position for the day. At the end of the six weeks of sitting, both birds, faithfully as the task has been shared between them, are in a very enfeebled state, and miserably poor and thin.

One unfortunite hen—having apparently imbibed advanced notions—absolutely refused to sit at all; and the poor husband, determined not to be disappointed of his little family, did all the work himself; sitting bravely and patiently day and night, though nearly dead with exhaustion, till the chicks were hatched out. The next time this pair of birds had a nest, the cock's mind was firmly made up that he would stand no more nonsense. He fought the hen; gave her so severe a thrashing that she was all but killed—and this treatment had the desired effect, the wife never again rebelled, but sat submissively.

Very different from this couple were the Darby and Joan in the camp opposite our windows. One unlucky morning the hen, frightened by a Kaffir's dog, ran into the wire fence, and was terribly injured. For two years poor Darby was a disconsolate widower, and all attempts to find him a satisfactory second wife were unavailing; several hens, which, soon after his loss, were in succession placed in his camp, being only rescued in time, and at the tacker's point, from being kicked to death. The bare idea of there being anything pathetic about an ostrich seems absurd—and indeed this is the only instance I have known of anything of the kind—but it was truly pitiful to watch this poor bird, as, day after day, and nearly all day long, he wandered up and down, up and down, the length of his camp, in the hard beaten track worn by his restless feet along the side of the fence.

When his time of mourning at length came to an end, and poor Joan's long-vaucant place was filled, we at first rejoiced. But we soon doubted whether, after all, he had not been happier as a widower. For the new wife, a magnificent hen, considerably above the average size, had him in complete subjection; his spirit seemed quite broken, probably with long fretting, and he made no attempt to hold his own, but was for the rest of his days the most henpecked—or ought I to say, hen-kicked?—of husbands. Some amount of stratagem was even necessary on my part, to ensure that he had enough to eat (this pair of birds, being near the house, were under my special care, and during droughts were daily fed by me); for every time he came near the food, the greedy hen would persistently drive him away, standing on tiptoe and hissing viciously at him—and I soon saw that it was useless to attempt feeding them together. But the poor ill-used bird and I were good friends, and quite understood one another;

No, He is very faithful, and that makes me trust Him more,
For I know that He does love me, though He wounds me very sore.

Would you like to know the sweetness of the secret of the Lord?
Go and hide beneath his shadow; this shall then be your reward.

And where'er you leave the silence of that happy meeting place,

You must mind and bear the image of your Master in your face.

Lay it aside—her work : no more she sits
By open window in the western sun,
Thinking of this and that beloved one
In silence as she knits.

Lay it aside; the needles in their place:
No more she welcomes at the cottage door
The coming of her children home once more
With sweet and tearful face.

Lay it aside, her work is done and well;
A generous, sympathetic, Christian life;
A faithful mother and a noble wife;
Her influence who can tell?

Lay it aside—say not her work is done;
No deed of love or goodness ever dies
But in the lives of others multiplies;
Say it is just begun!

CHILDISH WISDOM.

BY J. W. WARD.

'Twas the hour of prayer, and the farmer stood,
With a thankful heart and a lovely mind,
And prayed to the Author of every good,
That the Father of all would be very kind,
And bless his creatures with raiment and food;
That the blessing each day might be renewed,
That every man might find relief,
And plenty for hunger, joy for grief,
Be measured by the Merciful One,
To all who suffered beneath the sun.

The prayer concluded, the godly man
Went forth in love to inspect his farm,
And by his side delighted ran,
Glowing with every beautiful charm,
His little son, a sprightly boy,
Whose home was love, and whose life was joy;
And the father said, "The harvest yields
A plentiful crop, my son, this year;
My barns are too small for my grain, I fear."

And they wandered on through row upon row
Of plumpy sheaves; and at length the child,
With earnest look and a rosy glow
On his shining cheek, looked up and smiled,
And said, "My father, do you not pray
For the poor and needy, day by day?
That God, the good, would the hungry feed?"
"I do, my son." "Well, I think, as you plead"—
His eye waxed bright, for his soul shone through it—
"That God, if He had your wheat, would do it!"

How prone we are to think that we belong where we want to be, instead of thinking that we ought to want to be where we belong! If our inclinations and supposed interests point in one direction, it is quite likely to seem to us that that is the direction of our duty. But if our duty seems to point in an opposite direction from our desires and our immediate gain, we are hardly ready to admit that the best place in the world for us is the place that we shrink from. We wish that our duty could lie in the direction of our wishes, instead of wishing that our wishes could go out in the direction of our duty.

heart filled with affection, having that passage of Scripture before me, in which the Apostle Peter declared the universality of the love of God, i. e., 'I perceive of a truth that God is no respecter of persons, &c.' I was enlarged thereon to my own admiration, and I believe to the satisfaction of the people. After this we attended the several neighboring meetings, through very cold weather; and the houses being open and unprovided with the means of keeping them warm, of which there is too manifest a neglect in these parts, they were uncomfortable, which occasioned unsettlement."

"In this journey, travelling in Talbot County, an elderly man asked us if we saw some posts to which he pointed, and added, the first meeting George Fox had on this side of Chesapeake Bay, was held in a tobacco house there, which was then new, and those posts were part of it. John Browning rode to them and sat on his horse very quiet; and, returning to us again with more speed than he went. I asked him what he saw among those old posts; he answered, 'I would not have missed what I saw for five pounds, for I saw the root and ground of idolatry.' Before I went, I thought perhaps I might have felt some secret virtue in the place where George Fox had stood and preached, whom I believe to have been a good man; but whilst I stood there, I was secretly informed, that if George was a good man, he was in heaven, and not there, and virtue is not to be communicated by dead things; whether posts, earth or curious pictures, but by the power of God, who is the fountain of living virtue."

John Churchman paid several other visits among Friends on the Eastern Shore, the last of which, in 1775, was shortly before his decease.

"The Secret of His Presence."

The verses below were written by Ellen Lakshmi Goreb, a Maharrata Brahmin lady of the highest caste. She was born at Benares, North Month 11, 1853, and is now at Amritsar, in the Punjab, working as a missionary among her own countrywomen, often encountering opposition, but also often cheered by finding women glad to listen to the Gospel story, and by receiving a welcome here and there, even in the darkest places.

In the secret of his presence, how my soul delights to hide!

Oh! how precious are the lessons which I learn at Jesus' side!
Earthly cares can never vex me, neither trials lay me low,
For when Satan comes to tempt me, to the secret place I go.

When my soul is faint and thirsty, 'neath the shadow of his wing
There is cool and pleasant shelter and a fresh and crystal spring;
And my Saviour rests beside me, as we hold communion sweet;
If I tried I could not utter what He says when thus we meet!

Only this I know: I tell Him all my doubts and griefs and fears

Oh! how patiently He listens, and my drooping soul He cheers!

Do you think He ne'er reproves me! What a strange friend He would be

If He never, never told me of the sins which He must see!

Do you think that I could love Him half so well, or as I ought,
If He did not tell me plainly of each sinful deed and thought?

and at all sorts of odd times—watching for those golden opportunities when his tyrant was safely out of sight at the further end of the camp—he would come down to the fence and look out for me, and I would bring him a good feed of mealies.

When, as sometimes happens, one solitary chick is reared at the house, it becomes absurdly and often inconveniently tame. A friend of ours, on returning to his farm at the end of a severe thunderstorm, found that an ostrich's nest had been washed away. Some of the eggs had been rescued from the water, and—being of course deserted by the parents—were placed in an incubator, where, contrary to all expectations, one chick came out. This bird, Jackie, became the tamest and most audacious of pets; and, like many another spoilt only child, was often a terrible nuisance. All the little niggers about the place had a lively dread of him, and he requisitioned their food in the boldest manner. As they sat on the ground at meals, with plates of boiled pumpkin and rice in their laps, he would come up, and, stretching his snake-like neck over their heads, or insinuating it under their arms, would coolly help himself to the contents of one plate after another. Occasionally he would make for the youngsters in so menacing a manner as to frighten them into dropping their plates together; then, while his victims ran away crying, he would squat on his heels among the debris, and regale his enormous appetite at leisure.

But one day retirement came. Being free of the kitchen—simply because no one could keep him out—he was not long in observing that the pumpkin and rice always came out of one particular pot; and, the idea suddenly occurring to him that he could do no better than go straight to the fountain-head for his favorite dish, he walked up, full of joyful anticipation, to the fire where this pot was bubbling. The cook—who, being mother to several of the ill-used children, did not love Jackie—offered no friendly interference to save him from his fate; and, plunging his bill into the pot, he greedily scooped up, and, with the lightning-like rapidity of ostriches, tossed down his throat, a large mouthful of boiling rice. Poor fellow! the next moment he was dancing round the kitchen, writhing with agony, shaking his head nearly off, and twisting his neck as if bent on tying it in a knot. Finally he dashed wildly from the house; the cook, avenged at last for all the dinners he had devoured, called after him as he stumbled out at the door, “Serve you right, Jackie!”—and away he fled across the weld, till the last that was seen of him was a little cloud of white dust vanishing on the horizon. He returned a sadder and a wiser bird; and it was long before he again ventured inside the kitchen.

The hen ostrich lays every alternate day; and if, for each egg laid, one is taken from the nest, she will continue laying until she has produced from twenty to thirty. One, which belonged to T——, laid sixty eggs without intermission. If no eggs are taken away, the hen leaves off laying as soon as she has from fifteen to twenty; the latter being the greatest number that can be satisfactorily covered by the birds. The surplus eggs are placed in incubators. It is best not to give much artificial food to the birds while sitting; as, if overfed, they are become restless, and are liable to desert the nest.

Every morning and evening, the nest, or rather the shallow indentation in the sandy ground which forms this simplest of all “homes without hands,” is left uncovered for a quarter of an hour, to allow the eggs to cool. The sight of nests thus apparently deserted has probably given rise to the erroneous idea that the ostrich leaves her eggs to hatch in the sun. The passage in the book of Job: “Which leaveth her eggs in the earth, and warmeth them in the dust,” is also generally supposed to point to the same conclusion, though in reality there can be no doubt that the latter part of the sentence simply applies to the warming of the eggs by the heat of the bird's body as she sits over them in her dusty nest. Stupid though she is, she has more sense than to believe in the possibility of the sun hatching her eggs; she is indeed quite aware of the fact that, if allowed to blaze down on them with untempered heat, even during the short time she is off the nest, it would be injurious to them; and therefore, on a hot morning, she does not leave them without first placing on the top of each a good pinch of sand. This she does in order that the germ—which, whatever side of the egg is uppermost, always rises to the highest point—may be shaded and protected. Having thus set her nest in order, she walks off, to fortify herself with a good meal for the duties of the day.

It is a strange fact, that the most savage ostrich, if he comes up and finds you between himself and his nest, does not, as would naturally be supposed, rush to defend his eggs, and, if possible, kick you to death, but is instantly changed into the most abjectly submissive of creatures. He squats at your feet; making a peculiar rattling noise with his wings, biting the ground, snapping his bill, closing his eyes, and looking the very embodiment of imbecility as he meekly implores you to spare his eggs. This suppliant posture is, however not to be trusted; and, if tuckey-less, you had better remain at the nest until assistance—or night—comes, for if once the positions of yourself and bird are reversed, he squats, no longer in servile entreaty, but in defiance; and his challenge is promptly followed by a charge. The hen ostrich, being destitute of a voice, has but one way of calling her chicks, which is by that same rattling and rustling of the wings.

Ostriches are long-lived creatures; indeed, it is impossible to say what venerable age they may be capable of attaining, for, however old they become, they never show any signs of decrepitude, nor do their feathers deteriorate; while, as for an ostrich dying of old age, I do not believe any one has ever heard of such a thing. But it is accident which, sooner or later, ends the career of nearly every ostrich; and in about ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the disaster is, in one way or another, the result of the bird's own stupidity. There surely does not exist a creature—past earliest infancy—more utterly incapable of taking care of itself than an ostrich; yet he is full of conceit, and resents the idea of being looked after by his human friends; and when, in spite of all their precautions for his safety, he has succeeded in coming to grief, he quietly opposes every attempt to cure his injuries, and at once makes up his mind to die. If his hurt is not sufficiently severe to kill him, he will attain his object by moping and refusing to eat—anyhow, he dies—often apparently for no other reason than because his master, against whom he has always had a grudge, wishes him to live. He seems to die out of spite; just as a Hindoo servant will starve himself, waste rapidly away, and finally come and expire at the gate of the employer with whom he is offended.

The worst and most frequent accidents by which ostriches contrive to make away with themselves are broken legs; these—even were the patients tractable—it would be impossible to cure, owing to the strange fragility of that limb which, as we have seen, is capable of inflicting so deadly a kick—and any poor bird which breaks a leg has to be instantly killed. The bone seems almost as brittle as porcelain; and a comparatively slight blow is enough to splinter it into just such jagged and pointed fragments as result from breaking the spout of a china tea-pot.

FROM THE “BRITISH FRIEND.”
Peculiarities of Friends.

MUSIC.

The peculiarity of Friends-respecting music consists in their recognizing the fundamental difference between the songs of Zion and the songs of Babel. The world's teachers can instruct and make proficient in the latter, but it profeth nothing to attain to the utmost proficiency in their art; but it is the Lord who prepareth the sacrifice of praise, and causeth the lips to sing of his glory.

The mirth and song of Babylon are not for those whose hearts are dedicated to the service of the Lord, nor can the sanctified soul find delight in them. Theirs is a new song which none but the redeemed can sing, even praise unto our God.

Music is one of the many inventions sought out by man. He is fond of applying it to various purposes, and proud of his skill in doing so. He presumes to make it sacred by applying it to the language of Holy Writ, and the result he calls praise; forgetting that, let him cultivate it ever so perfectly, and apply it to language the most reverent, poetic and sublime, it is beyond his power to make anything sacred of it, although he may not stop short of making it an idol. The acquisition of the art of producing harmonious sounds, whether by voice or by instrument, can never make man a whiter purer of heart, meeker in spirit, or more righteous in manner of life. Neither can it enable him to praise his God or serve his brother better than he otherwise could do. It cannot make holy words more holy, nor profane words less profane, but it may render both more pleasant to the ear. The more pleasing and attractive the sound is to the ear, however, the more it will hinder that abstraction of the mind from things of sense which is necessary when the soul retires before its Maker, and the more, also, it will render evil sentiments palatable to a refined taste; so that, whether the words be of a religious or of a profane description, the application of music to them will operate injuriously.

Against those songs which cannot be said to be either religious or profane, and the sentiment of which is unobjectionable, the only objections that shall be urged are those that apply only to the music itself, and the same objections will also apply to all kinds of instrumental music. These may be stated as follows: Music is essentially a worldly accomplishment, the purpose of which is to please the senses. A long period of time must be spent in order to acquire proficiency in it. When acquired it profeth nothing. It exercises so seductive and delusive an influence upon the mind that it is almost impossible to keep it within innocent bounds. It is one of the principal and most deadly baits used by the watchful enemy of souls for alluring men and women from the paths of virtue and self-denial to the haunts of pleasure and sin. It predisposes to wanton mirth and levity, and unfit the mind for serious thought. It is, like all worldly pleasures, unsatisfying. Like them also, it beckons on to further pleasure, and is full of promise. It thus draws the mind downward in search of that which will ever elude its grasp, for there is no substance in it. Further, the cultivation and practice of music is responsible for much of the corruption that exists in the professed Church of Christ, nor does it appear that the corruption can be removed without eradicating the cause. The remedy cannot be effected by altering the tune or changing the singers, but by closing the lips until the Lord is pleased to fill them with singing and to open them with praise, for it is the Lord's own works that praise Him and not man's. So Friends believe, and it is this belief and the practice consequent upon it that constitutes the Peculiarity of which we are speaking.

W.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Barnesville Republican furnishes the following interesting remarks in reference to the late Yearly Meeting of Friends in Ohio.

After enumerating a number of valuable Friends who had been taken to their reward, and that others had come forward to fill their vacant places, the writer says: "So must it needs be to keep the organization going, and we are fully convinced that the 'Friends' Society' needs to be kept going and aroused to greater zeal in its work. Every influence for good is to-day greatly needed and should be kept widening to counteract the abounding multiplicity of evil. Many of the pioneer Quakers, as Penn, Story, &c., were men of learning, of liberal active minds, and it must be apparent to the careful observer of the progress of our civilization that one of its chief currents had its source in the Quaker colonies. That this current and its influence originating in the principle of 'The Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world,' shall cease and come to naught; we do not believe.

When we compare the lot of a genuine Quaker, the comforts and blessings attending his manner of life here, and the hope of hereafter, with that of the great mass of humanity, it seems rather strange that those brought up and educated in this faith, persons of intelligence, should forsake 'the old way' or sell their birthright cheaply—

"For shall we learn in our ease, to forget
To the Martyr of Truth and of Freedom our debt?
Hide their words out of sight, like the garb that they wore
And for Barclay's apology, offer one more?

The good, round about us, we need not refuse,
Nor talk of our Zion as if we were Jews,
But why shirk the badge our fathers have worn?
Or beg the world's pardon for having been born?

There are those who take note, that our numbers are small,
New Gibbons who write our decline and our fall,
But the Lord of the seed-field takes care of his own,
And the world shall yet reap what our sowers have sown."

Why, in the words of our beloved Whittier in the above lines, should any shirk the badge which our fathers have worn and turn again to the slavery of fashion under which so many groan.

A Friend, who in the practice of his profession was much thrown among the best people of other religious persuasions, said, "that he found many among them who acknowledged, that it was incumbent on all Christians to dress with simplicity, but added, that if they did not change with the fashion they would soon look more peculiar than we do, and wished they had a mode of dress as we have. If we do not," he continued, "change with the fashions we unavoidably adopt a mode of dress and ours has been tried and found to be a good one." A valued minister remarked recently, that "if we let our testimonies fall, the principles will soon follow." Have we not already had evidences of this, among those claiming the name of Friends in many parts of the land? Let none of us then be ashamed to acknowledge in dress and language, as well as in every act of our lives, our allegiance to Him who said, "Whosoever is ashamed of me and of my words, of him shall the Son of Man be ashamed when He shall come in his own glory and in his Father's, and of the holy angels."

G. W. Childs on the Theatre.—When I was young I had near a thousand, and many of the actors knew me, and I might have gone any time and witnessed the performance, without having to pay for it.—Other boys, acquaintances of mine, used to do it, and I would have liked to do it. But I thought it over and made up my mind that I would not. And I never did.

A Remarkable Edict of Kuang Hsu.—"The religions of the West (Christian countries) have for their object the inculcation of virtue, and though people become converts, they still remain Chinese subjects, and continue to be amenable to the jurisdiction of the local authorities."

"There is no reason why there should not be harmony between the ordinary people and the adherents of (foreign) religions, and the whole trouble arises from lawless ruffians fabricating baseless stories and making an opportunity for creating a disturbance."

"These incidents are taken from recent edict of Kuang Hsu, Emperor of China, and they show that even in our day "God moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform."

Almost simultaneous riots in many provinces have caused the Emperor of China to feel his "dragon throne" begin to tremble. The Omnipotent has, on a momentous scale, caused "the wrath of man to praise Him," by making this heathen emperor, on June 13, 1891, issue this most remarkable edict to the hundreds of millions of his subjects.

Never before in this empire has the status of Christianity been so clearly and authoritatively stated. Ever since Christianity made an entrance into this Middle Kingdom, many Chinese, considering Christianity a seditious organization, have held themselves aloof from examining its claims, while many others, convinced of its truth, have feared to unite with the Christian Church, lest they should be branded as traitors, or at least disloyal to the Chinese Government.

This imperial edict completely sweeps away all such doubts and fears. It distinctly states, "though people become converts, they still remain Chinese subjects."

It means, also, that all of China's millions may know that they can become Christians without in the least dissolving their allegiance to the Chinese Government. In fact, there is greater religious liberty in China to-day than in Russia and in some other European countries.

In Japan apprehension arises lest the Church be united to the State, which might prove highly detrimental to a pure Christianity. In China, by this imperial edict Christianity has liberty enough. Throughout this ancient but by no means effete empire, the missionaries gratefully recognize that "the Lord hath made his holy arm in the eyes of all the nations, and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God."

The Jews heartily praised Jehovah for the edict of the Czar. The early Christians gladly praised God for the occasional edicts of toleration by certain Roman emperors. Similarly, to-day, the missionaries in this populous heathen empire joyfully ascribe praises to the victorious Captain of their salvation for this remarkable edict of Kuang Hsu, Emperor of China.—Marcus L. Traft in the Christian Advocate.

Demoralizing Literature.—Our public-spirited friend, Josiah W. Leeds, has been calling attention, through the Public Ledger, to the corrupting accounts of criminals and similar debasing reading matter, as one of the causes of the increase of crime noted by the Census Reports; he mentions that recently the usually quiet borough of West Chester has been the field of a number of burglaries and of attempts, more or less successful, at horse stealing—one of the latest undertakings of the series by two lads (now in jail), whose baggage, as alleged, "consisted chiefly of paper-backed novels, dealing chiefly with exploits of criminals," elicited the Ledger's apt comment upon those ready text books or papers of crime as being "a class of books more pernicious than any against which the laws are directed."

The bank burglar who shouted "I'm a second Jesse James," as, with revolver in each hand, he "held up" two officials and a depositor while he secured his booty, declared plainly to the community the grade of school where he had learnt his lessons in outlawry. Now, we may not definitely say that this man obtained his literary supplies from the news-stands on the public sidewalks, yet we know assuredly that such pernicious and illegal reading matter cannot be scattered broadcast without a large resultant of criminal acts, and that the State or the municipality performs but a portion of its duty when it lays its heavy hand upon the detective library and dime novel graduates, while it permits the purveyor of the demoralizing stuff to pursue his calling unchallenged.

Bristling with Guns.—The Auckland (New Zealand) Herald recently reported a proposal, made by a local colonel, for largely augmenting the volunteer force, the proposal being accompanied by a wish "to see the country bristling with guns." Hereupon, a sensible correspondent wrote to the editor that "It is one of the misfortunes of a military education that most men trained as soldiers seem wholly unable to recognize that the highest manliness does not consist in military prowess, and that the hollow impudence, typified by 'bristling with guns,' tends far more to national degradation than to secure the national safety."

Natural History, Science, etc.

Poaching with Whiskey.—Among the methods used by poachers to catch partridges in England, the following is said to have been used: "Grain is soaked until it becomes swollen, and is then steeped in the strongest spirit. This is strewn in the morning paths of the partridge, and soon taking effect, the naturally pugnacious birds are soon staggering and fighting desperately. The poacher bides his time, and, as opportunity offers, knocks the incapacitated birds on the head."

The Salt Marsh of the Kavir.—Lieutenant H. B. Vaughan, who made a journey of 1164 miles in Eastern Persia, thus describes one of the most curious features of the country, the salt swamp of the Kavir: "As we quitted the defile, a sudden turn in the road presented to our astonished gaze what at first sight looked like a vast frozen sea, stretching away to the right as far as the eye could reach in one vast glistening expanse. A more careful examination proved it to be nothing more than salt formed into one immense sheet of dazzling brilliancy, while here and there upon its surface, pools of water, showing up in the most intense blue, were visible. Away to the north of it stood a distant row of low red hills. A peculiar haze, perhaps caused by evaporation, hangs over the whole scene, which, though softening the features of the distant hills, does not obliterate their details. This, which I now see before me, is the great salt swamp, to the presence of which the Dash-i-Kavir owes its name. This swamp, lying at a low level in the centre of the great desert, receives into its bed the drainage from an immense tract of territory. All the rivers flowing into it are more or less salt, and carry down to it annually a great volume of water. The fierce heat of the desert during the summer months, causes a rapid evaporation, the result being that the salt continually increases in proportion to the water, until at last the ground becomes caked with it. The Persians say that many years ago a sea rolled its waves over the whole of the depression where I am now travelling, and that it was navigated by ships which used to sail from Semnan to Kasha.

The Mink.—On the shores of Casco Bay, Maine, the mink is still abundant. It lives in holes in the rocks near highwater mark. Its young are apparently brought forth at the end of Second Month or early in Third Month, and they are two-thirds as large as the parent by the middle of Sixth Month. They enter the water like others, swim about after flounders or cunners, bringing them ashore. We have observed a family of four, the mother and three young ones, engaged in fishing and eating flounders, and they were so tame we could approach within four or five feet of their station under a wharf. It seems to vary in color from a sable black to reddish brown, the young being dark. Interesting in their shape and habits, they amuse the summer residents, and are not molested.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 31, 1891.

Some of the older members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, who have long taken an active interest in all that concerns its welfare, and on whose minds have been deeply impressed the exercises through which they have passed, and the stirring scenes in which they participated, may find it difficult to realize that a new generation has grown up around them, to whom the scenes and events so vividly present in the minds of their older friends, are a matter of history only, and who need from time to time to be informed of past incidents, so that they may properly understand the present position of their own Yearly Meeting.

In reading the account of the proceedings of their Yearly Meetings they see that a prominent feature in their business is the reception and sending of epistles to co-ordinate bodies, which they have never known to be done among ourselves, although it was formerly customary. It seems proper at this time, for the information of some of our younger members, to give a brief relation of the manner in which his suspension of correspondence came to pass. It was one of the consequences of that internal agitation which disturbed the peace of the Society of Friends about fifty years ago, and which had its origin in the promulgation of one doctrinal view which differed from those originally held by the Society of Friends.

These views naturally awakened deep concern on the part of many who saw their inconsistency with the accepted doctrines of Friends, and who felt it a duty to oppose their introduction and spread. Prominent among these in New England was an aged minister, who had said a religious visit to Great Britain, and whilst there had been distressed by the evidences which he met with of a departure from our original principles. He felt it his duty to bear a testimony against these departures and those who promoted them; but instead of the sympathy and support which he ought to have received from his fellow-members, some of them misunderstood or misrepresented his motives, charged him with tale-bearing and detraction, and finally proceeded to disown him. There were others who felt as he did; and the result of this controversy was the division of New England Yearly Meeting into two parts, popularly known as the Larger and the Smaller bodies.

The writer of this still adheres to the conclusions at which he then arrived;—that the Friends of the Smaller Body were contending for the true principles of our Society, and were endeavoring to sustain the Yearly Meeting on its ancient foundations. In the perplexing questions concerning doctrine and discipline which then arose, it is probable that neither party made sufficient allowance for those who differed from them. However that may be, there is reason to believe that some of the members of the Larger Body in New England have, since that time, become sensible of the loss their meeting sustained in the practical expulsion of a body of sound Friends, who could have been very helpful in withstanding the introduction of changes in doctrine and in the manner of holding meetings for worship, which have since been a grief to themselves.

In confirmation of this belief, we quote the following extract from a letter written by a valued friend, which we recently had the privilege of reading:

"Every aged Friend who was in that contest and still remains in the Larger Body [of New England Yearly Meeting] when I have asked him or her if they regretted the action of the Yearly Meeting towards John Wilbur, unhesitatingly says, it was a great mistake, and that action has left the meeting a prey to the present tendencies which are destroying its Quakerism."

Both of the bodies in New England having claimed recognition of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, the documents issued by each were subjected to a careful examination by a committee of its Meeting for Sufferings, and an elaborate report prepared, of which our Yearly Meeting transmitted copies to each of the Yearly Meetings in New England. A reply was received from the Smaller Body, but since that there has been no correspondence with either of them on our part.

In a body of people so closely united by many ties as is the Society of Friends, it may emphatically be said, if one member suffer all the members suffer with it. The controversy originating in England in doctrinal differences, and aggravated in New England by injudicious efforts to suppress discussion, spread to a greater or less degree into almost all parts of the Society. In Ohio Yearly Meeting, the party which sympathized with the Larger Body in New England, though much fewer in numbers than the others, yet so conducted themselves as to cause a separation. Their proceedings were stated by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in a subsequent epistle to London, to be "subversive of the order and discipline of our Society." In accordance with this conviction, Philadelphia Yearly Meeting maintained its official connection with the Larger Body in Ohio, as is shown by a paragraph which in 1855 it directed to be added to its epistles to North Carolina and Indiana, which says: "Being convinced that the meeting for which Benjamin Hoyle acted as Clerk is the original and only legitimate Yearly Meeting of Ohio, we have continued our correspondence with it."

In consequence of pursuing this course, New York, Baltimore, North Carolina and Indiana Yearly Meetings dropped epistolary correspondence with us; and thus the interchange of letters with them, so far as our Yearly Meeting was concerned, became a thing of the past.

As respects the three remaining Yearly Meetings that then existed—Ohio, London and Dublin—the suspension of correspondence was not their act—for the omission to reply to epistles received was on the part of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. Several causes contributed to this omission; perhaps the most effective of these was the fact, that the feelings of our members had become considerably excited on the subject of the dissensions then agitating society, and these had become so associated in their minds with the sending of epistles, that this part of the business of the Yearly Meeting could not be transacted with that unity and harmony so desirable in the proceedings of the church.

Those of our readers who desire to read a fuller account of these things, may find them interestingly detailed in the "Brief Narrative of the Position of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting," issued by its Meeting for Sufferings in 1872, and which may be obtained gratuitously at the Book Store, 304 Arch St., Philadelphia.

Since the period of which we have been speaking, a new generation has arisen, and more open and radical departures from the principles and practices of Friends have been introduced in many places—departures which have led in different places to separations, so that we now have several bodies endeavoring to maintain the doctrines of primitive Friends, and which may be termed Conservative Yearly Meetings, in distinction from others which have to a greater or less degree yielded to the current which is sweeping those under its influence away from those doctrines. Yet even in those meetings which have most widely departed from the principles of Friends, there are still preserved those who walk in the old paths. Have not all those who adhere to the doctrines and testimonies of our common Society, no matter what may be the status of the meeting to which they belong, strong claims upon the sympathy and fellowship of those in other parts who are like-minded?

The partial isolation in which our Yearly Meeting stands with respect to other bodies ought not to render us unconcerned spectators of what is going on among them. If we are truly devoted to the cause of Christ, we will feel a living concern that his doctrines may be preserved in all parts of the Society, and that its members everywhere may yield their hearts to the visitations of his Grace and be preserved from everything that would mar the beauty of our profession. Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has from time to time manifested its concern by issuing epistles addressed to the members of its own and other Yearly Meetings, reaffirming the doctrines and testimonies held by the Society in the beginning; and we believe these epistles have tended to increase the unity and fellowship which bind together the true members of the Church of Christ.

We desire that our members individually may be willing to dwell under a similar exercise of spirit for the preservation and restoration of that unity which flows from the holding of the same Christian doctrines and a common walking in consistency therewith. This will prepare them for a renewed consideration of the duty which rests upon the Church to build one another up in our most Holy faith, and open the way for their feelingly entering into any concern which may arise with life in the collected Church, for the further extension of labor in this direction.

WORDS of sympathy with one in sorrow are a help, even where they cannot be a cure. They bring comfort, while they are powerless to remove grief. Hearts that would break in their sorrow without any assurance of God's love in human sympathy, are stayed up in the conviction that they are not alone in their burden-bearing, as the words of tender interest in them in their trial multiply from those whose expressions carry proof of sincerity. Words are of service to the sorrowing, and they ought not to be withheld.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Our Government, through Minister Egan, has formally demanded reparation from the Government of Chili for the attack recently made in Valparaiso upon a number of seamen of the cruiser Baltimore. Our Government demands an immediate reparation for the whole affair and reparation for the injuries inflicted.

It is announced in Boston that the petition to the Czar of Russia relative to the treatment of Siberian exiles has been signed by more than one million citizens of the United States. The signers are now asking for aid in contribution in aid of the famine sufferers in Russia.

A dispatch from Ponca, Indian Territory, says that the Cherokee Commission on the 21st inst. concluded a treaty with the Tonkawa Indians, by which the Indians agreed to take land in severalty and to sell the remainder to the Government at $1.25 per acre. After the Indians have been allotted their lands there will remain for settlement about 10,000 acres.

Two engineers who have just returned to Yuma, Arizona, from the crevasse through the walls of the Colorado River, endeavor to form the called "dam" to the river, so that no water will be lost into the Salton basin, and that, before there can be any rise in the river of any consequence, the opening will have been filled with sand.

Henry Villard was quoted at Spokane, Washington, on the 24th inst., as having expressed a belief "that the training of the Northern Pacific will, before long, be operated entirely by electric power."

A dispatch from Great Falls, Montana, says that the survivors of the Northern Pacific extension have discovered that "the main divide of the Rockies is only 5,200 feet above the sea level, instead of 5,500 feet, as shown in the old maps. Over 5,000 men are employed in grading and track laying, and it is expected there will be no cessation of work this winter."

A vein of immensely rich cinnabar ore, sixty feet in width, is said to have been recently discovered in Oregon.

A liquor dealer in Bar Harbor, Maine, including the proprietors of summer restaurants, has been indicted by the Grand Jury for alleged violation of the liquor laws.

John Hunt, J. D. Ponder and Thomas O'Keefe, proprietor, editor and business manager of the Times at El Paso, Texas, have been arrested for violation of the Anti-lottery law by mailing copies of their paper containing lottery advertisements. They were held in $200 each for trial.

On the 23d inst., the United States Grand Jury at Sioux Falls returned eleven separate indictments against the officers of the Oregonian for violation of the United States Marshal and his deputies left the same evening for New Orleans to arrest all the officers of the lottery.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 407; which is more than during the previous week, and 67 more than during the same period last year. Of the foregoing, 297 were males and 200 females; 56 died of consumption; 41 of diseases of the heart; 37 of diphtheria; 19 of cancer; 17 of marasmus; 16 of cholera infantum; 14 of pneumonia; 12 of Bright's disease; 11 of cancer; 11 of old age, and 11 of inflammation of the brain.

Markets.—U. S. 2s, 100 a 1004; 4s, 1163 a 1171; currency 6s, 111 a 121.
COTTON was quiet, but firm, on a basis of 8½c. per pound for middling uplands.

LOUR.—Western and Pennsylvania super, $3.00 a $3.85; do. do., extras, $3.90 a $4.25; good 2 winter, $3.75; 8½c. Pennsylvania, seller, straight, $4.50; $4.85; Western winter, clear, $4.50 a $4.65; do. do., straight, $4.65 a $5.00; winter patent, new, $5.00 a $5.25; Minnesota, clear, $4.75 a $5.00; do., straight, $5.00 a $5.15; do., patent, $5.25 a $5.50. Eye flour was in moderate request and firm at a 30 a 40 cent premium for quality. Double flour was in fair request at full prices. Sales of 50,000 pounds good to choice new, at $2.15 a $2.25 per 100 pounds.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, $1.01 a $1.01½.
No. 2 white corn, 64½ a 65c. do.

CATTLE.—Extra, heavy, good 5 a 5½ cts.; medium, 4½ cts.; fair, 4¼ a 4½ cts.; common, 3¼ a 4 cts.; culls, 3 a 3½ cts.; Texans, 3 a 4 cts.; fat cows, 2 a 3 cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5 a 5½ cts.; good, 4¼ a 4½ cts.; medium, 4 a 4½ cts.; common, 3¼ a 3½ cts.; culls, 2 a 3 cts.; lambs, 4 a 5 cts.
HOGS.—$3.75 cts. for good Western, and 64 a 65 cts. for other grades. No State hogs arrived.

FOREIGN.—A cablegram from London dated the 20th inst., says: The floods in England, a result of the recent two weeks of successive heavy gales, continue to do a great amount of damage. The Thames, for instance, has been placed in a perilous position, or so beyond its banks. The town of Eton and many of the streets of Windsor are impassable, and punts (flat-bottomed boats) are being used to convey people from house to house.

A dispatch to the Figaro from Copenhagen, published on the 23d inst., says that during the imperial and royal gathering at Fredensborg the palace of the Danish royal family, where the Emperor and Empress of Russia have made long visits this autumn, the formation of a "League of Peace" was discussed at length among the principal notabilities there assembled. According to the Figaro's correspondent, the league is to include Russia, Sweden, Prussia, Greece, Sweden, Denmark and France. He adds that it was agreed that the league should be formed and that its constitution will be publicly announced in First Month.

This League of Peace, should it turn out to be an actual fact, will naturally be regarded as a counterpoise to the "League of the Three Emperors" openly announced by the Emperor of Germany recently to his recent visit to England.

Advices received in Paris on the 25th inst., from Melringen, in the canton of Berne, Switzerland, are to the effect that the town has been almost entirely wiped out by fire. The Figaro's correspondent says that Wildermann's Hotel are the only two structures to mark the situation of this once prosperous place. The town was reduced to ashes in three hours after the outbreak of the fire. It was impossible to save anything. The wind was so strong that partly-burned papers were carried as far as Lutetian, nineteen miles distant. The inhabitants of the burned town are in a pitiful condition, and parties for their help have started from Lutetian.

A dispatch from Madrid of the 20th inst., says: The terrible storm which has prevailed for several days in the north of Spain, without any respite, has driven throughout the entire country are rising steadily and rapidly. The celebrated leaning tower at Sagosa (the tower of Felipe, which leans about nine feet out of the perpendicular, and is so well known to foreign sightseers) has been undermined by the gathering waters, and threatens to totally collapse. Great the streets are flooded so as to be impassable, except for small boats, and the railways in and about Valencia have been washed away and partly destroyed.

The St. Petersburg correspondent of the London Standard says that the approach of frost has caused a renewal of the cries of distress. The Norvici estimates that the number of starving persons in the province prove that in many places speculators get extortionate prices. Corn merchants and village koolaks, or usurers, are charged with responsibility for the extortion. A Sumatra paper declares that the koolaks are in the habit of reducing those in their power to the lowest state of distress. The Canal has given 5,000,000 roubles from his own private purse to the famine fund, and has issued an appeal to the members of the nobility and the landed gentry to form another fund for relief of the famishing people.

According to a dispatch from Shanghai, the Kola-bu has caused the walls of Wo Chang, a large city in the province of Hoo-Pee, on the Yangtse-Kiang, to be placarded with posters announcing that all missionaries will shortly be exterminated. The wettest place in the world is said to be at Cherra Ponjee, in the Khasi hills of Assam. The fall of rain for a single month has ranged from 100 to 200 inches. Notices received on the 22d inst. in Buenos Ayres, from Asuncion, the capital of the Republic of Paraguay, bring news of an attempt there to overthrow President Juan G. Gonzalez. The attempted revolution, however, was promptly suppressed by the troops loyal to the government.

A rich amber deposit, it is reported, has been discovered in Ontario, the estimated value of which is $7,000,000.

NOTICES.

CARD CALENDAR.—Friends' Calendar for 1892 is now on sale at Friends' Book Store, Erie, a nickel each; when sent by mail, a dime for each copy, or a dozen copies for three-quarters of a dollar.

ERRATUM.—The writer of the obituary notice of Hannah Warrington informs us that she was recommended as a Minister in 1822 instead of in 1823, as therein stated.

BIBLE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS.—The Annual Meeting of the Bible Association of Friends in America will be held on Fourth-day, Eleventh Month 4th, at 8 P. M., in the Lecture Room of Friends' School, 140 North Sixteenth Street. Friends generally are invited to attend.

ZEBEDEE HAINES, Supt., Westwton, Penna.

WANTED.—A woman Friend desires a situation at light housekeeping, or care of invalid.

Address, Office of "THE FRIEND."

WANTED.—Two young women want evening work to do at home; no machine sewing, otherwise not particular. Can give good recommendation.

Address, H. E. S.,
Phila. P. O., Penna.

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting House, Muncy, Pa., Tenth Month 7, 1891, CHARLES ELLIS ECROYD, son of James and Rachel H. Ecroyd, of the former place, to LUCRA H., daughter of the late George B. and H. Mary S. Taylor, of Philadelphia.

DIED, on the 14th of Ninth Month, CAROLINE SMITH, an esteemed member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Western District. She was the daughter of William and Ann Smith, and a grand-daughter of William Smith (broker), one of the seventeen Friends exiled to Virginia, in 1778, for alleged sympathy with the British crown, and because they could not conscientiously take the oath of allegiance to the Revolutionary Government. Caroline's parents were discerned from Friends early in their married life, for participation in the fashionable amusements of the day, and Caroline was brought up in much gayety, but about her twentieth year, yielding to religious conviction, she renounced her gay companionships, her "bat and feathers," and adopting a plain dress, she made application and was received into religious fellowship with Friends on the ground of conviction. Ever after that she was a firm and consistent adherent to the doctrinal views and testimonies of the Society. Although her own means were limited she always had something to share with those less favored than herself. Her industry and energy were remarkable, and while strength lasted she occupied much time in sewing and knitting for the object of her sympathy. She made personal distribution of her handiwork, usually accompanied by a tract or little book, a good variety of which she always carried with her in her bag, and with these went the kindness or the gentle admonition ministering to the recipient the helpful stimulant of her own cheerful but chastened spirit. She bore a lingering illness with great patience and resignation, and trusting only to the mercy of Him in whom she had believed, she peacefully passed away in her eighty-second year.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Selections from the Journal of William Evans.

1843.—"Went to our beloved afflicted friend Mildred Ratcliff's; dined and lodged. She expressed her gladness at seeing me, and frequently spoke of the goodness of her Lord and Master; with whom she said she had precious communion when left alone; though at other times deeply mourning over the state of the church. She said she loved the Truth and its blessed cause, and believed that the Lord would preserve a faithful remnant, who would be enabled to maintain its doctrines and its testimonies. These would not be permitted to fall to the ground; but the Lord would continue to raise up those whom He would qualify to support them, as in the days of our early Friends, and to bear a plain testimony against wrong things. She was particularly strong in her disapprobation of Friends sleeping in our meetings for Divine worship; on account of which, she said, some thought she had been too severe; but she was decided that such sleeping Quakers were stumbling blocks to honest inquirers after the truth, and that they were denying the faith that would give the victory over all such weaknesses.

"Some Friends came in the evening, which we passed in pleasant, and, I hope, instructive conversation; principally on the state of our religious Society; both in relation to our besetting difficulties, and also on the cheering evidences without and within, that the gracious Head of the church has not forsaken us; but is visiting our dear young people, and giving gifts to sons and daughters, for his glory, and theirs and the church's benefit."

W. E. returned home on the 17th of First Month.

"The low state of our Society, in many respects and in many parts, has been much upon me; with apprehensions that some who have been visited, are not coming forward in the strength and devotedness that they ought; while others seem more disposed to promote the assimilating of the members of our Society with others, than to build it up on the faith which the first members were built upon. These things are discouraging; and yet there are not a few among us who are united in the fellowship of suffering; and are praying and watching for the consolation of Israel. If these can do no more, they may, through faithfulness, deliver their own souls; and others, seeing their steadfastness, may be drawn to follow them as they follow Christ. To-day I attended the Northern District Monthly Meeting. At the close of the last meeting a word of exhortation sprung in my heart, to encourage Friends to daily, inward travail of soul; that they may be kept alive in the Truth. It was this that made us, in the beginning, a living people, and in which the members were made helpful to one another, and quick in discerning the devices of the enemy, who is always seeking our destruction, both individually and as a body."

1843, Fifth Month.—"I obtained a minute from the Monthly Meeting, and attended New York Yearly Meeting, throughout most of which I found it my place to keep under a silent travail of spirit, for my own preservation, and that I might be ready to receive the intimations of religious duty whenever it pleased the Lord to put me forth in his service. On First-day morning, in the large meeting room, after my friend Thomas Kite had been engaged in the ministry, my way appeared to open to rise with the call of the prophet Jeremiah, 'Pass over the isles of Chittim, and see; send unto Kedar, and consider diligently, and see if there be such a thing: Hath a nation changed their gods, which are yet no gods? but my people have changed their glory for that which doth not profit. Be astonished, O ye heavens, at this, and be horribly afraid, be ye very desolate, saith the Lord. For my people have committed two evils; they have forsaken me, the Fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water.' I was led to show that, like the Children of Israel, many among us have forsaken the Truth; and where they have done this, they have attempted in various instances to invent substitutes for obedience to the Divine will, inwardly made known, and taking up the cross daily and following Christ in the path of self-denial. It was through the immediate revelation of the Spirit of God, that his disciples could know and declare Him to be the Christ, the Son of the Living God; and it is only by the manifestation of the same Spirit, that any now can have true and saving faith in Him. The indispensable necessity of receiving Christ in the heart, that we may know Him for ourselves to save us from our sins, and the danger of losing that precious state, after we have known it, was opened to the people; and his humbling, solemnizing power was felt among us."

In the Fifth Month of 1843, our friend procured the requisite minute of the approbation and unity of his Friends, to make a religious visit to Indiana Yearly Meeting and some of its meetings. He thus alluded to one of these:

"First-day, a large concourse of people came together. The young people were unsettled; coming into the meeting at a late hour, and many going out very soon. This is an evidence of defective education; for were they properly instructed, they could not easily disturb a religious meeting; nor would they feel the same inclination to be going out, were their minds impressed, as they ought to be, with the solemnity of Divine worship. In the forenoon I was silent, other Friends being engaged in the ministry; but in the afternoon I was led to call the attention of Friends to the afflictions, permitted to overtake the Society; and to consider how far our unfaithfulness had brought them upon us. To examine how far the world and its attractions had absorbed the mind; so that some may have forgotten the duties they owe to their Almighty Creator; their spiritual eye had become dim, and they unable to sound an alarm at the approach of the enemy, because they had lost their discernment. The young people were also spoken to, on their conduct; and all classes invited to draw near to the Lord Almighty; that they might be clothed with the spirit of prayer, to cry unto Him for help in this day of trial; and come up faithfully, in their generation, in showing forth the excellency of the religion we profess, and laboring in its blessed cause. I hope the Spirit of Him who seeketh to save that which is lost, and to preserve those who are in danger, was the clothing of my mind; and that his power was exalted over disorderly walkers; and the rightly-exercised comforted."

"Third-day. After the business was finished, it seemed incumbent upon me, to endeavor to open a little of the concern I felt, particularly for the young men, in these times of commotion and division; when many spirits are abroad in the world, seeking to unsettle their minds, and draw them from that inward abiding with Christ, the Captain of salvation; wherein only we can be preserved, receive a knowledge of our place and service in the church; and wisdom to do what He requires of us. The danger of listening to those, who would spoil them, through philosophy and vain deceit; and of being led astray from Christ, the Sun of Righteousness; so as to become like wandering stars, was plainly held out to them. The faithful laborers, striving to stem the current of disaffection, were encouraged to maintain their ground, with Christian firmness; and the young men invited to deep indwelling at the feet of Jesus; that they may be prepared to bear their share of the weight of the ark, and stand nobly in their day for the cause of Christ."

"8th. First-day. Attended their morning meeting in Cincinatti; in which I was enabled to set forth the nature of the Christian religion; which changes the heart, and constrains us, as one of the first duties, to do justly in the sight of our great Creator; not as men pleasers, or eye-servants, but in the Lord's fear, who searches the heart. This vital, practical religion, regulates the natural passions and propensities; brings them into subjection, and qualifies man in every station in life, to glorify God in his body and in his spirit, which are his. In its nature and operation, it is plain and simple; consisting in obedience to the Divine will, as made known in the heart. As man, through the power of Divine Grace, glorifies his Maker, he works out his own salvation, with fear and trembling, before Him; and at the same time, is fitted for the Lord's service in the world and in the church. Thomas Kite ended the meeting with prayer.

"Feeling a concern to see the members alone, I proposed they should convene in the afternoon; which was agreed to. The number now composing this meeting, we were informed, is about one hundred males and one hundred and fifty females. A pretty large company collected, principally young persons; and I had an opportunity to show, that separated as they are from the body of Friends, some of them coming from places where they had many advantages, they have increasing need to watch and pray, lest they enter into the temptations around them. Habits or principles, not congenial with the purity and self-denial of the Gospel, getting among them, may easily spread; unless those who know the voice of the true Shepherd, keep a firm ground, in steadily opposing wrong things. Faithfulness is not only of great moment to themselves, but may also be so, to the rising city where they dwell. They were affectionately entreated to yield to the tendering convictions of the Spirit of Christ, which some of them had known to operate powerfully on the heart; and lay aside those things which He required them to give up; that He may fashion them for his use; and they would receive the consolations of his peace, to reward them for obedience. Parents were impressively exhorted to watch over the children committed to their charge; commanding them in love, and restraining them from unsuitable things; that, as delegated shepherds, they might guard them from the corruptions of the world, and prepare their hearts for the seed of the kingdom. And no greater joy will they have in advanced life, next to Divine approbation, than to see their sons as olive plants around their table, and their daughters as corner-stones, polished by the Truth, after the similitude of a palace. I felt peaceful; Divine help having been extended, to qualify for the discharge of duty."

"Twelfth Mo. 23d. Feeling my mind drawn to go down to Westtown school, I set off this morning. Two deaths having occurred among the scholars, sympathy, and the impression of duty, induced me to make them a visit. Attended their meeting the next day. I was excited among them in the authority of Truth; being in the first place, led to deal plainly with some of the children; who, it felt to me, were under very little religious restraint in their own minds; but were doing what, at times, they knew was wrong, and inciting one another to the same improper conduct. Then I was turned to the care-takers; to encourage them to a more fervent travail of soul for themselves, and for the children entrusted to their charge. The power of Truth spread over the meeting, and brought the spirits of some down; tendered others, and I hope impressions were made that will be lastingly useful. In the afternoon I felt bound to open to them the ground of our testimony to the use of the plain language; thou and thee to one, and you to more than one. It was the Scripture language from Genesis to Revelations; and it was our duty to avoid the corruptions brought in through pride; also, of our testimony against the vain titles given to men, and against the heathen names of the days and months. I returned home on the 25th in peace; but as is very common with me, in poverty of spirit."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Some Superfluous Titles.

A brief article lately appeared in "THE FRIEND," giving the testimony of William F. Davis, of Boston, concerning the simple, Scriptural manner of speech as held by Friends. The following from a Methodist paper, the Christian Neighbor, appeared about the same time, and is a similar "strong endorsement of our testimony to plainness of speech." The editor says, referring to the printed minutes of a Yearly Meeting which he had lately received:

"The plain, straightforward way of doing business, as shown by the minutes is worthy of imitation by other religious assemblies. Throughout the minutes we fail to find Mr., Mrs., Rev., D. D., Col., Major, Professor, Esquire or any other prefix or suffix to the name of any of the many persons—men and women mentioned in the proceedings. God bless the Quakers in their simplicity and zeal in the maintenance of 'the faith which was once delivered unto the saints.'"

When riding in a train some months ago, a man whom I knew by face but not by name seated himself beside me, and handed me his card by way of introduction. He had not much more than done so, when he extended his hand for it, and, at the same time taking a pencil from his pocket, effectually marked out the "Rev." which preceded his name. He then handed it back with some deprecatory remark about the title being of no consequence to him. It would seem as though it might very well have been dropped before it went to the printer.

The late Nathan Brown, of New England, a Baptist, and for many years a missionary in Assam and Japan, and translator of portions of the Bible into the vernacular of those lands, having had conferred upon him (1855) the degree of "Doctor of Divinity" by Williams College, responded:

"I have long felt, in common no doubt with many others, that the customary use of D. D. as a mark of distinction among ministers of the Gospel, or as an appendage to the common address of an individual, is liable to serious objections. Regarded simply as a college honor like the title of A. B. or A. M. its application would be attended with fewer inconveniences." He hence trusts that his friends will both write to and speak of him in a plain manner.

"The Guide to Holiness lately referred to the 'inappropriety of the term 'Reverend' applied to ministers'; and added, 'We should welcome its disuse, and the doctrinate also.' It thence showed a desire to exemplify its convictions, by printing a page of 'News from the Field,' with the names of the numerous ministering brethren mentioned shorn of the inappropriate title.

It is to be hoped that some under our name in the West, who are reaching after the appellation of 'Friends' Church,' as a designation of our corporate membership, will rest satisfied with the name which has customarily been applied to our religious assemblies and gathering places.

When the body of members shall have been called the "Church," the houses for assembling will be similarly named, and it will become correspondingly easier to introduce the "pastor," steeple, bell, organ, &c. Christ Jesus, who is not divided, is "the Head of the body, the Church." It were not well, it seems to me, to invest this term with any denominational or sectarian association. Plenty of claimants there be in the ecclesiastical world to the exclusive custodianship of the "true Church;" so, let us neither add to the confusion, nor be ashamed of designating our religious gatherings as "meetings," and our places of assembly "meeting houses," as of yore. The religious bodies commonly known as Non-Conformists have mostly submitted to the substitution now proposed for us. Have we a clear call to follow after?

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Eastern Shore of Chesapeake Bay.

About the year 1744, John Griffith, who then resided in Darby, near Philadelphia, visited meetings at Cecil, Thirldhaven and other adjacent places, in company with Michael Lightfoot. He says, "we were greatly favored" in them.

John Griffith afterwards removed to England, and when in this country on a religious visit in 1766, he again visited meetings on the Eastern Shore. Some of these were large, "and the truths of the Gospel powerfully declared in them, and the everlasting, unchangeable Truth was exalted over all of a contrary nature to itself."

In 1754 Samuel Fothergill, after visiting meetings in Maryland, writes to his brother and sister: "The state of the Church is very low thereaway, their numbers small, but their care and zeal for Truth in general, less than their numbers, so that I could not avoid a daily pain of heart on their account, while with them."

Catharine Phillips, who went over the same ground in the following year, appears to have been similarly impressed with the low spiritual condition of the meetings. She says, "We had laborious travail of spirit, the life of Truth being low in that quarter, but through infinite goodness, the testimony of it was raised in a good degree of authority. We had a comfortable hope respecting some young people hereaway."

In 1759 William Reckitt, while visiting in those parts, had to bear testimony against the unfaithfulness of those who brought dishonor upon their holy profession; but he felt the love of the Gospel flow freely, even towards the backsliders.

In 1766, and again in 1768, John Woolman paid religious visits to Friends on the Eastern Shore of Maryland, and believed it his duty to travel on foot among them—one of the inducements to which was, that he "might have more lively feeling of the condition of the oppressed slaves." He says that Pennsylvania and New Jersey were settled by Friends who were convinced of our principles in England in times of suffering, and coming over bought lands of the natives and applied themselves to husbandry in a peaceable way. Few Friends settled in the southern provinces, but there were considerable convictions there through the faithful labors of travelling Friends in early times. The first settlers were an imperious, warlike people, who were engaged in numerous quarrels with the Indians.

In 1771 Joseph Oxley visited Maryland, but he gives very few particulars of his journey, except to describe his passage of the Choptank River in a boat, when he was in great danger of perishing from adverse winds.

In 1763 Daniel Stanton, of Philadelphia, felt it right to visit meetings in the Peninsula. Some of these opportunities were solid and edifying, and of one of them he remarks, "I thought it was a time of tender visitation to the people."

Towards the end of the century several ministers were sent by the Head of the Church into that section of the country; so that there is reason to hope it may have been a time of renewed visitation to many. Among these were Job Scott, Martha Routh and Richard Jordan.

Job Scott's journey was taken in 1789 and extended through a large part of the settlements then existing in the Southern States. He appears to have had great service among those of other denominations. When at the Cliffs, on the west side of the bay, he says, "We had a glorious meeting at Friends' meeting-house, but mostly among such as were not Friends, many of them being called Methodists, a people that abound in this land; and some of their hearts have been touched with a live coal from the holy altar; but they seem very unsettled, many having hurried forward into much religious activity, being very noisy, talkative, and almost, if not quite, ranting. Yet I hope some of them will come to a settlement in the Truth; but expect many will quite run out, and finally shake off their religious exercise; this being the natural consequence of making haste into religious performances without the pure leadings of Truth therein. My heart and mouth were largely opened among them in this and divers other meetings; and this day, in a special manner, the streams of life flowed plentifully and sweetly, to the refreshment of many minds."

In a letter to his wife in which he freely unbosoms his feelings, he thus speaks of the character of the meetings, among Methodists and others: "Oh! the tenderness, the brokenness, the sighs and tears, which seem irresistibly to flow forth, and abound, from meeting to meeting, among many whose hearts seem pierced with the pure power of the Word of Life. Doctrines flow like oil."

In another letter he says: "I often think if Friends in these states were deep in the life of Truth, and the ministry in true Gospel authority, many who are awakened would flock into our Zion, as doves to their windows. But alas, when they look towards Friends, they can see or feel little to draw or fix their attention."

When Richard Jordan travelled in these parts, in 1797, he found in some places, "great openness in the minds of the people generally, and they flocked together in abundance, at a very short notice, when they heard there was to be a public meeting." He appears to have made a very general visit, and remarks towards the conclusion of his narrative, "It was given me to believe that there is seed in these parts near to be gathered, if Friends keep their habitations in the Truth; which is the prayer of my soul for them."

The reader must not suppose that the few Friends, from whose journals the preceding extracts were made, were the only ones who, in the love of the Gospel, labored among our members and others in the Eastern Shore of Maryland. The epistles sent to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting from that of Maryland, frequently speak of the company and labors of ministers in attendance.

Several of the Friends who paid religious visits in Maryland towards the close of last century, speak of the Nicholites. John Woolman says, that at the meetings he held at Motherkill, Tuckahoe and Marshy Creek, "were a considerable number of people, followers of one Joseph Nichols, a preacher; who, I understand, is not in outward fellowship with any religious society of people, but professes nearly the same principles as our Society doth, and often travels up and down, appointing meetings, to which many people come. I heard Friends speaking of some of their neighbors who had been irreligious people, that were now his followers, and were sober, well-behaved men and women."

Richard Jordan, bears a similar testimony: "They are a plain people, both in their dress and manners, and much esteemed by their neighbors for their uprightness and honesty in their dealings, and I was induced to believe that many of them were not far from the kingdom of heaven."

These people were very similar to Friends in their testimony against war, swearing, slavery, hireling ministry, and superfluity in dress, &c. Indeed, in their own records, they style themselves, "Friends, or New Quakers." The similarity which existed between Friends and the Nicholites was so close, that there seemed no sufficient reason for belonging to separate organizations. This was evident to themselves, and prepared the way for their uniting with Friends. Accordingly, a minute was adopted by Centre Monthly Meeting of this people, and addressed to Thirdhaven Monthly Meeting and expressing their belief that advantage would flow from an union. With this minute was sent a list of eighty names of persons who agreed to the proposal.

Thirdhaven Monthly Meeting appointed a committee to take an opportunity in a collective capacity with these people, as to the ground of their request. The advice of the Quarterly Meeting was asked, who recommended that they should be visited individually, or in their families, which appears to have been done. The applicants with their children amounted to about four hundred. The three meetings of Northwest Fork, Centre and Tuckahoe Neck, were formerly Nicholite meetings, and were transferred to Friends, when those people joined our Society. These events took place in the last two or three years of last century.

In the year 1755 five vessels containing Acadian exiles arrived at Annapolis, and were sent to different parts of the province. Scharf states that by the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, this harmless people (of French origin) had been brought under the dominion of the English, but were to retain their lands unmolested. They were probably the most inoffensive people then dwelling on the earth. They were treated, however with great harshness by their new masters, on the ground that at the capture of Fort Beaulieu, a number of Acadians had been found in the garrison, who asserted that they were kept there against their will. Finally an order was procured from England that they should be expelled from their homes, and the execution of the sentence was entrusted to the New England troops. At a general assembly of the Acadians at Grand Pre, they were notified to quit the province at once, retaining only their money and household effects, their lands and their live stock being declared forfeited to the crown.

Vessels were provided for their transport, and into these the unhappy Acadians were driven. During the fall and winter, the deportation continued; fathers being separated from children, husbands from wives, and as the different vessels had different destinations, the separation in many cases was eternal. A few escaped, and hid in the woods; and to insure their perishing, the crops were destroyed and the barns and houses burnt.

The number of exiles was about 7,000, of whom about 900 came to Maryland.

The connection of the French with the Indians, then waging war on the frontiers, caused these innocent sufferers to be looked upon with suspicion—which was increased by their being professors of the Roman Catholic religion—but their poverty and hard fate appealed to the sympathies of the humane, and homes were found for them in various parts of the province, where their descendants still survive.

FOR "THE FRIENDS."

A Walk About Merchantville.

In the vicinity of Merchantville, in Camden Co., N. J., there is a small tract of low-lying, swampy ground, partially overgrown with bushes, which furnishes a number of kinds of wild flowers. On the 30th of the Ninth Month, the writer made a visit to this and some other places in the neighboring country. It was late in the season for flowers, yet there still remained in bloom some of the asters and golden rods, two or three species of Thoroughwort (Eupatorium), and a few other late-blooming plants.

But the matured fruit, which was now visible on many plants, whose bloom had passed away, was a source of as much interest as the flowers themselves would have been. My attention was soon attracted by a shrub, the branches of which were thickly studded with bright red fruits, about the size of a large currant. These were placed in the axils of the leaves. They would commonly be called berries, but more properly should be classed with the stone fruits or drupes, such as the cherry and plum—for the fleshy substance encloses several hard stones, each containing a seed.

The plant was the Black Alder, or Winter-berry (Ilex verticillata), which in summer bears small clusters of white flowers.

The process by which the fruit is developed from the blossom is one of the most interesting things in the vegetable kingdom. Botanists consider the parts of a flower as modified leaves. The essentials of a perfect flower are the pistil or pistils, usually placed in the centre; the stamens or pollen-bearing organs; and the envelopes which surround them, in most cases consisting of colored leaves. If we imagine the blade of a leaf curved inwards until the edges meet and unite, they will form a closed case or pod, which is the ovary at the bottom of the pistil, and in this the future seeds are to be developed, along the line of junction of the edges. The edges of the altered leaf turned outwards, either at the tip or along the upper portion, form what is termed the stigma of the pistil, which presents a moist or clammy surface to which the grains of pollen given out by the stamens readily adhere. When a grain of pollen has thus been attached to the stigma, it absorbs moisture from it and soon commences to grow, forming a tube which penetrates to the cavity of the ovary and conveys thither the matter which the grain had contained, and which has the power of fertilizing the ovules and causing them to form the seeds. The growth of the seeds is often attended by remarkable changes in the walls of the ovary which contains them, and in the floral envelopes and other organs.

The original leaf, which by the inward curving of its blades and their growing together formed the cavity in which the seeds are formed, becomes sometimes thick and fleshy, and the two faces of it widely separated. In the peach, for example, the outer wall or membrane of the leaf assumes the yellow or red tint of the ripened fruit. The luscious flesh is developed on its inner face; while the inside wall hardens into the stone that protects the seed. These fruits can be greatly modified by cultivation, and thus are produced the numerous varieties which our gardeners supply to us.

It was by such a process as above described that the red berries of the Black Alder took the place of the white blossoms that preceded them.

On the edge of the woods were growing some small trees with dark green leaves, and clusters of round fruits, each more than an inch in diameter. It was the well-known Persimmon Tree (Diospyros Virginiana). Though very asstringent in their present green state, they become sweet and luscious when fully ripened by exposure to the frosts of early winter. This fruit is a berry rather than a drupe, for it has no inside stony lining like the peach or cherry, but the large flat seeds are imbedded in the flesh or pulp which reaches to the centre.

As I wandered through the woods I encountered a man gathering the nuts of the shellbark hickory. This form of fruit has a stony cover to the seed like the peach, but the outer wall of its ovary, instead of becoming soft and fleshy like that fruit, hardens into a thick case, or shell, which at length splits into four parts and allows the ripened nut to drop out.

The bright red or deep crimson fruit of the common Sumach (Rhus Glaberrima) furnished me with another example of a drupe like fruit—the individual seeds being nut-like and surrounded with a brilliantly colored envelope, but without much pulp or other material.

Along the road-side were growing a number of the common milk-weed (Asclepias Cornuti), whose fruit consisted of a pod several inches in length, formed by the enlargement of the original ovary. Some of these had split open along one edge—showing that they were what botanists term follicles. Inside, the seeds were closely and beautifully packed, overlapping one another, and each furnished with a tuft of long, silky hairs; on shaking one of the plants with my cane, the breeze swept many of them away to a distance, the silky fibres serving as sails to waft them over the land. The seed pods of a tiktrefoil (Desmodium) were furnished with another appliance (and one quite effectual) to secure their distribution. When mature they divide across into small flat, one-seeded joints, each of which is coated with strong curved hairs or hooks, by means of which they adhere to the clothing of a person or to the hairs of a passing animal, and are thus carried far and wide—I have sometimes found hundreds of them on my pants and coat after passing through a field where the plants abounded.

Another plant, whose seed vessels are somewhat similarly equipped, is the Cockle Bur (Xanthium Strumarium), which Gray calls a vile weed. It is a low-growing, branching plant with large coarse leaves and altogether unattractive in its appearance. It grows most abundantly on roadsides—especially those along which cattle and sheep are driven. The fruit consists of burrs one-half of an inch or more in length, thickly beset with projecting points, the ends of which are bent over into sharp-pointed hooks, which become entangled in the hair or fleeces of the flocks—greatly to the annoyance of the wool-grower, but equally to the advantage of the plant which thus provides for the wide dissemination of its seeds.

Abundant in the fields at this season of the year are the species of Beggar-ticks and Spanish Needles (Didens), the dry seed vessel of which is crowned, not with silky fibres like the Milk Weed, but with two or more slender and firm arms, thickly barbed with points projecting backwards—an admirable arrangement for adhering to clothing or fleeces of animals. I suppose there are but few of my readers who have rambled in the fields in the autumn of the year, that have not found themselves to be the unwitting agents in the dissemination of the seeds of these plants.

IN THE VINEYARD.

A HARVEST LYRIC.

BY FRANCIS TURNER PALGRAVE.

Within a trellised angle idly laid
'Neath the green lulling shade,
Shunning the toil they hardly seemed to shun,
Who waste the priceless hours
When man's best work is done?

As from the unsilvered grass the dawn dew fled,
The vineyard's Lord and Head
Called in the market-place the stalwart crew
Of laborers ruddy-brown,
Pledging each man his due.

Yet—for God smiled on that full crop, and it
Was for the vintage fit—
Again the Lord went forth, and hiring more Sent with their baskets in,
To pile the purple store.

And now the sudden twilight pause is near
When the three stars appear,
Signals of eve and rest from toil retired,
While yet the loiterers lie
Listless, unasked, unhired.

But when the Master's call upon them broke,
To manhood's part they woke,
Each offering his best strength of heart and limb,
And only only felt
The bliss of work for Him.

So these last till the night when none can toil
Gather the harvest spoil;
Last these; yet when the gate was closed, the Lord
Summoning around Him all,
Gave them the like reward.

At the true heart's love-labor, one by one,
Rating the service done;
Not the world's surface-standard, by success
Weighing the man, and blind
To the inward more and less.

The day far spent, yet for my Saviour's sake,
Lord! ere thine angels take
The tares and wheat of earth's last harvest-home,
E'en at the eleventh hour
May I be called, and come!

FOR "THE FRIEND."

IN THE SECRET OF HIS PRESENCE.

In the secret of his presence,
I am kept from strife of tongues;
His pavilion is arched me,
And within are countless songs!
Stormy winds, his word fulfilling,
Beat without, but cannot harm,
For the Master's voice is stilling
Storm and tempest into calm.

In the secret of his presence,
All the darkness disappears;
For a Sun that knows no setting
Throws a rainbow on my tears.
So the day grows ever lighter,
Broadening to the perfect noon;
So the way grows ever brighter,
Heaven is coming near and soon.

In the secret of his presence
Nay, more can I feel alarm;
In the shadow of the Highest,
I can meet them with a pain;
For the strong pavilion hides me—
Turns their fiery darts aside,
And I know what'er betides me,
I shall live because He died!

In the secret of his presence
Is a sweet unbroken rest;
Pleasures, joys in glorious fulness
Making earth like Eden blest:
So my peace grows deep and deeper
Widening as it utters the sea,
For my Saviour is my Keeper,
Keeping mine, and keeping me!

In the secret of his presence
Jesus keeps, I know not how;
In the shadow of the Highest,
I am resting, hiding now.

THE SERVICE.

"He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much."

I cannot do great things for Him,
Who did so much for me;
But I would like to show my love,
Lord Jesus, unto Thee,
Faithful in very little things,
O Saviour, may I be.

There are small things in daily life
In which I may obey,
And thus may show my love to Thee;
And always—every day—
There are some little loving words,
Which I, for Thee, may say.

There are small crosses I may take;
Small burdens I may bear;
Small acts of faith, and words of love,
Small sorrows I may share;
And little bits of work for Thee—
I may do everywhere.

So I ask Thee, Lord, to give me grace—
My little place to fill;
That I may ever walk with Thee,
And ever do Thy will,
And in each duty, great or small,
I may be faithful still.

A TRUE STORY.—"Papa, will you please give me fifty cents for my spring hat? 'Most all the academy girls have theirs."

"No, May; I can't spare the money."
The above request was persistently made by a sixteen-year-old maiden as she was preparing for school, one fine spring morning. The refusal came from the parent in a curt, indifferent tone. The disappointed girl went to school. The father started for his place of business. On his way thither he met a friend, and, being half fellow well met, he invited him into Mac's for a drink. As usual, there were others there, and the man that could not spare his daughter fifty cents for a hat, treated the crowd.

When about to leave, he laid a half-dollar on the counter, which just paid for the drinks. Just then the saloon-keeper's daughter entered, and going behind the bar, said: "Papa, I want fifty cents for my new spring hat."

"All right," said the dealer, and taking up the half-dollar from the counter, he handed it over to the girl, who departed smiling.

May's father seemed dazed, walked out alone, and said to himself: "I had to bring my fifty cents here for the rumseller's daughter to buy a hat with, after refusing it to my own. I'll never drink another drop." And he kept his pledge.—Philadelphia Methodist.

EPICURE.—An epicure has no sinure; he is unmade, and eventually dished by many dishes. Champagne falsifies its name, when once it begins to affect his system; his stomach is so deranged in its punctuation, that his colon makes a point of coming to a full stop; keeping it up late, ends in his being laid down early; and the bon vivant who has been always hunting pleasure, finds at last, that he has been only whipping and spurring, that he might be the sooner in at his own death!

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Extracts from My Christian Experience.

BY T. G. TAYLOR, THE CONVERTED CONVICT.

A PRESENT CONCERN.

We are told in Scripture, that this life is a seed-time, and the future is the harvest. "He that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; he that soweth to the spirit, shall of the spirit reap life everlasting."

Happiness or misery is the development of our present characters, for is it not written, "He that is holy let him be holy still, and he that is unjust, let him be unjust still?" Is it not plain then, that religion is a thing we must have here, for if this life be the seed-time of the future, how can we expect to reap in another world other harvests than we have been sowing here? How can we hope that Heaven shall be our eternal inheritance, unless the earnest be begun in our souls on earth?

"Nothing is worth a thought beneath
But how I may escape the death
That never, never dies;
How make my own election sure
And when I fall on earth secure
A mansion in the skies?"

FORGIVENESS.

Revenge and hatred will lead to the abodes of misery—forgiveness and love to Heaven above. Our blessed Saviour directs us to pray for forgiveness, and informs us that if we forgive not men their trespasses against us, our heavenly Father will not forgive our sins, and hence unless we possess a forgiving spirit we cannot enter Heaven. We cannot be happy so long as we meditate revenge to a fellow-being. There is delight in forgiving and being forgiven. How quick a reunion of heart takes place, when pardon is asked, and "I forgive thee" escapes the lips once alienated and estranged. But, alas, how many (even professing Christians) indulge in this spirit of revenge. Oh! how they lose sight of Jesus, who was ever ready to forgive the injuries heaped upon Him; who returned not evil for evil, but good for evil, kindness for ingratitude.

"Where is the heart that will not throb and heave
At the faint cry, forgive me, Oh forgive?"

START RIGHT.

During the few years of my imprisonment and Christian pilgrimage, I have known men who on a sudden leap into religion; they get it quickly, keep it for a time, and at last lose it, because they did not receive it the right way, even by the way of the cross, which is looked upon as unpleasant, therefore before the Holy Spirit has wrought a good work in them, and they have been brought to give up all and trust in Christ, they make a profession of religion. "This is setting up in business without a stock in trade, and there must be a failure."

Let us recollect that we must pass through the dark tunnel of conviction, before we can come out into the sunshine of salvation.

What is the good of outward religion unless we have the root of the matter in us? Unless the heart has been plowed with the plough of the spirit, and sown with the sacred seed of the Gospel, the harvest cannot be realized. There must be a right start in running the Christian race or there can be no hope of winning the Crown.

SPRINGVILLE, IOWA, Tenth Month, 1891.

Natural History, Science, etc.

The Meteorites of Mexico.—The most remarkable meteoric irons of America as respects size and weight are found upon the table-lands of Mexico.

The largest irons occur in the State of Chihuahua and are known as the "meteorites of Chapaderos." According to the history of Philip II they were discovered by the explorer Antonio de Espejo in 1581. This refers to the two largest blocks lying in the soil some three hundred yards apart but evidently broken one from the other at the time of the fall. This becomes strikingly evident when the two models are brought together end to end, for the ragged projections of one fit into the depressions in the other, and the thickness at the contact is the same in both. The smaller of the blocks so represented by the cast is about seven feet in length and three feet six inches in breadth and eighteen inches in thickness. Its density is 7.80 and its weight by calculation is not less than 18,500 pounds or over nine tons. The second and larger portion measures over eight feet in length, six and a half feet in width, and about sixteen inches in thickness. Its mass is calculated as two cubic meters, and its weight 31,200 pounds.

The two portions if united would present the appearance of an irregular plate or tabular mass over fifteen feet long, from three to six feet wide and half a yard thick, and would weigh nearly twenty-five tons. Both masses contain the mineral troilite, a protosulphid of iron, characteristic of meteoric masses, giving additional evidence, if any were needed, of the extra-terrestrial origin of these irons.

It is hard to conceive how such a massive plate of metal could have been broken asunder even by the force of the shock of contact with the surface of the earth; but such fractures are common in meteorites and are explained by the resistance of the air producing sudden and great heat of the outer portions of the intensely cold body from the frigid regions of space.

Sweet Potato Black Rot.—The Journal of Mycology issued by the United States Department of Agriculture, contains an examination of this destructive disease, and the natural history of the fungus which causes it. The most conspicuous sign of the disease is the presence of dark, somewhat greenish spots, extending some distance into the tissue itself. These spots are sunken areas with distinct margins, like spots burned into the potato with a metal dye which has left the skin unharmed.

The sprouts produced by a diseased potato are themselves infected with the fungus, and in their turn produce diseased potatoes. If a potato, on which the fungus has developed, is stored in a bin with sound tubers, the fungus will spread through the bin and infect almost the whole contents.

Experiments on the best methods of checking the disease are still in course of trial—one of the most important precautions is to plant only sprouts from healthy tubers; and another is, to avoid raising potatoes in ground impregnated with the disease. Decaying roots and refuse should be removed from the field and burned.

Strains on Railroad Bridges.—The Board of Railroad Commissioners of the State of New York was established in Second Month, 1883, and within a year from that date a thorough investigation was commenced for the purpose of obtaining exact knowledge of the strains brought to bear upon the members of all railroad bridges and trusses in the State. The report of this investigation has just been published and makes a volume of nearly 2,000 pages.

The Commissioners were moved to take this action by the occurrence of several accidents from defective bridges. On Second Month 17, 1883, a temporary bridge or trestle over Allen's Creek, on the Genesee Valley Railroad, between Rochester and Hinsdale, gave way while a freight train was crossing, which resulted in the death of the fireman and the severe bruising of the engineer. The master carpenter of the road admitted that he had recently made repairs to the bridge, but that he did not understand calculating the resistance of beams or trusses to strains. On Tenth Month 22, 1883, an accident occurred on the Glens Falls branch of the Kensinglar and Saratoga Railroad, when three persons were killed and twenty-two wounded. The person in charge of the division of this road upon which the accident occurred declared that he was unable to calculate bridge strains, being merely a bridge carpenter by trade. He judged by experience as to what the different members ought to be, and the strains on the bridge had never been calculated by anybody.

At Weedsport, on the Southern Central Railroad, Second Month 14, 1884, a train had reached the bridge over the Seneca River, when the north span gave way, and the engine, tender and two box cars were precipitated into the river where the water was twenty-two feet deep. The engineer, fireman and a brakeman were drowned, and the cause of the disaster was a defective truss.

An analysis of the strains upon the members of the bridges where the accidents above cited occurred disclosed the fact that in one case more than the breaking load was brought upon beams, and that in other cases strains were habitually brought upon web members, which made it a matter of astonishment that the bridges did not give way sooner than they did.

The Railroad Commissioners found at the very inception of their investigation that on many of the railroads of the State of New York there had been no competent calculation of the strains on the bridges for many years, if at all, the work requiring technical education, familiarity with the theory of mechanics, and a considerable knowledge of mathematics.

The Commissioners, therefore, requested drawings or tracings of all the truss bridges, on all the lines, stating the location of each, and the time when built and full descriptions. Some companies objected to this at first, but all finally complied, and the result has been that railroad managers found defects in many of their bridges of which they had no previous knowledge, and which might never have become known until revealed by some terrible accident. In a number of cases bridges were strengthened before the train sheets were forwarded to the Commissioners. After the sheets were received they were carefully gone over and recalculated.

The number of railroad truss bridges in the State is about two thousand five hundred, not including the New York elevated roads, the strains upon which have also been calculated. Six hundred and sixty-nine truss bridges have been criticised by the Board, of which 535 have been repaired by the various companies, and 134 entirely rebuilt. Cases have occurred, particularly in old bridges, where the iron in the suspension rods was strained at 20,000 pounds to the square inch and more, and where three or more rods constituted the member, there being no certainty that the adjustment was such that each rod was doing its share of the work.

The Commissioners accept the weight of the maximum rolling load, as furnished by each company, unless it is obvious that it is too light, in which case they assume a weight of locomotive, tender and train load likely to arise from the traffic of the road. The rules adopted by the Commissioners require that iron should not be strained per square inch to a greater extent than 10,000 pounds, and wood than 800 pounds, in tension; nor more than 10,000 pounds or 800 pounds in compression, diminishing, however, as the length of the member increases in proportion to its diameter, in accordance with well-regulated formulas.

There has been, of late years, a great increase in the weight of rolling stock. There were many bridges still standing which were built when the maximum weight of locomotives and tenders was 55 tons, and the maximum weight of a freight car and its load was 19 tons. Now locomotive and tender weigh 100 tons, and freight cars, with their loads, 40 tons.

In regard to improvements in modern engineering, the Commissioners say that in the early days of bridge building, particularly of iron bridges, it was the custom to construct trusses of complicated forms, the accurate calculations of the strains on which it is very difficult, in some cases impossible, to compute. An approximation close enough for practical purposes is always reached, however, but a better practice now prevails, and trusses of simple form, admitting of no ambiguity, are alone accepted by the best engineers. In exceptional cases complex trusses have to be resorted to, but they are avoided as much as possible.

The report gives an accurate record of the dimensions of every member of every truss railroad bridge in New York State, and of the strains thereon, as shown by the plans and strain sheets filed in the office of the Commissioners.

If the same careful investigation and correction could be made of the bridges of all railroads of the country, the dangers from accidents would be very much reduced.—Scientific American.

A Copy of a Letter from a Clergyman to P. Brayton.

Friend:—That love that thinketh no evil, and rejoiceth in the truth, constraineth me to say that the exhortation on Wednesday evening was suited to my case or state. I am humbly thankful God hath not left me without his witness in my heart, and also that He hath inclined you to point me out. May I humbly and patiently wait his time of deliverance, and follow by faith his fiery and cloudy pillar all through this howling wilderness. I have, I humbly hope, preached Jesus Christ, but not in your Society; and I hope in a good measure, with a single eye to the glory of God, but having been lately exercised with many severe trials from the professed church, I have been led to retire more inward, to commune with my own heart and be still. I see my own ignorance, my will worship, my forms and modes, &c.

Gospel schemes, my unfeeling prayers, and oftentimes unseasonable preaching, without Spirit and Life, as only arising from a carnal mind, which is enmity with God; and the imagination exalting itself therefrom; from six years of age I have at seasons tasted of Divine love and favor, but, I must lament, I have too often lost the savor of his precious truth. May it be so no more, many times like Israel of old have I been delivered, and as often, like them, have I provoked him by distrust, yet he hath chastised, &c. I have been like a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke. Oh! that I might be so moulded in his heavenly image and daily say; experimentally, "Thy will be done." He indeed renewed his love to me that evening, and since He has caused his grace to distil as the dew, and hath given me to know in his own time and way, He will lengthen my cords and strengthen my stakes, and cause me to break out on the right side and on the left. I feel my spirit melted, while I write this, with the tenderest love and affection towards you that minister in the Word, and towards your Society. I joy in your joys and should sorrow in your sorrows, did I but know them; pardon me if I go so far as to say that I have seen in my mind what the Lord will do in his own time. Anti-Christ will fall in all his power, and a pure primitive church (perhaps like thine) arise out of its ruins, for in the evening time shall be light, and that shall shine brighter and brighter to the perfect day. I have been burdened with the weight of an awful, fearful apprehension that the Lord God has a controversy with us as a nation laden with iniquity, his hand hath been, is, and will be stretched against us, if we do not repent and turn to Him with all our minds. Oh! Friend, I know by many years' experience (though I am but a young man) that if you are faithful to reprove publicly and privately, you will suffer persecution, perhaps even amongst some of your whole hearted people, for all are not Israel that are born of Israel; but continue your faithfulness unto death, and you know who hath said He will give you a crown of life.

I conclude, may the peace of God rule in your heart, and may you be stirred up to thankfulness to Him in your Spirit on my account, and may all that heard you that evening, if He so will, meet to praise Him forever. As for me, at a suitable season, thy people shall be mine. I will live and die in their communion and amongst them (if I can and the Lord please, be buried, thy God shall be my God, and to his grace I am a great debtor.

When you find freedom in prayer, remember
Your affectionate friend,

W. N. F.

Second Month, 1787.

FROM "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER AND JOURNAL."

In a copy of The Friends' Monthly Magazine, 1829-30, I find this quaint picture of early days:—John Audland and John Camm, in the course of their ministerial service passing through Barton, in Oxfordshire, in the year 1654, stopped at the Cross, and exhorted the people to take heed to the light within them, after which they were walking along the street leading their horses, which a young woman, named Maud Hierns, observing, went home and said: "Father, there have been two men preaching at the Cross, and nobody has asked them to eat or to drink." He replied: "O, Maud, and ask them to come here, and bring their horses;" which they did and were hospitably received and entertained, continuing there till next day. During their visit they had much religious conversation with their host, Wm. Hierns, who was an ancient man, a Baptist by profession. He assented to their doctrine, and said: "It is the truth, the very truth; but what would my brethren say to me were I to change my profession?" While they were in conversation Maud placed herself behind John Audland's chair, listening attentively to their communications; her mind was opened to receive the principles they professed, and for her steady perseverance therein she suffered much unkind treatment from her parents, notwithstanding their house was open to entertain traveling Friends. Her going to meeting was much obstructed, particularly by her mother, who used to send her some distance into the fields to milk the cows when she had several miles to walk to meeting.

At length her diligent conduct in the family awakened tenderness in her father towards her, so that he said to his wife: "My dear, if Maud will be a Quaker, let her be a Quaker; she is best of all the children, and she shall have a horse to go to meeting on." Her situation now was rendered much easier; she attended Milton Meeting, to which young Giles Tydmarsh used to go. He one day said to her: "Maud, I want to speak to thee." She replied: "If thou hast anything to say to me, Giles, come to my father's house." He did so, and making matrimonial proposals, it met with the old man's approbation, who thereupon said to his wife: "My dear, if Maud will be a Quaker, a Quaker husband is best for her, and I like Giles well. I will go and speak to his father about it." Giles Tydmarsh, the elder, was then a prisoner in Oxford Castle, on an excommunication for not attending church. They met in the Castle with "Ah! William, how dost do?" "How dost do, Giles? but to the matter in hand; thy son Giles has a mind to my daughter Maud; what wilt thou give thy son?" "I will give him the house in the Nether Row at Chipping Norton." "That's enough, Giles." "And what wilt thou give thy daughter?" "I will give her seventy pounds." "That's enough, William." Matters being fixed they married and lived in the said house. Old Giles Tydmarsh continued a prisoner seven years, and was then released, with about four hundred more in the nation, by letters patent from King Charles, in the year 1672. During his confinement he used to make shoes, his wife or son going every two weeks with work taking away what he had done. It does not appear that after his release he returned to his business again; but with his wife went and lived with his son and daughter, Giles and Maud Tydmarsh, at Chipping Norton. They both lived to be about ninety years of age, she surviving her husband only one day; they were interred in one grave at Milton.

THE BEST RECIPE FOR REST.—there is nothing which will give a chance for rest to overtired nerves so surely as a simple religious faith in the overruling, wise, and tender providence which has us in its keeping. It is in chafing against the conditions of our lives that we tire ourselves immeasurably. It is in being anxious about things which we cannot help that we often do the most of our spending. A simple faith in God which practically and every moment, and not only theoretically and on Sundays, rests on the knowledge that He cares for us, at least as much as we care for those who are the dearest to us, will do much to give the tired nerves the feeling of the bird in its nest. Do not spend what strength you have, like the clematis, in climbing on yourself, but lay hold on things that are eternal, and the peace of them will pass into your soul like a healing balm. Put yourself in the great everlasting currents, and then you can rest on your own, and let those currents bear you to your strength.—Anna C. Brackett.

Items.

Romanism in Italy.—A writer in The Christian Advocate says, that when in Italy, he was much impressed with the beggarly attendance of worshippers at the services in St. Peter's and other prominent places of worship. "The priests as a class are very unpopular, especially with the men. It is the marked exception rather than the rule, that the men go to the confessional." He says that the destruction of the temporal power of the Pope took a spell which had rested upon the Italian people for centuries; and that Italy is ripe for the advent of a new religious life.

The Indwelling of Christ.—At a recent meeting in Washington of the Second Ecumenical Methodist Conference, one of their ministers, William Arthur, produced a sermon which bore testimony to the presence of Christ with the members of his church. It says: "The presence of the Lord with his members individually is always spoken of as an actual indwelling, a making of his abode, and of the abode of the Father with the man, an inhabitation of the heart by the Holy Spirit." "When this one great crisis, that has rested upon the world, comes to reveal his Son in me, that I might preach Him among the Gentiles." Mark, he does not say merely revealed his Son 'to me,' but 'in me,' in which words he intimates two things: the real method in which the child of God is born again—that is, by the revelation within his soul of the Son of God as his Saviour; and in the next place the true source of all living testimony to Christ, namely, the revelation of Him in the soul as the Saviour of the world. This inward revelation in the soul of the Saviour bears with it an impulse urging us to live in the body of the life of Him whose work here was to seek and to save that which was lost. * * * Your bodies are members of Christ, * * * your body is a temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you." The consecrating effect of the Lord's indwelling in his children is to make the entire frame a temple to his glory, the heart being the inner shrine, and all the members temple-vessels, instruments of righteousness, unto God."

Friends in Great Britain.—The late numbers of the British Friend and the London Friend both give notice of a change in the editorial management of those journals at the close of the present year. The British Friend says, that "The new editor will be assisted by well-qualified Friends in the endeavor to present and apply the principles of primitive Quakerism to the needs of our times, &c." The London Friend is to be changed from a monthly to a weekly periodical, and is to be edited by Henry Stanley Sherman.

Isaac Sharp, who was liberated by London Yearly Meeting some months since for an extensive journey which his feeble health then prevented him from performing, left home on this account on the 23d of Ninth Month. His prospect was to proceed to Constantinople, by way of Vienna.

At the Meeting for Sufferings held in the Ninth Month, it was agreed to appropriate £150 towards defraying the expenses of Benjamin Trueblood for a year's work in France in the interests of peace, by a communication published in the British Friend, it appears that this step has awakened some uneasiness, it being considered to be out of the line of the duties of the Meeting for Sufferings to liberate Friends for public service.

General Booth's Farm Colony.—This was one of his features in the plan proposed in his noted book, "Darkest England," for the help of the degraded and idle in London. It comprises 1,250 acres of land fronting on the River Thames, in Essex County, purchased at a cost of about $100 per acre. The soil is said not to be very productive, but it will obtruse furnish a vast amount of work to those that there to labor.

A Mohammedan Critic of Pseudo-Christianity.—A remarkable article on Christianity and Mohammedanism was recently published by the Turkish paper, the Terrifian Habakok. Of course it is not the kind of New Testament which it opens with such criticisms. But it is humiliating that wars and aggressions of professing Christians should have given such cause for sarcasm to the followers of Islam. The article remarks as follows:

"What is this 'progress of civilization' that the Europeans speak of? It means that success justifies everything. To lie, to cheat, or to flay and hang starving Mussulmans, like St. Louis' court-martials, for stealing a mouthful of meat, is justified by it. The motto 'Clear out for I want to come there' is justified by it, and is illustrated by the destruction of native races wherever Europeans set foot. This 'progress of civilization' includes the regarding of adultery as permissible folly, as in London, and the leaving of families to starve or commit suicide from want, as in Paris, the destruction of all confidence of man in man, and the regarding religions observances as childish. To all these things, to a savage and he will say, What Barbarian? They keep their property safe without the aid of police in a hut of straw, while in the palaces, said to be civilized, with all their police and courts, guillotines and executions, the people are unable to keep their solid stone houses and their iron safes from attack. Islam is grateful that it has none of this 'progress of civilization'."

"Let the effects of religion in advancing or retarding progress be brought under scrutiny. Wherever Islam has gone it has saved the original inhabitants. All are still there, with language and nationality preserved. Where can Christianity show that it has done this? Where are the Arabs of Spain, the aborigines of Australia and America? What is Christianity now trying to do with the Jews in Russia?"

Prospectus of Friends' Boarding School, under care of Iowa Yearly Meeting (Conservative), for Academic Year 1891-2.

To Whom It May Concern.—A solicitude for the proper education of our youth in the essential and elementary branches of knowledge, apart from associations and influences of a harmful character so generally attending its acquisition, has long been felt by this yearly meeting with a concern to guard them against that compromising spirit so prevalent in many educational institutions, in regard to religious faith and practice, frequently presenting a barrier to the acceptance of Christian Truth in its simplicity.

To overcome such difficulties and with special reference to the needs of members of our religious Society in isolated localities a way has seemed to open for the establishment of a school by the erection of a building, now about completed, affording boarding accommodation for those living too remote to attend as day scholars.

The management of such an institution is felt to be a weighty and responsible undertaking, demanding the prayerful sympathy and support of all right-minded Friends, and the committee especially appeal to all parents and students who intend becoming patrons of the school, to aid in maintaining the needful discipline and good government thereof.

Location.—This institution stands on a beautiful site, comprising two acres of land, in the midst of a pleasant and healthy section of country, and is located centrally between three main lines of railroad, being about three miles south of Le Grand, on the Chicago and Northwestern railroad, and two miles north of Dunbar, on the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul railroad, and one mile south of Dillon, on the Iowa Central railroad. The community is characterized for industry and good moral habits.

Course of Study.—While this is intended for a Grade School, we do not feel warranted, at present, in publishing a prescribed course until the needs and wishes of the patrons are more developed.

We are, however, free to state that the object is to furnish a good practical English education, including Elementary Science; and would encourage all who feel drawn towards the school to correspond with those in charge, stating their standing and wishes.

Officers and Government.—The officers of the institution shall be a Superintendent and Matron, whose duties will be to take a general care and oversight thereof.

Competent teachers will be employed to take charge of the school.

Believing that the tendency of gaudy apparel and conformity to the changing fashions of the times are calculated to foster pride and emulation in the minds of the young, simplicity of dress and address will be expected of all.

Due respect for the regulations of the institution will be expected of each one attending the school.

This school is intended to meet the needs of members of the Society of Friends; but other young people who will respect and conform to the rules and discipline of the institution will be deemed eligible for admission.

Calendar.—Fall term of eight weeks to commence Ninth Month 14th.

Winter term of sixteen weeks to commence Eleventh Month 24th.

Terms.—Board and lodging for Fall term, $12.00. Tuition—Primary, $3.00. Tuition—Advanced, $4.00. Winter term at proportionate rates. Charges payable in advance.

Students boarding in the building will be required to furnish their own bed clothes and towels, and to pay a reasonable charge for washing.

The building is designed to furnish board and lodging for about thirty pupils, and school accommodations for about thirty day scholars in addition.

Those coming on the trains will be met at any of the above named stations and conveyed to the school, by word being sent to Ole T. Sawyer, Le Grand; Thomas Larson, Dunbar; or Ann Thorena Testenson, Dillon, all in Marshall County, Iowa.

Further information in reference to the school may be obtained by applying to any of the committee in charge, whose names and addresses are as follows:

Archibald Crosby, Paulina, Ia.; Ole T. Sawyer, Le Grand, Ia.; Sigbjorn T. Rosedale, Le Grand, Ia.; Andrew L. Norway, Ia.; Jesse Negus, West Branch, Ia.; Tri-stan Coggshall, West Branch, Ia.; Ann Thorena Testenson, Dillon, Ia.; Melinda Thompson, Dunbar, Ia.; Anna Olson, Paulina, Ia.; Isabel Thomas, Earlihan, Ia.; Lydia B. Olliphant, West Branch, Ia.; Ruth Carey, Ackworth, Ia.

Signed on behalf of the Committee.

ARCHIBALD CROSBIE, Clerk.

Dr. Herrick Johnson says, "Whatever thy hands find to do that is lawful to be done, do it with the whole heart. But do it to the glory of God. Be unworldly at your world's work. Working, possessing, accumulating,—this is not buying love of God paramount, doing it so that thoughts of eternity and of God are an intrusion, doing it so that one's spirit is secularized in the process,—this is worldliness. Let a man beware of this. It will eat out his piety as inevitably as he lives, and allows it."

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 7, 1891.

Our aged Friend, Joseph Morris, of Cardington, Ohio, sends to us the following letter, received from one who, like him, maintains his allegiance to the Truth in the midst of a generation who have largely deviated from the path in which the early members of our Society walked.

It is especially interesting to us, as illustrating the query contained in an editorial on the subject of correspondence in THE FRIEND, of the 26th Month 31st:—"Have not all those who adhere to the doctrines and testimonies of our common Society, no matter what may be the status of the meeting to which they belong, strong claims upon the sympathy and fellowship of those in other parts who are like minded?"

And it is encouraging as an evidence of the accuracy of the statement of the same editorial, that even in meetings which have widely departed from the principles of Friends, there are still preserved those who walk in the old paths.

The interchange of feeling between these two Friends, reminds one of the language of Malachi: "Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another, and the Lord hearkened and heard it; and a book of remembrance was written before Him, for them that feared the Lord, and thought upon his name."

It may be proper to add, that this letter is published with the consent of the writer.—

"My dear Friend, Joseph Morris:—I wish thee to excuse me, a stranger, in thus writing to thee. I recollect seeing thee in New York, I think, during the time of Yearly Meeting there, many years ago. Having seen in THE FRIEND several communications in relation to the very unsettled condition of our beloved Society, written by thee, I felt to say they have my hearty approval, and do most fully enter into sympathy with all those who stand firmly and uncompromisingly for the faith and practices of the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. I do greatly deplore the innovations in the doctrines and practices which have to such an extent spread and are spreading within our borders. The Meeting of which I am a member, is the only one in our Quarterly Meeting (Nine Partners) which is preserved from reading the Scriptures in meetings or singing in them—which I can assure thee is a great comfort to my in my declining years—as to-day is my 74th birth-day.

"It was with sorrow that I read in THE FRIEND, some of the unsound views held up in North Carolina Yearly Meeting, and the practices of ancient Friends berated. I can say in truth, thy communications in THE FRIEND have been very encouraging and strengthening to me. And may the Lord still guide thee by wise counsel, and at the end of thy course here, receive thee into his eternal Kingdom of rest and peace, to go no more out forever.

"In the fellowship and love of the Gospel, I conclude, and bid thee farewell.

"Truly thy friend,

"RICHARD T. OSBORN.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement shows a decrease of $4,925,527 during Third Month. Total cash in the Treasury, $740,530,258.

The Chilean Government has replied to Minister Egan's demand for an explanation of the recent attack upon American sailors. The reply is couched in very strong language, and it is understood that it amounts to a refusal to accept responsibility for the affair. The State Department at Washington has been notified.

On the 21st inst, the Comptroller of the Currency appointed a Receiver for the suspended Maverick National Bank, of Boston. It is reported by the examiner that the bank's liabilities are $8,000,000, and the cash on hand $1,400,000. "The bank's irregularities" are said to have dated back more than two years.

The Treasury Department has instructed the Collector of Customs at Bangor, Me., that certain gin and brandy recently imported, and now remaining in his custody, are not to be sold as unclaimed merchandise, but are to be held until further orders. The liquor will be sold in some other State, as the Department does not desire to interfere with the State Prohibitory law.

In the 20th ultimo, 163 convicts working in the mines at Briceville, Tenn., were liberated by the State. The same day 143 were freed at Coal Creek, and on the 24th inst 240 at Oliver Springs. Governor Buchanan has issued two proclamations, one offering a reward of $3,000 for the arrest and conviction of the leader of the Briceville riot, and the other offering a reward of $25 each for the capture of the escaped convicts.

Grain Inspector (Clausen, of Minnesota, reports that he has been received at Duluth at the rate of 1,000 bushels per day, eclipsing all former records, and that the combined receipts at Duluth and Minneapolis on the 26th ult. were 1,500,000 bushels from the farms of Minnesota and the Dakotas, "a record which has never been equalled."

The Grain Agency at Duluth for 1891 to date are 21,933,400 bushels, as against 10,739,593 for the corresponding period of last year. The receipts have been 24,870,106 bushels, and a total of 40,000,000 in this wheat crop is predicted.

An Indian boy, attending the school at the Pine Ridge Agency, in Dakota, asked the superintendent one day, with much concern, if there was going to be another uprising of the white people? soon.

A suit has been entered in the United States Court, at Pittsburgh, against the officers of the Louisiana Lottery, for unlawfully using the mails.

Reports received at Galatia, Alabama, from the Pottawatomie Reservation, state that prairie fires are raging there and doing great damage. Many settlers have lost their homes, and hundreds of the men, women and children are fighting the flames.

The "Salt Lake," which so suddenly appeared, is as rapidly disappearing, says the San Francisco Call. One of the islands, according to which, it was just returned from its site, and no sign of the so-called desert lake will be seen.

A tobacco dealer in New Haven, whose trade in the main is with the Yale boys, says that the sale of cigarettes is falling off. Three years ago he sold 300,000 packages of one brand; last year he sold 200,000 packages of all brands. He no sells fifty pipes where he formerly sold one.

Ex-Judge Amos Briggs, of Philadelphia, says: "High License has been in operation here for three years. During this period the production of distilled liquors has fallen 40 per cent. In 1887 the production was 3,283,459 gallons, in 1890, 1,990,575 gallons, and in 1890, 638,926 gallons, an increase in the three years of our High License of 3,103,467 gallons, equaling an increase of 94.2 per cent, while our population has increased during those same three years but a fraction less than 7 per cent. These are official figures taken from the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and from the Census Reports." How long will it be before those who have the right of suffrage will realize the folly and wickedness of license, high or low? and their individual responsibility unless they vote against putting in legislators who make themselves an intolerable tax upon the people? The United States Supreme Court declares, does not exist inherently?

Deaths in this city last week numbered 434; which is 27 more than during the previous week, and 106 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing, 21 were males and 423 females; 44 died of consumption; 40 of diphtheria; 37 of disease of the heart; 25 of pneumonia; 18 of crop; 15 of old age; 15 of Bright's disease; 14 of inanition; 13 of inflammation of the brain; 13 of cancer; 12 of apoplexy; 10 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels and 10 of unknown causes.

Hogs were active, at 6 1/2 a 6 3/4 cts. for good Western, 6 a 6 1/2 cts. for other grades, and 5 1/2 a 5 3/4 cts. for State. "Tomorrow" - Killing has been carried on in Cork, Ireland, by ritual factions, in connection with the pending canvass to file the Parliamentary vacancy caused by the death of Charles Stewart Parnell.

The French Senate on the 30th ult. agreed to the removal of the prohibition of importation of American pork, and agreed to a motion to impose on it a duty of 20 cents (two francs five centimes) per 100 pounds.

A telegram received at the Russian Embassy in Paris on the 1st inst, announces the issue of a ukase in Russia prohibiting, from that time, the exporting of all cereals except in wheat. Vessels still loading will be allowed to complete their cargoes, provided they are not valued at more than five dollars. The Government has assigned another 32,000,000 roubles to the distress fund.

The young German Emperor has distinguished himself again by issuing a rescript against the immorality tolerated in Berlin and other German cities. His action has been severely criticised by powerful German papers, evidently violating the sentiments of influential politicians, but it has met with great favor among the people.

Five more rooms have been laid open in that part of Pompeii which has been uncovered this year, and not far from the forum. Visitors were astonished to find in them a number of pieces of bread which must have been wrapped up in rapiers, the tissue of which is still in a perfect state of preservation. There was also found a pretty casket, on the lid of which was inscribed the words "Ani Mo," which the learned inspector of the excavation translated as the proper name of Anichius Modestus.

The ravages of cholera in Danassus show an alarming increase. The record for the week ending Eleventh Month 2d shows 180 cases and 90 deaths. Owing to the prevalence of cholera, Hodeida is in nearly as bad a situation as Danassus, but at Aleppo the plague has subsided.

Disasters were received in London on the 28th ult., announcing an earthquake at Hiogo, Japan.

A dispatch from Yokohama, of the 2d inst, says that according to an official estimate, 4,000 persons were killed by the recent earthquake, 5,000 were injured and 50,000 houses were destroyed. No Europeans were killed.

A wonderful lake, whose waters are more salt than those of the Dead Sea, has been discovered on one of the Hawaiian Islands. The name of it is Aia Palia.

A dispatch from the City of Mexico says that owing to the shortness of crops and the famine prevailing in several parts of the country, the Government has decided to be removed by the Mexican Government. The State of Guanajuata has prohibited the export of corn.

There are said to be over 10,000 Chinamen in Vancouver and along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in British Columbia, who are suffering for want of food. Most of them left their homes under the impression that it would be easy to evade the exclusion law, and enter the United States by way of Canada.

NOTICES.

CARD CALENDAR.—Friends' Calendar for 1892 is now on sale at Friends' Book Store. Price, a nickel each; when sent by mail, a dime for one copy, or a dozen copies for three-quarters of a dollar.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—The stage meets trains leaving Philadelphia. (Broad St. Station) at 6:53 and 8:43 A. M., 2:53 and 4:55 P. M. It will meet other trains when notified.

ZEBEDEE HAINES, Sup't, Westtown, Penna.

WANTED.—Two young women want evening work to do at home; no machine sewing, otherwise not particular. Can give good recommendation.

H. E. S.,
Phila. P. O., Penna.

DIED, on the 23d of Third Month, CELIA STRANI in her nineteenth year. She was the daughter of Thomas and Anna Strand, of Norway, Is., and a member of Savenger Monthly Meeting. For nearly seven months she was a patient sufferer, never complaining, although she realized that every day brought her nearer to the grave. She remained cheerful to the last, glad to be taken away when the summons came, and joyfully and bravely met her just loss, still they feel assured that while it was their loss it was her gain.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Selections from the Journal of William Evans.

1844. First Month 1st.—"Attended at the Girls' Select School by appointment. I was impressed with the beautiful ornament of modesty and diffidence, in the female character; especially when it proceeds from the heavenly influences of the spirit of our blessed Redeemer, who was meek and lowly of heart. As I gave up, unworthily as I felt myself, to the gentle impressions of duty, the blessedness and substantial happiness experienced by the devoted soul, in which the Lord condescends to take up his abode, was brought to view; and the dear children persuaded to yield to the visitations of Divine love. He would clothe them with the modesty, and the graces imparted by His Spirit; which would be as a barrier between them and those who would allure them from the path of holiness.

"After a long silence in our Particular Meeting, and passing through much discouragement in my own account, and the opposition which prevails in worldly-minded men, to the plain doctrines of the Gospel, I was brought under exercise on account of a state, which had tried many things, and sought after enjoyment in the comforts of life, and was disappointed, and now had little or nothing to rest on. The language of David presented: 'I have seen an end of all perfection; but thy commandment is exceeding good.' Earthly comforts and delights, in their most perfect and complete state, would end; but 'odliness, which is keeping God's commandments, is exceeding broad; having the promise of life that now is and of that which is to come. I felt tenderly for those who seemed to have wasted time and strength, and were brought to a sense of destitution; believing that it was a mercy the Lord thus deals with poor, negligent and unfaithful man; that He may raise in him a longing desire after durable riches; the read and water of life. These were fervently and affectionately labored with, to persuade them to endure his dispensations, and apply to Him for help and strength, to redeem the lost time, by faithfully following Him in the work of reformation."

"A religious life is at all times blessed, but its value is most especially felt in times of danger, and at the approach of death. Those who love and serve God in the time of prosperity, will not be forgotten nor deserted by Him in the day of adversity. His name will be to them a strong tower, to which they will flee and find safety; even when terror and amazement overtake the worldly and the negligent ones. What solid advantage is derived from giving up to the early visitations of Divine Grace, progressing, through obedience to the cross, from stature to stature, and thereby attaining an establishment in the Truth. These have the pearl of great price, the white stone, and in it a new name written, which no man knoweth, saving him that hath it; an inestimable treasure; Christ living and abiding in them, the hope of their glory, and the foundation upon which they are built and settled. They want no other; they thirst for no other water, than what springs in their souls, from Him, the Fountain of living waters; and their prayer and travail is, that they be made and kept as pillars in his house, that shall go no more out. These are as salt in the earth, and lights in the world; soldiers in the Lamb's army, who bear the ensign of the Prince of Peace; and who will, under his command, finally obtain the victory over death, hell and the grave, in their own experience; and over the kingdom of antichrist the world over; even so, Amen."

"Changes are gradually taking place among us in this city. There are now very few left, to whom some of us can look as fathers and mothers, counsellors and supporters, in the trials and exercises of the day. Of the many who wear the garb of Friends, too small a proportion are daily dwelling under a heartfelt concern for their own soul's salvation, and that they may come up as fellow helpers in the cause of Christ. There are, however, some of this description, who are a comfort and strength to their elder brethren and sisters. But how have the love of the world, its fashions and its maxims, together with its ease and its deceitful spirit, captivated not a few who had made a good beginning; stopped their growth, and eaten out the life and power of religion. When we have looked around to see who would be found prepared for the important station of elders, we can discover but few who have not fallen back or are making but little progress; so that instead of being ready for watchmen and watchwomen, and instructors of ministers, they have need to be reminded of their slackness, and of the mournful feelings which their unfaithfulness brings over those who have been watching for their growth in the blessed Truth. This state of society is at times very discouraging; but, nevertheless, we are not to be hindered by such slothful ones, from doing the work which our Master points out, and requires us to perform; whether others hear or refuse to profit by it. To know our own souls delivered from the wrath to come, is of the highest importance to us; and as we are engaged for ourselves, the Lord may secretly bless the honest discharge of duty to others also."

"The state of our religious Society, and the secret workings of a spirit which seeks ease and despises the cross, and would, if it could, lay waste the testimonies the Holy Spirit leads into, often brings sorrowful and depressing sensations over those who desire to see those testimonies maintained. Under these feelings, it was a comfort to witness the Truth rise into dominion, through the ministry of my dear wife, this morning in our meeting; who was qualified to preach the necessity of individually experiencing Christ to be the resurrection and the life in us; raising the soul out of a state of spiritual death, and placing the affections upon things that are invisible. It was unexpected to me, but I felt constrained to follow her in supplication to the Lord our God, that He would baptize and re-baptize us with his Holy Spirit, not only to remove the chaff, but to keep alive a flame of love and greater devotion to Him, on the altar of the heart; to unite those who assemble in that place; that they may put shoulder to shoulder; and with one heart, offer to Him, the Lord God and the Lamb, through the powerful influence of the Holy Spirit, thanksgiving and praise, might, majesty, dominion and power, to whom alone it belongs; but to us blushing and confusion of face."

Eighth Month 5th. "We held our Quarterly Meeting this day. These meetings are often trying seasons; producing mournful feelings, on account of the want of fervent, united, spiritual labor, for the prevalence of Divine life, and the lively support of our discipline and testimonies; so that we might see the Truth prevail, and the members prospering in it. And yet, I trust, there is a body preserved, though it may not be numerous, who are united in the fellowship of suffering, for the same blessed cause; mourning and travelling together before the Lord, on account of the effects of a worldly spirit, which cannot bear the cross; even amongst some who would wish our religious Society to be more like the other professors of Christianity, in language, dress and manners. Ah! these have inflicted a severe blow upon us, which we were in nowise prepared to expect. But the Lord on high, who is mightier than the noise of many waters, can sustain his children in their deep probations, and mightily defend his blessed cause; even though the truly devoted in heart may be few; and their strength, at times, seem ready to fail. The turning aside of some, like a deceitful bow in the day of battle, giving their strength in secret to wrong things, is a cause of great discouragement to the single-hearted soldiers of Christ. It not only creates doubts and faltering among some others, but it will certainly bring weakness and blindness on themselves."

1845.—In a religious visit to the meetings in the Northwestern part of New York Yearly Meeting, William Evans says: "We rode nineteen miles on our way to Pelham, and put up our horses to feed near the great falls. Here we had a fine view of this stupendous cataract. The whole body of a great river, the outlet to these inland seas, which lie to the west and northwest, pouring over a breastwork nearly two hundred feet high, of massive stone, and in width about one mile. The rushing and roar of this mighty torrent, the foam and spray, created by its dashing on the rocks below; the formation of a perfect rainbow by the rays of light decomposed in the vapor, constantly rising and falling again like a thick shower of fine rain; and also the foam and vapor and rainbow colors mingled together, in the various parts of the cascade, presented one of the grandest scenes that I have ever beheld. It far exceeded my imagination of it; and to me, it was surprising, that any one could turn from it with disappointment; but as magnificent and overpowering as are these extraordinary falls of water, they are an atom in the great works of the Almighty Creator."

"Had an appointed meeting at Pelham; in which the call and qualification for the ministry, and the preparation requisite for the reception of this and all the diversified gifts which the great Head of the church dispenses to those who yield to his sanctifying power, came before me; and which, after a time of silent waiting, I believed it right to open. After our Saviour commissioned his disciples to teach all nations, He directed them to tarry at Jerusalem until they were endued with power from on high. Paul, speaking of his ministry, says: 'He neither received it of man, neither was he taught it but by the revelation of Jesus Christ; and there remains to be no other source for the work of the ministry, down to the present day. This was the experience of Friends from the beginning, who were brought off from all dependence on themselves, or on any man, to wait upon the Lord; from whom they received gifts for the ministry, and for judging in Israel, to discern and try words and spirits. It was not a time of abounding. The meeting appeared to be in rather a languishing state; the members, I feared, depending too much on vocal ministry. They were exhorted to gather to the Divine gift in themselves, that they might receive ability to worship the Father in spirit and in truth, and to partake of that food which the Son of Man will give.

"Being detained that afternoon by the stormy weather, I had some serious conversation with the Friend at whose house we stopped. He expressed much concern at the state of the Society among them; particularly on account of ministers encouraging a coalition with other professors; speaking lightly of some of the testimonies held by us; and of our early Friends, as having been contracted and illiberal. I encouraged him to keep to the ancient ground; for I believed that all such defective members would finally show more clearly, that they were destitute of the life and substance of religion. This is one means by which the growth of our Society is greatly obstructed; the young people, who are in the air, being delighted with such sentiments; which make way for them to indulge in the corrupt fashions and language of the world; and to mingle with others, until they lose all relish for serious things, and for their own religious Society; whose principles they judge to be too strict for them."

IS IT NOT, think you, very sorrowful to consider, how a great many, in a little time after they have come out of a good meeting, where they have been under a sense of the Lord's power, and have been reached with a tendering visitation, fall to idle, silly, needless discourse, and it may be to laughter and jesting.—*Thos. The Eastern Shore of Chesapeake Bay.

It has already been mentioned that when the Calvert came to Maryland, they purchased of the Indian owners a tract of land on which their first settlement was made, thus securing an equitable title to the land, and peaceable relations with its former occupants.

The Indians anciently occupying the country between the Atlantic Ocean and the Mississippi River, and reaching from the St. Lawrence to the Gulf of Mexico are divided by ethnologists into three great stocks. First, the Algonquins, the most numerous of all, to whom belonged all the New England Indians, most of those of Maryland and Virginia—the Delawares, Chippewas, Ottawas, Potawatamies, Mohegans and Shawnees. South of the Algonquins, occupying part of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia and the Gulf region, was the Muscouge stock, comprising the Natchez, Uchees, Creeks, the Tamascas, Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws and Seminoles. In the midst of the Algonquin territories, thrust in like a wedge, its base resting on the St. Lawrence and Lake Huron, and its apex reaching North Carolina, was the powerful Iroquois stock, comprising the famous confederacy of the Five Nations.

The smaller of the Indian tribes in Maryland, generally remained at peace with the whites, but their lands were gradually absorbed by their more powerful neighbors and they dwindled away, some of them probably joining the more western tribes.

The most powerful and warlike of the native tribes were the Susquehannaes, living on the great river Susquehanna, and the Nanticookes, who occupied land in the southern part of the peninsula. There was a feud between these, and they were both subject to hostile incursions from the Iroquois, who descended the Susquehanna in canoes; and ultimately forced both these tribes to yield to the power of these fierce invaders. About the middle of last century, by command of the Six Nations, the remnant of the Nanticookes, carrying with them the bones of their ancestors, removed to Otsiningo (now Binghamton, N. Y.), where they joined some fragments of the Shawnees and Mohickanders; others seemed to have settled in Wyoming, Pennsylvania.

In 1767 ambassadors came from the Nanticookes at Otsiningo to Governor Sharpe, for the purpose of selling the lands of their tribe in Dorchester, Somerset and Worcester counties. Sir William Johnson, the chief agent of the English government with its dealings with the Indians, assisted by letter in the negotiation; and the sum offered by Governor Sharpe being considered too small by the Indians, who seemed disposed to hostilities, Sir William—who was exceedingly anxious to secure the wavering friendship of the Iroquois and their confederates to the British—made up the difference at the expense of the crown. As late as 1852, a remnant of the tribe (about 100) was living on Grand River, north of Lake Erie, in Canada; and their chiefs and head men petitioned the Assembly of Maryland for compensation for certain annuities, which a tradition current among them represented to have been formerly paid to their nation in consideration of the cession of certain lands to the province. The Assembly did not allow the claim.

In 1661 the Susquehannaes were engaged in a fierce war with the Five Nations, in which they were helped by the Maryland authorities.

For nearly twelve years this war was kept up. Success being mostly on the side of the Susquehannaes; but the small-pox proved a more terrible enemy than their Indian invaders, and by 1675 the number of their warriors was reduced from 700 to 300. In the next year they were utterly defeated by the Senecas, and driven from their old abode, at the head of the Chesapeake, to a position near the border of Maryland and Virginia. Here they took refuge in an old fortification. The Senecas pursued, and when on the war path did some damage to the plantations of the whites on both sides of the Potomac, and committed some murders—which were attributed by the Virginians and Marylanders to the Susquehannaes, and cruelly revenged.

In the summer of 1675, a white man was killed, as he said before dying, by Indians. A party of militia collected, and surrounded two Indian wigwags—killing ten at one place and fourteen at another. The survivors said they were Susquehannaes and friends, and declared that the murder had been committed by a marauding band of Senecas. Shortly after several other murders were committed—and soon after a body of troops appeared before the Susquehanna fort, summoned the chiefs to a parley, and charged them with the recent murders. This they solemnly denied, laying the blame on the Senecas, who they said were at the head of the Patapsco River, and they offered guides for their pursuit.

The passions of the militiamen were aroused, and in their indiscriminating fury they slew five of their chiefs. The remainder defended themselves in their fortress, until their provisions were exhausted, when they escaped by night and went southward, destroying the property and killing the settlers whom they met with. They were attacked by the Virginia militia, under Colonel Bacon, and many of them killed. The crushed remnant submitted to their old adversaries, the Five Nations, and were allowed to remain in their ancient territories on the Susquehanna River. Here they remained in a weak and dwindling condition for nearly 100 years—until, in 1763, the war on the frontiers excited hatred of the Indians, which led to the merciless butchery of this inoffensive remnant of a once powerful tribe, by a fanatical mob of Scotch-Irish settlers called the Paxton boys, at Lancaster, Pa.

Thomas Chalkley gives an interesting account of a religious visit he paid in 1706 to these Susquehannaes, then living at Conestoga on the Susquehanna. He says: "We got an interpreter, and thirteen or fourteen of us travelled through the woods about fifty miles, carrying our provisions with us; and on the journey sat down by a river, and spread our food on the grass, and refreshed ourselves and our horses, and then went on cheerfully, with good will and much love to the poor Indians; and when we came they received us kindly, treating us civilly in their way. We treated about having a religious meeting with them; upon which they called a council, and were very grave and spoke one after another. Our interpreter told me they had not done anything for many years, without the counsel of an ancient, grave woman; who, I observed, spoke much in their council. I asked what it was the woman said? He told me, that she then said, 'She looked upon our coming to be more than natural, because we did not come to buy or sell or get gain, but came in love and respect to them, and desired their well-doing both here and hereafter;' and further continued, 'That our meetings among them might be very beneficial to their young people,' and related a dream which she had three days before, and interpreted it, viz: 'That she was in London, and London was the finest place she ever saw; it was like to Philadelphia, but much bigger, and she went across six streets, and in the seventh she saw William Penn preaching to the people, which was a great multitude, and she and William Penn rejoiced to see one another; and after meeting she went to him, and he told her that in a little time he would come over and preach to them also, of which she was very glad. And now, she said, her dream was fulfilled, for one of his Friends was come to preach to them.' She advised them to hear us and entertain us kindly; and accordingly they did."

"The Gospel of Jesus Christ was preached freely to them, and faith in Christ, who was put to death at Jerusalem by the unbelieving Jews; and that this same Jesus came to save people from their sins, and by his grace and light in the soul, shows to man his sins, and convinceth him thereof, delivering him out of them, to all which, as their manner is, they gave public assent."

The policy adopted by William Penn of honestly purchasing of their owners the lands desired for settlement, and of dealing fairly and justly with the Indians, long maintained unbroken peace between them and the whites in the province of Pennsylvania. There are many evidences of the religious concern which was felt by many members of the Society of Friends, not to settle on lands which had not been justly obtained.

In 1738, Thomas Chalkley addressed a letter to those Friends who had crossed the Blue Ridge and settled about Opeckon and Sheuandoah, in which he reminds them that whatever rights to the land they have are derived from the government of Virginia, but that the Virginians had made no agreement with the natives for land beyond the mountains: that as 'Divine Providence hath given them and their forefathers the possession of this continent of America, they have a natural right thereto in justice and equity;' therefore he advises them to agree with and purchase their lands of the native Indians or inhabitants.

This concern led the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia in 1763 to adopt the following minute:

"It is the solid sense and judgment of this meeting, that Friends should not purchase nor remove to settle such lands as have not been fairly and openly first purchased from the Indians by those persons who are or may be lawfully authorized by the Government to make such purchases; and that Monthly Meetings should be careful to excite their members to the strict observance of this advice; and where any remove so contrary to the advice of their brethren, that they should not give certificates to such persons, but use their endeavors to persuade them to avoid the danger to which they expose themselves, and to convince them of the inconsistency of their conduct with our Christian profession."

(To be continued.)

The spirit of the age is to let people do pretty much as they please. The Church generally is falling rapidly under its domination, and is disposed to let her members live "at ease in Zion," and get along as best they can without calling them to account for delinquencies. But all this tends to weaken and demoralize a church sooner or later.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Jonathan Burnyeat.

The following account of Jonathan Burnyeat, who was little more than twelve years old when united with James Dickinson in Gospel service, is offered for insertion in "THE FRIEND," in hopes it may be a means to excite the dear youth amongst us, to be obedient to Him who can fit and qualify for service in his Church, in this our day as in any age of the world. He remains to be the same that ever He was, the same yesterday, to-day and forever, God over all, and blessed forevermore. Be obedient, I beseech you, dear young people, to that in-speaking word and voice of Divine life in your souls, that calls you from the delusive pleasures of this vain and perishing world that lieth in wickedness, to a life of self-denial, the daily cross, and a conformity to the Divine will, in whatever service He may be pleased to call you unto. All are not called to the work of the ministry, but all are called to a life of holiness; and the Lord does love an early sacrifice. Samuel of old was called when a child, when he knew not it was the word of the Lord, but being instructed of Eli to say, "Speak Lord, for thy servant heareth," and being obedient to the word of the Lord, he became an eminent prophet in his day. Choose the Lord for your portion, and the God of Jacob for the chosen lot of your inheritance, and He will bless and protect you, and keep you in the hour of trial and temptation, from falling a prey to the devourer. Remember, greater is He that is in you, than he that is in the world. Omo, Tenth Month 25, 1851.

"James Dickinson relates in his journal, that 'in the fore part of the year 1699, I had drawings in my mind to visit Friends in Scotland, and proceeded on that service in company with Jonathan Burnyeat, who had the like concern. As he was very young, and had not travelled in Truth's service before, a concern fell upon me for his preservation every way. The Lord was kind to us, and bore up our spirits in all our exercises. My companion was deeply opened into the mysteries of God's kingdom; and grew in his gift, so as to give counsel to young and old: he was very zealous against deceit and wickedness both in professor and profane; and often reproved such. We travelled together through the south and west parts of Scotland, to Douglas, Hamilton and Glasgow, and had many meetings among the people; laboring to turn their minds to the Lord Jesus Christ, who is the light of the world; warning all who professed the light to be their way, to be careful to walk therein, that they might know their communion to increase with the Lord, their fellowship one with another, and the blood of Christ to cleanse them from all unrighteousness. Then we travelled down into the north, and had many precious meetings. From thence we returned to the Yearly Meeting at Edinburgh, where we met with many brethren. Abundance of people came to the meeting who were very rude and wicked, and labored to disturb us; but the testimony of Truth coming over all, some among them were troubled, and chained down by the power of God. We were deeply bowed under a sense of the Lord's favor to us; yet under great sorrow to see the wickedness of the people. A concern came upon Jonathan Burnyeat to write a warning to the inhabitants of that place, which was afterwards put in print to answer its service. We had meetings at several places; many hearts were reached by the power of Truth. Being clear, we returned home, and witnessed peace to flow in our souls."

"Jonathan Burnyeat died in Cumberland, England, in the twenty-third year of his age."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Dredging Oysters.

Having received a kind invitation from a friend engaged in the business of shipping oysters, two of us on the afternoon of Tenth Month 25th, with a little boy in company, took the cars for Port Norris, on the Maurice River. The Maurice River drains a considerable portion of central southern New Jersey, lying between the waters of the Cohansey on the west, and of the great Egg Harbor River on the east. As is the case with most of the streams in southern New Jersey and similar formations elsewhere, as it approaches its outlet it widens into a broad expanse of brackish water, bordered on each side with a wide belt of marsh land overgrown with a tall and coarse grass, locally known as reed. The seeds of this are attractive to the Bob-link, or reed bird, which in the fall of the year ranges along the coast of North America, visiting and feeding upon the rice of the southern planters, and the seed sown by the hand of its Creator, until it becomes fat and is esteemed a delicious morsel by epicures.

The rail is another bird which abounds in these reedy marshes in the fall of the year, and is much pursued by the sportsman. These birds are believed to breed in the far northwest, among the marshes of the Saskatchewan, and to make their way southward in the fall of the year, stopping to feed wherever they find an abundant supply of seed-bearing marsh plants, such as the wild rice, and the reed. They are timid birds, that trust more to running than flying, and can make their way through the marshes and over the surface of the leaf-strewn waters with great rapidity, so that, however numerous, but few are seen except at high water. Gunners in pursuit of them enter the reeds in high water in boats; and as the rail rise on their wings to escape, they are shot.

The part of Delaware Bay into which the Maurice River enters is called Maurice River Cove. The bottom must be quite flat, as the depth of the water varies but little for many miles, being, our Captain said, about ten or twelve feet at low water. An area of perhaps 150 square miles is devoted to oyster raising and is divided into small plots from five to twenty acres, more or less, each marked at the corners and at intervals on the sides, by poles, eighteen or twenty feet in length, sunk into the mud at the bottom. When the ground is found too hard to be thus penetrated the pole is anchored to a heavy stone, and swims as a buoy.

The staking out of their claims is a considerable item of expense, for owing to the ravages of the Teredo, a small shell-fish that bores into the wood and eats away its fibres, they last but a short time and have to be replaced, often twice in a year.

The humble oyster must be credited with great commercial importance. It has caused the building of two rival railroads, one on each side of the Maurice River, the erection of the town of Port Norris, and gives employment to more than four hundred sailing vessels, many of their two-masted schooners, and to numerous employés engaged in packing and shipping oysters to various parts of the globe. When we were landed on the west side of the river, we found a long train of cars being loaded with sacks and barrels of oysters, and between the railroad track and the water a range of wooden buildings and wharves, the offices and scene of operations of those engaged in the shipment of these shell fish. It was an unexpectedly busy scene—for three or four million of oysters are daily shipped from this place, furnishing loading for forty or fifty cars. There is probably no other one point in the world from which so many are sent.

We were soon introduced to Captain James O. Sheppard, the owner of a two-masted schooner, of thirty-three tons register, named after his daughter Mary F. Sheppard, in which we were to spend the next twenty-four hours. He was a pleasant-countenance and very respectable man, who not only abstains from strong liquors himself but regularly votes the prohibition ticket. Indeed, we were informed, that the Maurice River oystermen were, as a class, a very respectable body of people. Our Captain may be taken as a typical representative of the class. He had been many years in the business and had evidently been reasonably successful. He now owned eight oyster-beds, from which he dredged oysters in the fall and winter months. These were sold to the shipper at Bivalve, as the village along the railroad on the river bank below Port Norris is called.

We were soon on board of the vessel, our baggage stowed in the cabin, and we invited to make ourselves at home. We could scarcely have been more kindly waited upon, if we had chartered the vessel for our accommodation—and yet the Captain refused to receive any compensation for our meals and the privilege of the sail in his vessel; saying he would be paid if we would come again. Our vessel dropped down to near the mouth of the river, and anchored for the night. At supper, the Captain in a reverent manner offered thanks to the Almighty for his goodness in providing for us. Although I greatly prefer at meals the silent turning of the mind towards Him from whom cometh every good and perfect gift, to the unauthorized use of words which are apt to express more than is really felt, yet it was pleasant to find that the head of this sea family did acknowledge his dependence on a gracious Benefactor, and was not ashamed to manifest it to others. After the meal, the Captain and his five assistants and we seated ourselves around the cabin, and the time was pleasantly spent in interesting conversation, till eight o'clock, their usual time for retiring to their berths.

The berths were roomy, and the little boy was tucked into the recesses of one of them, behind the Captain, and beds were spread on the floor for the two men guests. I rested comfortably, and about five in the morning, the crew were roused up, the anchor raised to the deck, the sails spread, and we were soon ploughing our way through the waters to one of our Captain's oyster beds. It was surprising to me that the men could find, in the wide surface of water, the small spot to which they were bound—miles away from land. On the western end of Maurice River Cove is a point of land projecting southward called Egg Island Point. By getting into range with a lighthouse situated on this point, and certain objects on the land, such as pieces of woodland, our mariners were enabled to distinguish their own poles, planted in the mud, from those of their neighbors, and so to confine their dredging to their own grounds. No doubt long practice and constant use has so quickened their powers of observation and of memory, that these range lines are almost as well defined to them as those showing the telescope of a surveyor's compass, to one working on the land.

The oyster bed we were steering for was ten or twelve miles from Bivalve. When we reached its border the order was given, "Over!" and the two iron dredges were tumbled into the water, one on each side of the boat. These dredges consist of a four-sided iron frame supporting a shallow bag or net made of iron rings. The edge of the frame which scrapes the sea bottom, was furnished with teeth of four or five inches in length, designed to tear the oysters loose from their fastenings and turn them into the bag. As the vessel sailed on, these dredges were dragged along the bottom. Soon the order was given, "Gip!" or some similar almost inarticulate sound, but well understood by the men, who at once commenced drawing in the dredges by the aid of an iron windless with arms at each end. When it reached the top, it was seized by two men who turned out the contents on the deck, and again tumbled the dredge back into the water. This process was continued until the Captain thought a sufficient load had been secured. In the intervals between drawing up the dredges, the men were actively employed in sorting the oysters, throwing the larger ones called "Primes" into one basket, and the smaller ones called "Culls" into another, making a heap of the dead shells and other refuse near by. This refuse heap was afterwards shoveled back into the water.

The process of raising oysters for the market is somewhat similar to that of raising crops on land. The water plot or field must be first sown with seed. The seed in this case are small oysters, which are brought from other places where they grow naturally. Our Captain said he had planted 10,000 bushels of seed in the early part of the present season. The greater part of these he had dredged along the Delaware Bay north of Egg Island point—where the law permits dredging for seed in the early part of summer. He spoke also of having bought 3,000 bushels of seed from the Chesapeake, or other southern waters. In planting, as soon as the vessel enters the bounds of his own plot, the men shovel the young oysters over the side as rapidly as they can. In passing through the water they naturally scatter, so as to be distributed with tolerable evenness over the bottom. This process is continued or repeated, as the vessel sails to and fro and diagonally across the space to be planted, until all parts of it are thought to be sufficiently seeded. The oyster bed is then left undisturbed until the shell-fish have grown large enough to be marketable. The growth, we were told, is now much slower than it was years ago. There was a time, when two years' growth would make the oysters large enough to be worth dredging. But now, the "seed" are left to grow three, four or five years before the ground is dredged—and one planter, of large capital, allows his to remain for seven years, with the result that he obtains a larger proportion of "Primes" than his neighbors. The diminished rate of growth is probably due to the lessened supply of food occasioned by the great increase of the oysters which consume it. To the variation in the food supply may also probably be attributed the difference in the rate of growth in different parts of the Cove—the farther from land, and the nearer to the deep-water channel, the more rapid the growth of the oysters.

TIED MOTHERS.

Selected.

A little elbow leans upon your knee,
Your tired knee, that has so much to bear;
A child's dear eyes are looking lovingly
From underneath a heap of tangled hair.
Perhaps you do not hate the velvet touch
Of warm, moist fingers, folding yours so tight;
You do not prize this blessing over much,
You almost are too tired to pray to-night.

But it is blessedness! A year ago
I did not see it as I do to-day—
We were so dull and thankless, and too slow
To catch the sunshine as it slips away,
And now it seems surpassing strange to me,
That, while I wear the badge of motherhood,
I did not kiss more oft, and tenderly,
The little child that brought me only good.

And if, some night, when you sit down to rest,
You miss the elbow from your tired knee,
This restless curling head from off your breast,
This hisping tongue that chatters constantly;
If from your own the dimpled hands had slipped
And now would nestle in its palm again;
If the white feet into their grave had tripped,
I could not blame you for your heart pain.

I wonder so that mothers ever fret
At little children clinging to their gown;
Or that the footprints, when the days are wet,
Are ever black enough to make them frown.
If I could find a little muddy boot,
Or cap, or jacket, on my chamber floor;
If I could kiss a rosy, restless foot,
And hear its patter in my home once more:

If I could mend a broken cart to-day,
To-morrow make a kite to reach the sky—
There is no woman in God's world could say
She was more blessed than I was content than I.
But ah! the dainty pillow next my own
Is never rumped by a shining head;—
My singing birdling from its nest is flown;
The little child I used to kiss—is dead!

FAINT NOT, FEAR NOT, DOUBT NOT.

SELECTED.

A WORD FOR THE WEARY.

Weary one, faint not, though heavy thy burden;
Sweet is the resting that cometh at last,
Thine be the faith that can trust through the storm-cloud,
Holding thee up till the shadows are past.

Weary one, fear not, though dark be thy pathway;
One walks beside thee to whom it is known;
He who has said, "I will never forsake thee,"
He will not leave thee to tread it alone.

Weary one, doubt not his loving protection;
Wait not on windings till thy path be hid,
Rest on the promises, trust their fulfilment;
All that is needful and good shall be thine.

Weary one, now is the night of thy weeping;
"Joy in the morning," is coming to thee,
And when earth's shadows have vanished forever,
Where thy Redeemer is, there thou shalt be.

THE TWO WONDERS.

BY L. E. DIEKENGA.

* One day a harsh word, rashly said,
Upon an evil journey sped,
And like a sharp and cruel dart,
It pierced a fond and loving heart;
It turned a friend into a foe,
And everywhere brought pain and woe.

A kind word followed it one day,
Flew swiftly on its blessed way,
It healed the wound, it soothed the pain,
And friends of old were friends again;
It made the hate and anger cease,
And everywhere brought joy and peace.

But yet the harsh word left a trace,
The kind word could not quite efface,
And though the heart its love regained
It bore a scar that long remained;
Friends could forgive but not forget,
Or lose the sense of keen regret.

Oh, if we would but learn to know
How swift and sure our words can go,
How would we weigh with utmost care
Each thought before it sought the air,
And only speak the words that move
Like white-winged messengers of love?

FROM THE "BRITISH FRIEND," Reflections.

God said in the outward creation, "Let there be light, and there was light." The same Almighty power speaks the word that gives life to the soul. "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth, so is every one that is born of the Spirit." Hence salvation is not of him that willeth, or of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy.

There is therefore no room for boasting, and there is no place for triflers with the grace and goodness of God.

"Many are called," said Christ, "but few chosen." And why? the question may well be asked. Is it not because there is an unwillingness to follow Christ in the path of regeneration—a willingness to bear the name without the nature? How can such enter the kingdom?

There is abundant need for the proclamation of the nature of Christ's kingdom, into which nothing that is impure or unholy can ever enter. But who can so proclaim it except those who are willing to abide under the Master's hand and teaching, and to allow Him to refine and purify them even as gold and silver are purified.

Through the mouth of the Lord's prophet the language was put forth before the chosen people of God:—"And what doth the Lord thy God require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?"

There is a Divine light which enlightens, guides, purifies, and brings to view a purer nature than that of man, and a higher intelligence than that of the creature, placed in the very centre of our being, to which we must bow if we would know that peace which passes the natural understanding of man, inasmuch as it springs from obedience and subjection to this higher and purer nature; and herein an understanding is begotten of the first position; to do justly.

Can the man who accumulates his thousands, who adds field to field, and house to house, be said to be doing justly?

The working man, on his part, is seeking by combination to force forward his position, and claims as his right a more equal share in the distribution of the necessary things of this life. Doubtless he is, to a large extent, right in his claim, but his method of enforcing it is not Christian.

But who is to blame for the condition of warfare running through all society? Is it not very largely those professors of the Christian name who have heaped up riches to themselves but who have not taken to heart the lesson whose they are and whom they profess to serve, and so have not used their possessions as stewards of the gifts of God; and are we [Friends] less guilty in this respect than others professing the name of Christ? It is not that he might aggrandize himself that one man is endowed above another, but that he might minister to the necessities of the poor and needy, and also remember what is lawfully due to the laboring hands who make it possible for him thus to gather beyond his fellows.

The conscientious workman now often fluds himself between two millstones if he cannot join with trade combinations. On the one hand he is crushed aside by his fellow-mechanics because he cannot bow to their behests, and on the other he is at the mercy of the unprincipled employer who takes advantage of his non-resistant position.

There can be but one course for the Christian man, and that is to meet his fellow-man in a Christian spirit, and in the same spirit to stand to what is right, and act out and do as he would be done by, if he were in the like position.

The removal of the causes that degrade and tend to impoverish is the thing to be sought out and accomplished, and this means the close and home enquiry—"How much owe I to my Lord and Master?"

This will bring home to us the realization that we are but stewards, no matter what our possessions are, or the capacity with which we are endowed above and beyond our fellows, and that it is not for our own selfish gratification we are to live, regardless of what is due from us to those who surround us or are dependent upon us; for it is to be borne in mind that we have our Master in Heaven, and that to Him we are accountable for the righteous disposal of all things.

If things were thus brought to the even balance and to the just measure of righteousness, I believe no Christian could amass wealth as is done, but that a truer distribution would be made of that which is put into his power, for good. In this matter it is those who are the servants of Christ who ought to prove true examples to the world, and should be guides to their fellows by showing that they are actuated by higher motives than self-interest, or the love of gain.

Doing justly makes humble, for thereby we are made sensible of the proneness of our own nature to be otherwise; it enables us also to walk with God by the uprising of life in the soul toward God.

Need we wonder that those who are desirous thus to walk, seek retirement of spirit and wait much upon God in the quietness of their own spirits, in order to know the pure life arising in them to strengthen them in the warfare against sin and self, and in the obtaining of the fuller knowledge of complete redemption.

Ah, it is a struggle, thus to stand single in mind, in heart, and in life, to God, and to deny self, and take up the daily cross which by the Master is laid upon us, and so to realize in every position in life that if we are the servants of Christ, we must be ruled and governed by Him, so that the desire to acquire or to hold the things of this world may not have place other than as He wills, and as He, in the ordering of his holy mind, sees fit and best to direct. It needs that strength which God alone doth give to enable the dependent soul thus to stand.

The apostles were bidden by our Saviour to go into all the earth and preach the Gospel to every creature, and the Gospel we read "is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." But how can any preach that Gospel whose life is out from under the power of the living God? It is very easy to steal and repeat words that holy and godlike men and women have declared of what they have known and experienced in past years, but to live and walk in, and be governed by, the like power of God is a very different thing.

We express astonishment at times at the blindness of professing Christians passing over so lightly the plain injunction of our Saviour—"Love your enemies"—"which certainly cannot permit of killing them. Still, the same lips said, "Lay not up for yourselves treasure on earth," which certainly never can be made to mean, "Get all you can and hold all you have."

Now, why is it that we do not take as firm a hold of this latter injunction as we take of the one against war and strife? Is it not because we should condemn ourselves and our whole profession of the name of Christ if we did?

But is this in accord with the precepts of the Gospel, which bids us do as we would be done by?

How easy to see the mote in our brother's eye, but how difficult to see the beam in our own!

In our modern civilization, in which night is often turned into day and day into night, ask the question why it is so and what is the necessity for it, and the answer invariably is, "Pressure of business."

Is it really so—that men of necessity must have their newspaper laid upon their tables early in the morning; and must have hot rolls provided for the morning meal, for the pleasing of men's palates, or even for the good of their bodies, irrespective of what it signifies to procure them by night labor?

But one might go all through modern society and point out how the pleasure or gratification of one portion of mankind means the deprivation of another of their natural rest. And these things flourish most in so called Christian communities, which prove to my mind how very empty a large proportion of that profession is.

I know it is much easier to point out defects than it is to remove them. Still, there must be a willingness to hear and a readiness to do, if we are to know the structure of life built on the solid rock of Truth, the foundation of which is, doing justly; and we can only do justly as we are attentive to the voice of God in the soul which is the manifestation of Christ for our salvation; and it is by thus receiving Christ into our hearts and walking by his light, and in being strengthened by his power and grace to do God's holy will, that we are brought into sonship and oneness of spirit with Him, and can call God our Father which art in heaven, and honor and hallow his Holy Name. It will then be quite natural for us to love mercy, having been made partakers of God's mercy by the knowledge of his saving power; and it will be as easy and natural by the same power to walk humbly with God in prayerfulness and thankfulness of heart, and rejoicing in communion with Him.

The tricks of trade will not have dominion over us, and its untruthful methods will find no place with us. Holiness to the Lord will become as conspicuous in our business houses as in our meeting places where we assemble together professedly to worship God. The heart being God's temple, true worship will be the basis of our lives, for we shall recognize God everywhere and in all things, and will seek, according to the apostolic language, whether we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do, to do all to the glory of God.

To stand clear from the crowd in singleness of heart and mind, and to do our own duty in dependence upon God alone, may prove hard, but God will stand by the soul that stands single to Him, and with such the end will be glorious,—glorious in peaceful repose of soul in Him, and in the fulness of his love filling them.

The reason why so few depart out of life on earth with heavenly serenity and joy is because so few live godlike upon earth. The joy of heaven can have little place in minds choked with earth, and consequently the closing scene with such is one of soul-torment laced down with doubt and fear. Their knowledge of God and of Christ having been obtained by the hearing of the natural ear, their eye doth not see nor hath their ear heard of those glories that God hath prepared for those that love Him and which are inwardly revealed; and that because in the day of their visitation they were not willing to deny themselves, and take up the cross and follow Christ as He would lead. Nay it has been following the lead of their neighbors and the example of their fellows, and becoming one of the multitude, that have been the tares which have choked and hindered the growth of the good seed of the heavenly kingdom.

O that man would lay these things to heart, for it is not whom man commendeth, but whom the Lord commendeth that is accepted of Him.

The regenerating power of Christ is that which can renew society, and that alone. And society will be regenerated by individual faithfulness to God in all the little details of life, for he that is faithful in the little is he that will be made ruler over more.

In the endeavor to do the little, and that very imperfectly, has this been written, to stir up the pure mind by way of remembrance, even of that whereunto God hath called us in Christ Jesus, that we may not only be among the many called, but being faithful, at last may be found among the chosen to the glory of God the Father by Christ Jesus, through the eternal Spirit, one God over all, to whom be glory forever, amen.

Transmission of Power.—The Chemical News of Eighth Month 22d, states: The preparations for the forthcoming Electrical Exhibition at Frankfort-on-Main are now nearly completed. The chief feature of the exhibition is that all the motive power is to be supplied from Laufen, on the Neckar, in Wurttemberg, a distance of upwards of seventy miles. The electricity is here generated by means of water power from the falls of the Neckar at that place, and conveyed to Frankfort through cables.

Canine Hunters of Men.—In the Southern States hundreds of criminals who would otherwise escape are captured and brought to justice by the aid of keen-scented hounds. There are plenty of man-hunting dogs in the South to-day, but they are not bloodhounds. The dogs taught to trail men, instead of being fierce brutes that will tear a man to pieces, are only ordinary foxhounds of such little courage that a small boy or a pugnaucous rat terrier could put a whole pack of them to flight.

Some of the rich English gentlemen who settled in Virginia before the Revolution brought over with them some pure blooded foxhounds. When these gentlemen and their sons and grandsons became the owners of hundreds of slaves they found it necessary to devise some way to capture those who were constantly running away. In this emergency the idea of turning the keen scent of their foxhounds to a valuable use occurred to them. Pups were taken away from the kennels and never allowed to join in the practice chase after a fox skin dragged through the fields by a colored boy.

Instead, they were taught to follow the trail of the boy without the fox skin. In this way they learned that the only game they were expected to run to earth was the runaway slave. These trained slave hunters were found to be very valuable, and the business of breeding and training them grew until it extended all over the slave-holding States. The man-hunting dogs of to-day are descended from these English foxhounds. They are small and slender, with keen limbs and long ears. In color they are mostly red, black, and white, the three colors being about equally divided, usually in small, but sometimes in large spots.

In most of the Southern States the State and county convicts are leased or hired to contractors for various kinds of work outside the walls of the prisons. The contractors are bound by heavy penalties to prevent their escape. As they are often moved from one place to another, the contractors can not afford the expense of building strong prisons, so trust to the watchfulness of guards to prevent escapes, and keep a few trained dogs to trail down the few prisoners who do succeed in eluding the vigilance of their keepers.

At the Pratt coal mines, near Birmingham, Ala., 1,500 to 2,000 State convicts are worked by the company operating the mines. This company has the largest and best trained pack of man-hunting dogs to be found in the United States. The big kennel is located near the wooden prison, and a reliable and experienced man is paid a large salary to devote his entire time and attention to the care and training of the dogs. While they are kept to hunt convicts only, the officers of the company never refuse to loan the dogs to the local authorities to trail down desperate criminals.

The method of training the dogs is a simple one, but they require constant and careful attention. The most important part of their training is never to allow them to run at large where there is any chance for them to scent four-footed game. A convict who can be trusted not to take advantage of the temporary liberty is used in the process of training. A number of pups are taken out of the kennels with one or more old dogs to lead them. The liberated convict is then started off on a run while the pups are held back until he is out of sight. Then they are released, and with the old dog to find the trail and lead them, they are off at full cry. The chase continues until the convict is tired out.

He then stops, the pups come up with him, followed by the keepers, and by giving them some extra nice food they are made to understand that they have done their duty. This is kept up until the pups are at least a year old before they are ever put in a regular chase with the old dogs. Every time they are taken out for a trial run the start given the convict is increased until the pups learn to find and follow a cold trail. A start of three or four hours is successfully followed up before the young dogs can be depended on for real work. Any ambitious young pup caught running off on the trail of a rabbit or other game is at once called in and flogged.

When a dog is well trained he will never under any circumstances follow any except the human trail. Instead of being fierce creatures taught to tear their game to pieces, these dogs when they overtake a runaway simply run around him in a circle, keeping at a safe distance until the guards come up. As soon as the prisoner is secured they lie down and take no further interest in the game they have trailed so persistently. No matter how large the pack may be they never attack a man, but keep up an incessant baying that tells the pursuing guards that the chase is ended.

The keen scent of these dogs is wonderful.

If the ground is damp and the atmosphere moist they can follow a trail ten or twelve hours old. If it is dry or raining, a trail four to seven hours old is all they can be depended on to follow. Once started on the right trail they never make a mistake, unless the fugitive takes to water and follows it for a great distance. In this way he may throw them off the scent, but in no other. They will follow a man for hours through the crowded streets of a city, into house after house, cross the tracks of thousands of other men, and never lose the original trail.

Once started on the track of a criminal they are a veritable Nemesis that can not be shaken off. Various means of getting them started on the right track have been adopted. If any article of clothing worn by the escaped convict can be found it is held to the nose of every dog in the pack. They are then released at the place where he was last seen and told to go. For a few moments they will circle about with their noses close to the ground, and then a short, sharp bark is a signal that they have found the scent. Again they are given the word to go, and in a moment they are off at full cry, if the trail is fresh. If the trail is a cold one they move very slowly at first, keeping their heads close to the ground.

When the trail grows warm they increase their speed to a swiftness gallop, run with heads well up, and then give full vent to the cry that stirs the blood in the veins of every true huntsman. Where no clothing or article belonging to the escaped prisoner can be obtained the keepers must find his tracks if possible. If that can not be done the only thing to do is to take the dogs to the spot where he escaped or was seen last, give them the word to go, and trust to them to find the right trail. These are the facts about the man-hunting dogs of the South. They are small and harmless foxhounds, carefully trained to follow only the trail of men.—Chicago Herald.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Young Friends Appearing in the Ministry.

From records of persons coming forth in the ministry early in their lives, we select the subjoined:—Patience Scott, though but a child of eleven years, was employed by the Most High in his holy cause; wherein she gave evidence of being endowed with a wisdom above that of the world. George Newland, a youth of Ireland, entered upon this Gospel service in his twelfth year; and died about the age of nineteen. During the most of this intermediate period, he labored in the churches in his native land, to the comfort and edification of his friends. Ellis Lewis, of North Wales, felt constrained to engage in the ministry in his thirteenth year. Some of his communications, it is stated, were remarkable and tendering. Another instance of early dedication and submission to this holy calling, was that of the noted William Hunt, of North Carolina. He entered upon his Gospel labors when about fourteen. So early as eleven years of age, he had remarkable openings in Divine things. Christiana Barclay, the daughter of Robert Barclay, the Apologist, also entered on this important work when about fourteen years old. Susanna Lightfoot, though poor as to the things of this life, was enriched by her Lord with the treasures of his heavenly kingdom; and in her seventeenth year, He dignified her with a gift in the ministry. In the same year—the seventeenth of her age—she came on a religious visit to Friends in America; being, it is believed, the youngest minister in our religious Society who crossed the Atlantic on a Gospel mission. Sarah (Lynes) Grubb, says of herself: "When I grew to be about thirteen years of age, I began to discover something about me, or in my mind, like the heavenly pointing for the ministry." She first gave utterance, publicly, to a sentence or two, when seventeen years old. She became, through passive submission to the Lord's holy will, a faithful and dignified hand-maiden in his harvest field. (Lebecca Jones, of Philadelphia, though not a member by birth, was, about the sixteenth year of her age, brought under deep religious convictions. She soon after applied, and was received into membership; and first spoke as a minister when about nineteen; and as such travelled much in her own land, and also in Great Britain and Ireland. Many other young persons among Friends in the fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth years of their age, it is well known, were also called by Him whose "Spirit ploweth where it listeth," to proclaim to others the unsearchable riches of his heavenly kingdom.

As an illustration of the power and efficacy which has attended the ministry of some of our youthful preachers, may be instanced the remarkable fact, that the Society of Friends in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, and Cambridge, was first raised and became very numerous, chiefly through the instrumentality of James Parnel, William Caton, and George Whitehead, before either of them had attained the age of twenty years.

What good reason can be assigned for the absence of similar cases in our day? Has the Divine treasury of healing, transforming, and all-sufficient grace, become exhausted, though promised to be continued to us through all time? Or does the efficient cause lie in the want of more Christian watchfulness and prayerfulness on the part of parents, to lead their susceptible charge to Christ, the great Teacher? Is this, or is it from an unwillingness in the children themselves, to yield, in this very interesting period of their lives, to the teaching and sanctifying power of the grace of God manifest in the heart? Would that the visitations and tender cravings of the Lord's Holy Spirit rested in every bosom, might be duly regarded and followed,—then, no doubt, would be again seen, children of the ages noted in the foregoing, called and qualified, "like plants grown up in their youth," to exalt the name and kingdom of the Redeemer, and hosannas be again sung to his praise from young, but sanctified lips.

Those of a by-gone period, before recorded in this essay, were early and filially espoused a faithfulness to the Lord; and because of this, He enriched them with increased measures of His grace and Spirit, and power from on High; so that even when in their teens, they became strong in the Lord and in the power of his right. Another noticeable fact of that day, (as the unfeigned willingness wrought, not only those of junior years, but of the middle-aged so, to dedicate the prime and vigor of their years to their dear Saviour, who thence in loving regard, became to them "the chiefest among a thousand," yea, "altogether lovely.")

May their early and steadfast allegiance to be High Priest of our profession, Jesus the Son of God, be a taking example to us, and incite to an unreserved offering up of our time and talents and affections, to the rich Rewarder of all those who diligently seek Him. That thus here may more generally be seen within our orders, a full surrender of the heart to the Beloved of souls; whereupon He would fulfil his ancient promise of the blessing and enlargement of the coasts of these, and, moreover, of coming into his garden—hearts given up to love and serve Him—to eat of his pleasant fruits.

Ostentatious Funerals.—George William Curtis deserves the thanks of the American people for protesting against the ostentation which has become so marked a feature of funerals in this country. He justly says: "The Christian thought in that hour should instinctively dwell upon the soul, not upon the body, and the simplest and most unostentatious rite of burial would seem to be the most truly Christian." Let rich Christians set an example of moderation, for the poor will make equally useless and injurious sacrifices "so long as ostentation is the custom."

A Great and Growing Evil.—The increasing frequency of murder by lynching is one of the most frightful evils of the present time. There is no greater reproach to our modern civilization. In the ages of superstition and ignorance no law of human life was taken without form of law by feudal lords who were a law unto themselves.

We read of those dark ages with horror, and yet we live in an age where the taking of human life without form of law is still more generally sanctioned by the people, at least in our country, which boasts of being the most advanced in civilization. Hundreds of lynchings occur each year.

It has become an accepted idea with a majority of the people that a certain class of offenders cannot be put to death too quickly, and should not be given a chance of acquittal by jury trial. This amounts to saying that the ends of justice can be served better by acting on sudden impulse than sober judgment.

There are many cases of crime so heinous and so well proven that they seem to cry for instant vengeance, but if the law may be set aside in one instance, where is to be drawn the line beyond which the people may or may not go? The newspapers show that lynch law is being visited not only on the worst offenders but on those who commit comparatively slight misdemeanors. And the evil is growing.

At Tullahoma, Tenn., about a week ago, a negro boy, nineteen years of age, was arrested for drunkenness and put in jail. For two years previous he had been intemperate, and when under the influence of liquor he was quarrelsome and rowdyish. Further than this there were no charges against him. On the night following his arrest, at 1 o'clock, six or seven masked men broke into the jail, took the boy out and hung him to a tree.

This shows to what an extreme the practice of lynching may be carried, and such instances will become frequent if popular sentiment on this subject is not promptly reformed. The public has become familiar with atrocities scarcely less shocking than this, so familiar that public sentiment is becoming callous. This in itself is a serious consequence of the toleration of this evil.

But the most serious consideration of all in regard to the prevalence and encouragement of lynch law is the undoubted fact that much of this kind of violence is prompted by personal malice and by a desire for desperate adventure. The persons who hung the boy at Tullahoma undoubtedly had a grudge against him, and they knew they could put him out of the way without danger to themselves.

Lynching is about the safest sort of adventure that can be indulged in. And if a person thirsts for vengeance against another, what easier way of gratifying it is there than by laying a plot of private revenge, by procuring a means of murder, and by a desire for desperate adventure. The persons who hung the boy at Tullahoma undoubtedly had a grudge against him, and they knew they could put him out of the way without danger to themselves.

his crucifixion, after showing the great improbability that this could be the one. It is claimed to be, makes the following remarks: "Now, our objection to relics is not wholly a theological one. It has not so much to do with their use as their abuse. We believe in relics. We should value it beyond expression if we could possess the real holy coat, or the veritable cross, or any material object connected with Him. We would place it in the most honored room of our greatest museum of theology and art, and hold it in such higher honor than any of the relics of Washington or Lincoln as our Divine Lord was superior to any human hero. But there it should stay, and it should have no other sort of honor than that which other relics of lesser men have, only a higher honor of the same sort. We would not go to it and expect that by its virtue connected with it the sick could be healed through the exercise of a faith which was not equally attainable anywhere else. The exhibition of the holy coat with a view to expected miracles is, we regret to say, nothing better than fetishism, and it is not one whit superior in spiritual intelligence to the sale and distribution of scapulars and medals which is going on every day in New York, encouraged by a certain class in the Church and discouraged and despised by another class. We have a deep interest in seeing the Catholic Church purged itself, we do not now care of its distinctive doctrines, but of its confessed medievalisms and superstitions, for which its best men are so often compelled to apologize, and which its best apologetic writers, like the editors of the Catholic Dictionary, attempt to reduce to a minimum."

What Good Purpose Does the Use of Alcoholic Liquors as Beverages Answer?—The best scientific investigators and advanced moralists unite in saying that if frequently used even in so-called moderate amounts, they lessen a man's power of resisting disease, shorten his life, and lower his ability for work and thought. The drinking of them may increase the feeling of good fellowship in a certain number of cases, but never in any high or ennobling sense; and our example encourages others to partake of that which has a strong tendency to hurt themselves and those dependent upon them into poverty, disgrace, disease, suffering, crime and premature death. There is absolutely no laughing thing about it. They are as well proved as any facts in social science. We have got down then on the basis of truth in regard to the matter. Is it according to love that we for our own pleasure, or to administer to the lower desires of others, should partake ourselves or encourage others to partake of that which causes such sorrow and sin? Is it just or right for us, even if we consider ourselves safe, which no one is who partakes, to expose the family and friends of our companion to the possible loss and misery which must come upon them, if he falls before the temptation? Let it be again noted that there is no legitimate reason in the matter of health for our partaking, the only excuse is that it is a custom, or that we enjoy it. What conclusion must we arrive at? Judged according to this test our indulgence is unmitigated selfishness and as much in accord with the teaching of Christ, as selfishness is with love, no more.—Richard Henry Thomas in Friends' Review.

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 18, 1891.

It has pleased our merciful Father in Heaven to visit all to the in-shinings of his Divine Light and grace, showing unto us what we should do and what we should avoid, and giving us power to walk in the path that leads to eternal life, if we will be humbly and watchfully obedient to his guidance and directions. The period of the rise of the Society of Friends was one of a special outpouring of his Spirit, in which many thousands were convinced of his blessed Truth, and with full purpose of mind entered into covenant with the Lord, and walked in his ways with a good degree of faithfulness. We, of this day, read the record of their experiences with admiration of their faithfulness, and are proud to claim them as members of the same religious Society with ourselves.

But there are many of us who do not walk in the same holy path of self-denial and bearing the daily cross. The lusts of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, have tarnished the brightness of our profession; and we do not properly realize the force of the Scripture declaration that "to be carnally-minded is death, but to be spiritually-minded is life and peace."

There are some whose situation and surroundings have not favored the acquisition of the means for indulging in luxury and display, and whose thoughts are more turned towards religious subjects, but who appear not to be so enlightened as to see, that all ability to promote Christ's cause in the earth must come immediately from Him; and that without the impulse and assisting presence of his Spirit, they cannot convert a sinner from the evil of his ways, or preserve their own spiritual life. Hence they are too apt to measure the religious usefulness of a man, by his zeal in preaching, or other services professionally in the cause of Christ, without inquiring too nicely into the motives which actuate him, whether it is the pure constraining of the Spirit, or whether it is the applause of others, the hope of remuneration, or the natural activity of a restless mind.

William Penn declares that the testimony of our early Friends "was to the principle of God in man, the precious pearl and leaven of the Kingdom, as the only blessed means appointed of God to quicken, convince and sanctify man." Being convinced, that "without the secret Divine power of Christ, there is no quickening and regenerating of dead souls," the early ministers among Friends "could not run where they list, or pray or preach when they pleased; but as Christ their Redeemer prepared and moved them by his own blessed Spirit, for which they waited in their services and meetings, and spoke as that gave them utterance."

It is for a want of the experience of and faith in this "Divine Power of Christ," that some under the name of Friends have come to lightly esteem our practice, when gathered in our religious meetings, of reverently waiting upon God for the reception of a qualification to worship Him in Spirit and in Truth, or to proclaim his messages to the people. Their speech and their preaching are not "in the demonstration of the Spirit and of power," but with enticing words of man's wisdom. They are not qualified to adopt the language of George Fox, who said "When the Lord God and his Son Jesus Christ sent me forth into the world, to preach his everlasting Gospel and Kingdom, I was glad that I was commanded to turn people to that inward Light, Spirit, and grace, by which all might know their salvation and their way to God."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In the election held on the 3d inst., the Republican party carried the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio; the Democrats that of New York. In Massachusetts and Iowa, the Democrats elected the Governors, and the Republicans a majority of Representatives to the State Legislatures.

Secretary Rusk, in his annual report as Secretary of Agriculture, says that, notwithstanding the abundant yield of crops this year, values are well sustained, and he estimates that the increase in the value of agricultural products over last year will be not less than $70,000,000. He estimates that during the first three months of the present year our exports in cereals alone have aggregated $76,000,000.

A dispatch from Muskogee, Indian Territory, says that the filing of a petition in equity for a number of Cherokee Indians, asking the partition and allotment in severity of nearly 14,000,000 acres of land of the Cherokee Indians, is creating quite a stir among the Indians of the civilized tribes. "It is thought to be the largest land suit ever instituted in America." The Federal Government has directed that the lottery matter seized in violation of the Postal Union Convention shall be held as illegal importations, and, for the present, treated as unclaimed merchandise, but excluded from sale until further orders.

Judge Taintor, of Portland, Connecticut, has decided that wholesale liquor dealers located outside the State cannot sell liquor in Connecticut without taking out a license in each county where the liquor is to be sold.

A Sioux City, Iowa, dispatch says that "as a result of the Democratic victory in Iowa and the hope that the prohibition law will be soon repealed, the Union Stock Yards in Sioux City announces that it will soon begin the construction of a large brewery there."

An Indianapolis dispatch says that a party of Government surveyors, who have been at work locating the boundary line between Ohio and Indiana, have discovered that the true line, as declared when Ohio was first a territory, and before the cession of the west of the present boundary and makes a strip 200 miles long and of an average width of six miles, to which Ohio lays claim. Should this claim be enforced, Indiana would, on the same grounds, have cause of action against Illinois.

A quantity of gas occurred at the shaft of the Susquehanna Coal Company, at Nanticoke, Pa., on the 8th inst., caused by the explosion of a safety lamp. There were fourteen men at work. Ten were killed and four dangerously injured.

Dispatches received at Nashville, Tennessee, say that over 700 of the liberated convicts have been captured in the vicinity of Kentucky, and are here to await the action of the Tennessee authorities. One man was killed, who resisted arrest. It has been subsequently announced that fifty of the captured convicts have been returned to Tennessee.

At the Annual Meeting of "the Bible Association of Friends," held in this city on the 3d inst., it was decided without dissent, that women shall hereafter be placed on the Board of Managers; and the Committee appointed to nominate officers next year was equally divided between the sexes. This is another indication of the passing away of that prejudice which has heretofore existed against women as far as the full recognition of the exercise by woman of the "diversity of gifts" conferred without regard to sex.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 410; which is 24 less than during the previous week; 62 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of this the heretofore mentioned were killed; 22 died of consumption; 41 of diphtheria; 34 of diseases of the heart; 24 of pneumonia; 22 of cancer; 17 of convulsions; 14 of old age; 14 of marasmus; 13 of Bright's disease; 12 of cancer; 11 of inanition and 10 of bronchitis.

Exchange, &c.—U. S. 2's, 99½ a 100; 3's, 116 a 117; currency 75, 111 a 121.

COTTON was quiet and unchanged. Sales on a basis of 8c. per pound for middling uplands.

FEED.—Winter bran, in bulk, $19.00 a $19.50; spring bran, in bulk, $18.00 a $18.50.

Wool.—Western and Pennsylvania spener, $3.00 a $3.25; do, do, 185 cent; do, do, 180 cent; do, do, 180 cent; fair, $4.25 a $4.50; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $4.50 a $4.80; Western winter, clear, $4.50 a $4.65; do, do, straight, $4.65 a $5.00; winter patent, new, $5.00 a $5.25; Minnesota, clear, $4.75 a $4.90; do, straight, $4.5 a $5.10; do, patent, $5.10 a $5.50.

Choice flour is in good request; 150 barrels of extra Pennsylvania sold at $5.10 per barrel. But small wheat flour was quiet, with fair offerings at former rates, viz: $2.10 a $2.20 per 100 pounds for good to choice new.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, $1.04 a $1.04½.

No. 2 white wheat, 96 a 97 cts.

No. 2 white oats, 39½ a 40 cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, none here; good, 4½ a 5 cts; medium, 4½ a 4½ cts; fair, 4 a 4½ cts; common, 3¾ a 3½ cts; culls, 3 a 3½ cts; Texans, 3 a 4 cts; fat cows, 2 a 3 cts.

SHIPPING LAMBS.—Extra, 51 a 53 cts; good, 4½ a 5 cts; medium, 4¼ a 4½ cts; common, 3¾ a 4 cts; culls, 2 a 3 cts; lambs, 3 a 6 cts.

HOGS.—6 a 6½ cts. for good Western, and 5½ a 5½ cts. for the other grades.

FOREIGN.—As has been expected, the result of the Cork election was the total defeat of the Parallellites.

Martin Flavin, the candidate of the McCarthyites, had a majority of 1,512 votes over the Parallellite candidate.

Le Motin prints a letter from Signor Crispi to Desmarets, of the Paris bar, in which, after saying that the Pope "is consumed with ambition, and would sell his soul for a temporal power for the Papacy," Signor Crispi expresses approval of the neutralizing of Signor Lorraine on the condition that France join the Dreuband. Alsace, then, he says, will be a "buffer" between France and Germany. The Dreuband agreement, he adds, contains no word against France. He concludes by appealing to all men to unite to preserve Europe from the charge of war.

A dispatch to the London Times, from Singapore, says: "Hunan Elterati have issued a manifesto ordering the search and expulsion of all native Christians, the confiscation of their property and the destruction of the churches. Christian native officials are menaced with inferior at Pekin."

Reports are increasing in number of thefts of grain in Saratoff, Russia, owing to the destitution of the people. In some districts the people eat food refused by animals. The rumor is repeated that mothers kill their children in order to prevent their starving to death. The famine has revealed the existence of considerable maladministration among Government officials. Some of the Ministers are likely to be dismissed. A number of Zeeinatos or provincial assemblies propose to close all drink shops in the famine districts, in order to prevent peasants from spending relief money at the tavern.

On the 2d inst., a cyclone passed over the Andaman Islands, situated in the Bay of Bengal. The islands form a British convict settlement, to which East Indian criminals are transported, and the steamer Enterprise, belonging to the Indian Government, and used to convey prisoners to the islands and for other purposes, was wrecked. The steamer was a large vessel, and the vessel foundered, and of her crew of 82 men only six were saved. The other 77 either went down with the steamer, or were drowned while attempting to reach the shore.

The cyclone that passed over the Andaman Islands destroyed a large number of buildings in the Indian penal settlement. Sixty convicts were killed and 200 were injured.

A dispatch from Japan gives the latest official estimate of the killed and injured by the recent earthquake along the island of Hondu. According to these figures, 6,500 were killed, and 4,000 injured. The amount of damage done can be imagined from the fact that the official estimates place the number of houses destroyed at 75,000, to which is to be added 12,000 other houses considerably damaged.

The damage caused by the violent storm in Japan, of the 14th inst., was very serious to both life and property. It is now definitely known that 82 lives were lost and that 3,700 houses were entirely destroyed. Seven hundred and eighty vessels were carried out to sea or sunk. In addition great damage was caused to crops. The loss to property is roughly estimated at one million dollars.

Dr. Deodoro da Fonseca has declared himself dictator of Brazil. A dispatch to the New York Herald says: "The whole difficulty has grown out of the jealousy between the President and Congress. The Cabinet wanted an inflation of the currency. Congress voted against this and also passed an impeaching bill over the head of the President. This enraged the President, who resolved to dissolve Congress, although this proceeding was clearly unconstitutional, as at that time the budget had not yet been voted. Deodoro da Fonseca is again Dictator, governing by virtue of his own decrees. He has promised that new elections will soon be held, and has insisted upon certain changes in the Constitution. The Congress, having found itself unable to publish a manifesto, its members are returning home."

A dispatch from Pernambuco, dated the 9th inst., states that the province of Rio Grande do Sul has declared its independence.

A dispatch from Valparaiso says that Admiral Jorge Montt has been unanimously elected President of the Republic of Chili. The Chilian Government is seeking a friendly solution of the difficulty with the United States over the Baltimore sailors' incident.

For "THE FRIEND."

Selections from the Journal of William Evans.

1845.—"Went to Norwich; which is perhaps the largest country meeting in this Yearly Meeting. I felt poor, and fearful of being wrong or doing wrong; but strove to look up to the Master, and to wait upon Him for direction. Two states were brought before me; one a low, suffering seed, not numerous, but who were endeavoring to fill up their measure of duty, and whom the Lord qualified to behold the gradual lapse of some from the Truth, and what they had once known of it, and who mourned over such. The other, one that is sunk in the earth, exerting every faculty and energy to acquire property; by which their time and thoughts are absorbed; so that the work of salvation, the necessary daily, spiritual food for the immortal soul, and a deep and living concern for the education of their children in the fear of the Lord are overlooked; and the lambs entrusted to their care are suffered to run at large, entering into various kinds of society, and into the corrupt practices of the world. After a time it appeared proper to open these views, which I did in weakness and fear. But I kept patient and low, and spoke as things gradually arose; and after a time, the Lord in mercy touched our hearts with the finger of his love and tendering power, and brought us to tears; giving me a renewed sense of my nothingness and inability to do anything without Him; and his compassionate goodness was felt so as to affect many of us, and to carry conviction home to others. My soul humbly bowed in reverence and thankfulness before Him. The business of the Monthly Meeting was transacted, I had no doubt, on the part of not a few, under a sincere concern that it should be rightly managed. I feared, however, they were too easy in receiving persons into membership, and I mentioned, it was easier to increase a nation, than to increase its joy and strength. My companion was afterwards told, that the condition of the meeting was remarkably described. So that we have cause to trust in the Lord at all times, keeping a single eye to, and closely following his leadings, though in fear and weakness."

"At Tecumseh Meeting, I was particularly engaged to speak on the many trials and afflictions which overtake us in this life; and it being rather unusual for me to dwell so decidedly upon that subject, I mentioned that I did not know there were any present under peculiar trial, but if there were, I wished such to profit by them, and be instructed in the great instability of earthly possessions. In supplication to the Father of mercies, I was led to petition that the everlasting arms might be underneath, to sustain those who are in affliction, and that their faith might be renewed in Him. The Friend who took us to the meeting, told us, as we were riding back to his house, that two or three days before, a person intoxicated, attempted to commit personal injury upon an industrious, orderly young man; and also had threatened to burn down the outbuildings on his farm, which he had made some effort to accomplish; and that this young man and his brother were at the meeting. How necessary in the little services we may have to perform, to keep close to our guide, and not attempt to choose for ourselves, or refuse to communicate that which the omniscient One gives. I mention this, as I hesitated, in my own mind, to speak on afflictions; because it is a subject easily and often commented on; but nothing else appeared to come before me to say."

"We attended their First-day Meeting, at Pickering, in which the life and power of religion felt to me to be low. The Lord enabled me to search into the condition of things among them; to show the stumbling effect which those have, who are not producing the fruits of religion in their lives, and how they are looked on by honest people, who do not make such high profession. Also the danger of forsaking silent waiting on the Lord, and running into the expression of words, to gratify a restless disposition, was spoken to, as being comparable to Saul, who without Divine authority, made an offering in the absence of the prophet Samuel, lest the people should be scattered; but whom the prophet told he had done foolishly. The true preparation and qualification for the ministry were alluded to; and the suffering remnant among them were encouraged to abide at the Lord's feet, and to endure the baptisms which He administers; that so they may grow in grace, and in the saving knowledge of their Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. I felt constrained to bow in supplication for the few who are striving to keep the faith, and to bear, though in fear and in meekness, a faithful testimony for the Truth, and that those who are holding back, might be stirred up to more zeal and devotion, and be brought forward in their ranks and service in the church."

"Marrying contrary to the discipline is so common in Canada, even with some from whom a different example should be expected, that the testimony against the practice, cannot be said to be maintained. Some Friends are so weak, that they seem to approve, rather than disapprove, of this violation of our wholesome discipline; on the ground, as they say, that instead of losing a member, the Society mostly gains one. But in the first place, it lays the qualification of the offender to support the discipline, in other cases, if he is retained in membership, by offering a paper, as it is termed. And when the discipline is loosely administered, weakness over-spreads, in relation to an upright and impartial course in other respects. Secondly, if the party who had never been a member is received, for the sake of accommodation, or without real conviction of our principles and testimonies, weakness and blindness may be, in like manner, introduced through this channel; and thus meetings for discipline, become formal, lifeless appendages to the Society."

"At the Half-year's Meeting of Ministers and Elders—a low time to me; yet I did not feel easy, without endeavoring to hold up the great responsibility of the stations they occupied; the indispensable necessity of enforcing the doctrines of Christ, by example, in all our intercourse among men; that the source of all true Gospel ministry is the Great Head of the church; who by his Spirit, opens to the minds of his servants, what He ordains them to communicate to the people; and that the same Spirit also gives a true discerning to elders; by which they may rightly distinguish between that which comes from the true Spring, and the deceptive workings of the natural reason and the imagination. The necessity of the faithful discharge of their duties, in laying a hand upon suppliant offerings, was pressed upon them. The practice which generally prevails, of sending for ministers to attend burials, as if the dead could not be interred in a Christian manner, without preaching, was brought into view, and Friends were cautioned against encouraging it, by going to places out of their own neighborhood, for such purpose, unless under a sense of religious duty."

"On the next day, the Meeting for Discipline was held; in the forepart of which, many spoke. I felt not a little grieved with a sense of the want of sound and faithful elders, and a right feeling of the order which belongs to the church of Christ; in which the servants and ministers know how to keep their places, under the direction of the great Law-giver. After a time, I believed it right to bear testimony to the necessity of enduring suffering, in order that we may reign with Christ; that being baptized into death, we may know that it is to be raised up, by Him, who is the resurrection and the life; and to encourage a remnant who were in suffering, to be faithful to their Lord and Master. One of the ancient martyrs said, though she could not say much for Christ, she could suffer for Him. It is through baptism, we are prepared to receive gifts, and to be put into the stations which the Great Head designs us for, in his church; and without this experience, none can take part or lot in the work of the Lord. If they attempt to be active, in their own will and wisdom, they minister death instead of life; wound themselves, bring distress over the living members, and confusion into the church. The true servants of Christ, who know how to keep their ranks in righteousness, have the sentence of death in themselves, not to trust in themselves, but in God, who raiseth the dead. These in their services, are a savor of life unto life, and of death unto them that are dead. The Master helped me to discharge myself honestly, and Truth came over some restless spirits. The young people were invited to come under the refining hand of the Baptizer of his people, that by his cleansing power, they may be prepared for usefulness in his church."

"In new settlements, where the benefits of religious education and habits are not always discoverable, there is reason to fear that that circumspection, which true religion requires, is not attained, as it ought to be, among some. Population being thin, it is natural for persons to seek such society as is within their reach; and where there is a want of Christian watchfulness, improper associations may be indulged, obstructing the elevation of the standard of Truth and righteousness. In the meeting which we held here (Camden) with the Friends and their neighbors, I was exercised on the danger of mingling with persons of uncertain principles and evil habits, who have little or no reverence for religion; and I warned them against allowing their children to associate with such; lest they should be poisoned in principle, and spoiled in their manners and conduct. Other subjects, as they were brought before me, were spoken to. Afterwards, a Friend said, if they had told me beforehand their situation, it could not have been more fully described; which is another proof that the spring of all true Gospel ministry, is in Him who hath the key of David; to whom all the honor and praise belong."

"At a Friend's house, five miles short of the meeting-house at Leeds, we found a large family of children, and the Friends in slender circumstances; which caused us to feel much for them, and for their children. Such have many hardships to encounter; and their time being almost wholly occupied in providing necessary food and clothing, leaves but little opportunity to give direct attention to the habits and mental improvement of their offspring. Yet such is the great importance of right principles being impressed on their tender minds, and adopted, they should do what they can, to bring up the children not only in industry and cleanliness, but instructing them in useful branches of learning; in frequently reading the Holy Scriptures; and, above all, to turn their hearts to the teachings of the Holy Spirit, that they may be brought to live in the fear of their great Creator. By this godly care, enforced by example, the minds of the children would be stored with knowledge, that would raise them above the practice of low jesting, and trifling conversation on subjects or occurrences of a frivolous character; and which tend to degrade the mind. How responsible is the standing of those who are engaged in instructing others in the work of religion. While advocating the power of Divine Grace, how ought they to show its efficacy in themselves, and in a proper concern and care for their offspring."

It is said of that worthy servant of the Lord, Francis Howgill, that "nothing did rejoice his heart more than to have the Truth prospered, and that the churches did increase in the blessed fellowship of the Gospel of Christ Jesus."

To decline all advice, unless the example of the good confirms his precepts, would be about as sapient as if a traveller were to refuse to follow the directions of a finger-post, unless it drew its one leg out of the ground, and walked, or rather hopped after its own finger.

The Eastern Shore of Chesapeake Bay.

The demand for laborers to cultivate the land produced a demand for the services of African slaves in many of the American colonies. This was especially the case in Maryland, where raising tobacco furnished profitable employment for their labor. The members of our Society, as well as other colonists, fell into the habit of holding in bondage these victims of oppression. Symptoms of uneasiness with the practice early began to manifest themselves, and continued to increase until the Society gradually girded itself up to the task of entirely removing this stain from its borders. Long and affectionate labor was expended in convincing the slaveholders among them of the unrighteousness of the system, and in persuading them to manumit their slaves. The records of our meetings about the middle, and later than the middle of last century abound with notices of these labors.

In the reports to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1776, Philadelphia Quarter reports that its committee had obtained the manumission of 125 persons held in bondage. Bucks Quarter says, "Divers of those who were possessed of slaves have been prevailed with to set them at liberty since last year." The accounts from the other quarters are similar in their statements.

Similar reports were sent up from year to year, until in 1781 it was stated that the few cases of slavery that remain in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting are chiefly attended with some complicated circumstances—which it is to be presumed prevented the execution of legal manumissions.

The same progress of light and conviction went on among Friends in other provinces of America, as did in Pennsylvania. Samuel Fothergill, in 1756, after his return from a religious visit to this country, in writing to James Wilson, gives his impressions of the state of religion in the different provinces which he visited. He says: "Maryland is poor [in spiritual riches]; the gain of oppression, the price of blood is upon that province. I mean their purchasing and keeping in slavery, negroes—the ruin of true religion the world over, wherever it prevails. Friends there are greatly decreased in number, and mixed with the world in whose spirits they dwell. The unfaithfulness to their testimony against the hiring priests, and their hands polluted with the gains of unrighteousness, have almost destroyed even appearances of Truth in various parts; and as the pure gift of the ministry cannot be communicated to such unclean vessels, there is great scarcity of ministers. I know no more than two in the province, on whom is the heavenly stamp visible, and they are neither negro keepers nor priest payers. Nevertheless in this Sardinia, the blessed hand is at work. Some are lately convinced, and amongst the rising youth are some of the true Hebrew race, who have heard the alarm of the heavenly trumpet."

The testimony of Samuel Fothergill as to the hurtful effect of slavery on the spiritual condition of those connected with it, accords with that already published in a preceding number of this article as given by Job Scott. Yet through the fresh stirrings of life, and aided probably by the example and influence of Friends elsewhere, the testimony against slavery grew and strengthened among Friends in Maryland—especially on the Eastern Shore. In 1770 the Yearly Meeting at Thirdhaven adopted the following Minute:—"Friends having been favored with a time of much calmness and brotherly tenderness towards each other, it appears to be the solid sense and judgment of this meeting that, in future, Friends be careful to avoid appointing such Friends to the station of elders as are in possession of negro slaves, and do not appear to have a testimony in their hearts against the practice of slave-keeping."

In 1777, the same meeting records:—"Our testimony against slavery appears to grow and afford encouragement; as by accounts brought to this meeting, seventy manumissions have been handed in to the several Monthly Meetings to be recorded, since last year."

The Journal of Mary Berry, a valuable minister residing on the Eastern Shore, relates some of her labors in this cause. As she was paying family visits in 1780, she says: "As I went to one house, I felt a great exercise come over me. As I rode through the plantation, and seeing the place look well, as if it might belong to a wealthy farmer, I found something within me, that wanted to ask the Friend that went with us, if there were any slaves there. But I felt something prohibit my asking any question. When we reached the door, the woman of the house came out. She invited us in. The man came in, and we sat down. My exercise was great, even to trembling. It passed through my mind several times—there are slaves here. I spoke to him as things opened, in great plainness. At length, his countenance fell, and he looked down and seemed affected. I let him know, if I was not mistaken, he not only strove against conviction, but burdened his wife's mind, who, I believed, was convinced of the iniquity of holding slaves. He confessed it was so."

In 1781 she visited the families of Cecil Monthly Meeting. In some of these "great tenderness appeared," and they expressed a willingness to do what Friends should advise. "Some time since my return, my husband received account by letter, from a friend, near seventy negroes being set free by individuals not members of our Society, but whom I was drawn to visit."

In 1784, when visiting families, at one place the master of the household said he was willing to hear her, if she would not say anything about his slaves. He could not part with them by any means, as he was under so many engagements. She says, "I could not come into terms with him; but after some time we dropped into quiet. I then felt my way open with much tenderness, to express my feelings for those who were under these embarrassments in keeping slaves; and what a pity it was mankind were so mistaken in the ordering hand of Providence, who could give a plentiful supply if they submitted to do justice. The meeting ended in my satisfaction; and after some time, he set the slaves all at liberty."

Among the advocates of freedom raised up among Friends on the Eastern Shore, one of the most conspicuous was Warner Mifflin, who was born in 1745 in the part of the peninsula belonging to Virginia, but who afterwards lived in Kent County, Maryland. His father held 100 slaves, all of whom he subsequently liberated, and besides became a zealous advocate for their rights, often appearing alone in courts of law, amid surrounding opponents, to plead the cause of individuals of the African race, who had a claim to freedom. In an account which Warner Mifflin left of his experiences, he says that when about fourteen years of age—"Being in the field with my father's slaves, a young man among them questioned me, 'Whether I thought it could be right, that they should be toiling to raise me, and I sent to school, and bye-and-bye their children must do so for mine also.'

This reasoning made us an impression that was never erased, and he determined never to be a slaveholder. But on settling in married life, he became possessed of some minor slaves by his wife, and from time to time some of his father's negroes came of their own accord to live on his plantation, until he almost became persuaded that he could not do without them. But a thunder-storm was the means of arousing him to greater vigilance, for it settled on his understanding, that he would be excluded from happiness if he continued in the breach of the Divine law written upon his heart. After this he manumitted those slaves that he had received with his wife, and told his father that he must either take his blacks away, or authorize him to set them free. His father readily told him, he might do as he would; on which, he executed a deed of emancipation for them all.

Warner Mifflin continued through the remainder of his life a zealous advocate for the rights of the negroes, joining with his friends in appeals on their behalf to the Congress of the United States and to the legislatures of his own and neighboring States.

The labors of Friends to effect the emancipation of slaves appear to have been more successful on the Eastern Shore than to the West of the Bay—for very many of the members residing there suffered themselves to be disowned rather than part with their slaves.

In a recent visit to Maryland, we found that the large plantations which existed in slavery times are gradually being divided up into farms of more moderate size. The strong pro-slavery feeling which prevailed at the time of the Civil War has much abated.

A CONVERTED ATHEIST'S TESTIMONY.—Mberg, professor of philosophy in the University of Copenhagen, has until recently been the apostle of atheism in his country. He has, says the Semur Yaudois, just published a second edition of one of his works, and this is what he says in the introduction:

"The experience of life, its sufferings and griefs, have shaken my soul, and have broken the foundation upon which I formerly thought I could build. Full of faith in the sufficiency of science, I thought to have in it a sure refuge from all the contingencies of life. This illusion is vanished; when the tempest came which plunged me in sorrow, the moorings, the cable of science, broke like thread. Then I seized upon that help which many before me have laid hold of. I sought and found peace in God. Since then I have certainly not abandoned science, but I have assigned to it another place in my life."

Happy are they who learn to build upon a sure foundation before the final storm descends, when the hail shall sweep away the refugees of lies, and the waters shall overflow, the hiding places of infidelity and unbelief.—The Armory.

Likeness comes from liking. We grow to be like that which we like, and which we reach to after with longing. If we like the pure, we grow in purity. If we like the impure, we grow in impurity. Therefore it is that in the end we have what we want, and are as we would like to be. "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled."

The student of history in the prosecution of his researches is not unfrequently perplexed by discovering the existence at the same time of two individuals bearing the same name, and both more or less celebrated in connection with the same line of life. A case in point is that of William Ames, a well-known Puritan divine and casuist, who came of an ancient family in Norfolk, and was born in 1576. He was known as a strong upholder of Calvinistic views, in opposition to the modified Arminian theology which took its name from James Arminius, its author, and which during the latter part of the sixteenth and beginning of the seventeenth centuries gained ground both in England and abroad.

William Ames, the earlier, was an excellent scholar, and filled for ten years the chair of theology in the University of Franeker, in Holland, succeeding there, by a distance of some years, the eminent John Drusus, one of the most enlightened and advanced scholars of his day. The reputation of Ames as a theologian, and his ability as a teacher, attracted students from all parts of Europe. He afterwards presided for a short time over an English college, and filled the post of English pastor at Rotterdam, in which city he died in 1633.

The other William Ames, whose career we propose to follow in this slight sketch, early joined in his lot with the followers of George Fox, and thus he claims some mention among the chronicles of the Society.

The date of his birth is uncertain, but the place seems to have been Frampton-Cotterell in Gloucestershire, distant about seven miles from Bristol, and very near the borders of Somersetshire. He was at one time a Baptist minister, and afterwards an officer in the Parliamentary army, where it is said he maintained such strict discipline that he "bound neck and heels and cast into prison" any private soldier under his colors, who was guilty of vice or immorality. It is, however, only fair to add to this that he was acknowledged on all hands, to lead the most strict life himself.

Being in Ireland in the year 1655, he came under the influence of Francis Howgill and Edward Burrough, who were at that time preaching at Cork; and shortly afterwards he united himself to the body to which they belonged. His earliest work as a member of it seems to have been undertaken in Holland. Sewel, the Quaker historian, tells us that it was by the preaching of William Ames, that his father and mother, Jacob Williamson Sewel, free citizen and surgeon at Amsterdam, and Judith Zinspinner, his wife, both of whom were members of the Flemish Baptist Church there, became "the first orthodox Quakers in Amsterdam." William Ames, owing possibly to having been formerly in military life and accustomed to command, is described as being an "extraordinary bold man," as various instances in his after career will testify.

His companion at Amsterdam was a man named Humble Thatcher, and the controversy against Friends running high at the time, many books and pamphlets on both sides appeared. When matters had thus gone on for some time, the magistrates sent for the two leaders, and commanded them to leave the town within twenty-four hours. This command being disregarded, they were at once arrested and kept in custody for several days, after which they were led out at night through the "Regulars" Gate, and so banished out of the town; but feeling entirely innocent of any evil intentions, and "moved by his spirit of boldness," W. Ames returned the following day into the city, and openly crossed the large market place of the city in broad daylight. The magistrates were at the time assembled in the Rathouse of the city, and one of them looking out of the window, and seeing him, said, "Lo, there is the Quaker. If we had a mind now to make martyrs, here would be our opportunity." All things considered, however, and seeing there was no proof of evil action against the Friends, it was considered best to wink at this return.

In the year 1659, William Ames went into Germany, and visited the Court of the Prince Elector, Charles Ludovic, at Heidelberg. Here he created quite a favorable impression. The prince entertained him at his own table, and was pleased to pardon what might have seemed to him a great incivility—viz, the Friend wearing his hat in his presence; having apparently been prepared to see in it a point of conscience.

The Elector on one occasion invited William Ames to dine with him, to meet his chaplain. During dinner, the court jester played as usual many extravagant and debasing tricks, all of which were unreprieved by the chaplain, whose duty it was to preserve the dignity and sobriety of the court. William Ames was astonished, and, undaunted, took occasion to reprove the chaplain, telling him that he was "a dumb dog" to suffer the wanton behavior of the jester in silence. The prince, instead of being offended, was rather pleased than otherwise with Ames' bold conduct.

He continued to travel about and preach in many parts of the Palatinate, making many converts, especially among the Anabaptists at Kriesheim, a town not far from Worms, where quite a band of followers were established, who, on the settlement of the colony of Pennsylvania, unanimously emigrated thither, and thus escaped the desolation of their homes on the breaking out of the Thirty Years' War shortly after.

The spread of Friends' doctrines at length alarmed the Church party, and a fine was imposed upon all those who offered entertainment to William Ames. This order, as soon as it came to the Prince Elector's knowledge, was immediately cancelled, both he and his sister the princess, having been so satisfied of William Ames' honesty, that they invited him to come again, which he did on the following year.

He also sent a letter, with "a book written by George Fox" to the Elector, by one John Higgins, who was the bearer of a message in return to William Ames, that "the prince took his visits to him and his family very kindly, and believed that he spoke out of love for their souls."

Ames afterwards travelled in Bohemia and Poland, and, returning to Holland some years later, was, on one occasion, locked up in an asylum in Rotterdam, for holding meetings in his house.

In 1662 he was back again in England, and here suffered severe imprisonment in Bridewell in company with Samuel Fisher. This so undermined his health that he did not long survive, and died very shortly after his return to Amsterdam, which place had been his home for many years.

Sewel has thus summed up his character:—"He was indeed a zealous man, and, though some were ready to think he was too zealous, yet he was discreet; and I know that he was condescending in indifferent matters, thinking that there were customs, which, though not followed in one country, were yet tolerable in another. He was also generous; and, lest he might seem burdensome to any, he rather chose to work with his own hands." This he did, during his last imprisonment in London, at wool-combing.

Ames wrote "A Declaration of the Witness of God, manifested in me from my youth," London, 1656, which was reprinted in 1681, with the addition of "A Sound out of Zion from the Holy Mountain," and translated into Dutch, Swedish, and French; "Good Counsel and Advice to all the Friends of Truth," a Dutch translation of which was issued at Rotterdam; and "The Mysteries of the Kingdom of God." A work entitled Lucerna Super Candelabrum, or "The Light upon the Candlestick," published at Amsterdam, and afterwards translated in English, was, for a long time, supposed to have proceeded from the pen of William Ames; but Sawel, in his preface to the 1st edition of "History of Friends," 1722, says that, although the authorship was still somewhat doubtful, it was not the work of William Ames, although he "approved of the contents of the book." Besides these works above-mentioned, Ames wrote more than twenty treatises and epistles in Dutch, which, it is believed, have never been translated into English. C. F. S.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The writings of the late Hannah Williams, of Plymouth, Montgomery Co., Pa., are remarkable for their terseness and vigor of expression. The following is characteristic, and seems as applicable now as when written years since. May we all effectively remember it.—W. P. T.

"There are some very poor families in our neighborhood,—not enough of victuals, or clothes, or wood;—it is a great tax upon our feelings; we have endeavored to do what we could, but it is insufficient. I am not asking help of you, but I do ask, nearer home; some are very generous, and some accuse the heads of the families with intemperance, &c.; and so excusing themselves from helping the children. I don't understand that kind of talk and acting—if the best of us had just what we deserve—it would be very little. We make mistakes by over-rating ourselves above our deserts, and so sit down, self-satisfied, by our warm fires and plentiful tables. I believe the cries of the afflicted and poor in our land have reached the ears of the Most High, and I should really tremble to be found using the part, which belongs to the poor."

Each of God's works is a thought of his, for us to think about Him: water, for instance.—When we cleanse and refresh ourselves every morning in this element, we should think of our Father as meaning the cleaning and refreshment, and as giving us an ever-fresh evidence of his fatherly love in this "gift of God," as the Orientals truly and constantly call it.

When the Master brought it to the tired and dusty feet of his disciples, on the night of the last supper, he was doing the work the Father gave Him to do—the work the Father has been doing for thankless children from the foundation of the world. The freshening touch of this servant of God is a message to hearts that need it, but too often are indifferent to it. Francis of Assisi, in his "Song of Creatures," sings:

"By one most precious, humble, chaste,
By Sister Water, O my Lord, thou'rt praised."

Dredging Oysters.

In raising oysters, as in every other business, while industry and intelligence are the foundations of success, yet there occur from time to time unexpected difficulties, which baffle the hopes of the planter. Captain Sheppard spoke particularly of one season, when some epidemic disease appeared to have attacked and destroyed his shell-fish, so that the dredges came up loaded with empty shells and scarcely any living oysters among them. In such a case he knew of nothing to be done, but to re-seed the bed, and wait for a few years in hopes of a better harvest.

Oysters are easily smothered, and will not grow when they are buried in sand or mud. And having no power of motion from place to place they are entirely dependent on their surroundings. In this they differ from clams and many other shell-fish, which can move from place to place, sink themselves in the sand and again emerge. In the fall of 1876, there came a severe storm, which drove so much of the water out of the bay, and so agitated what was left, as to disturb the underlying ground and cover the oysters with sediment. The result was a general destruction of the shell-fish in Maurice River Cove.

A partial offset to this loss was the simultaneous destruction of a small carnivorous shell-fish inhabiting a spiral shell, somewhat like that of a snail, which was accused of destroying oysters by boring small holes through the shells, so as to feed upon the flesh inside. These were formerly abundant in the bay, but have been much fewer since the storm. The planters in Long Island Sound and adjacent waters have suffered much loss from the depredations of a species of star-fish which swarms in those regions and devour multitudes of oysters. The star-fish clasps the oyster in its five arms, and then inverting its stomach, as one may the finger of a glove, introduces it between the shells of the oyster, and soon digests its tender flesh. But this destructive animal is very rarely seen in the parts we were visiting.

By eleven o'clock in the forenoon we had 25,000 or 30,000 oysters on-board, which the Captain thought sufficient for the wants of the shipper for whom he was collecting them; and the prow of our vessel was turned towards Maurice River. The weather had greatly favored us. We had enjoyed the clear shining of the moon on the waters and the glories of the setting and the rising sun. A gentle breeze enabled us to sail with sufficient speed, and yet there was not enough to make the surface of the bay rough, and to produce sea-sickness. Soon after we turned towards our port it became almost calm, and Captain Sheppard became a little uneasy lest he might not reach the cars in time to take the next train to his home. For this was Saturday afternoon, and these Maurice River oystermen calculate on spending First-day at least with their families, and do not willingly go out on Seventh days. But after a little time in the distance, as a sign that a breeze was approaching, and soon we felt its gentle impulse, saw our sails distended by its power, and began to make more rapid progress.

On reaching Bivalve, we made fast to the float which was to receive our cargo. These floats are made of long spars connected by cross-pieces on the under side, which are fastened on a little apart so that the water can freely enter, but yet close enough together to prevent the oysters from falling through. At each end a water-tight box is attached, which prevents the float from sinking too low when loaded with oysters. The oysters are shelled from the vessels on to these floats, and left exposed to the action of the brackish water of the river for twenty-four or thirty-six hours. The effect of this is to lessen the saltiness of the animal and to make it more plump and attractive in its appearance.

The yawl was soon lowered into the water, and the Captain and ourselves landed in time for all of us to reach the cars which were to convey us homewards.

The oyster belongs to that division of the animal world called Mollusca, a word which means "soft-bodied" animals—a term which all who are familiar with the oyster must acknowledge to be appropriate. To protect these tender bodies, which otherwise would be the prey of myriads of fish and other marine animals, they have the power of secreting a hard limestone shell inside of which the animal resides.

In one large division of the Mollusca, the shell is all in one piece, mostly coiled into a spiral form, as is in the common snail. These are called Univalves, or one-shelled animals. In the oyster, clam, and many other species, there are two valves or plates joined along one edge by a hinge, which permits the animal to open and close the shell as its wants may require. These are the Bivalves, or two-valved shells.

The Mollusca are very numerous. It is estimated that there are now to be found 20,000 species; and in addition the fossil shells of 17,000 others, which have lived in former geologic ages, but have died out and given place to other species.

It seems proper here to say something about the anatomical structure and natural history of the oyster. The information which follows has been chiefly drawn from a small book on the subject prepared by Professor Wm. K. Brooks, of Johns Hopkins University, who has devoted much time and labor to its study. He says, "I have dredged oysters in every part of [Chesapeake] Bay, from Swan Point and the Budkin to Craney Island and Lynn Haven. I have tonged oysters in five different States; and in the warm waters of the South, where frost is unknown, and the oysters flourish above low-tide mark. I have spent months wading over the sharp shells, studying the oysters at home. I have planted oysters. I have reared them by collecting the floating spat; and I have hatched from artificially fertilized eggs more oysters than the number of people in the last census."

The two stony shells which contain the body of the oyster are made of limestone, and are joined at one end by a hinge. Wedged in between the shells at the hinge is an elastic pad of cartilage, which keeps the shells slightly apart except when purposely closed by the contraction of the string muscle, the most solid part of the animal which reaches from one shell to the other, near the front. As soon as the oyster relaxes this muscle, the elasticity of the hinge cartilage forces the shells open. In opening oysters, a knife blade is introduced which severs this muscle and enables the operator to remove the shells.

Immediately inside of the shell we come to the skin of the oyster, or as it is called, the mantle. One office of this is to secrete the limestone which forms the shell, and this process seems to go on continuously, so that the shell becomes very thick and solid in course of time. By inserting very thin circles of glass and then returning the animal to the water, it was found that in twenty-four hours the glass was covered with a thin gummy deposit. The lime in this gradually aggregated in little flat crystals, which united in bundles or groups until the film became hard and stony. The shell increases in size as well as thickness—for the mantle can extend a little beyond the old shell and thus the new layer is larger than the old ones. The lines of these deposits can often be traced on shells.

If a portion of the mantle or outside skin of the body of the oyster is carefully cut away, or turned up, the observer will see below it a thin membrane marked with fine parallel lines running towards the outer edge, which may remind him of the teeth of a fine-toothed comb. This membrane is a gill or breathing apparatus so constructed that in it the blood of the oyster is acted on by the oxygen of the air contained in the water, and thus purified, as is done in the gills of a fish.

In order to keep a current of water flowing along the gills, their surface is furnished with multitudes of very fine hairs called Cilia, so fine indeed, that they require a highly magnifying microscope to make them visible. These cilia are found in many of the lower orders of animals, and they appear during life to be constantly in motion, all working symmetrically in the same direction, so that they produce a steady flow of water along the sides of the gills and into their pores. This flow of the water not only enables the oyster to breathe and purify its blood, but supplies it with food. The oyster subsists on the very minute animalcules and plants which exist abundantly in the water of the bay, where it naturally grows, especially in the ooze which settles to the bottom. The surface of the gills is sticky, and these microscopic organisms adhere to it, and are swept into the pores by the currents set up by the cilia, and are thus carried to the mouth of the animal which is situated near the hinge. So that whenever the oyster is in a state of rest, the processes of breathing and eating are going on continuously.

The stomach and liver are situated along the intestinal canal which descends from the mouth; and the heart, whose pulsations force the blood throughout the system, lies just behind the strong muscle that binds the two shells together.

(To be concluded.)

Extracts from a letter received by John S. Stokes, from John F. Stanton, of Tennessee.—“Thy letter of the 2d of Eleventh Month, with remittance, was duly received. The goods came to hand last evening in good condition, and I hasten to express my thanks to thee and those who have contributed to this nice donation;—which will bring comfort to many needy ones during the months that are to come. The books and tracts are a rare treat, just the things we need among these people, who, I am glad to say, show a growing interest in best things; and my heart is full of gratitude to my Heavenly Father, who has put it into the hearts of my friends thus to supply a need so often felt.”

APPETITE, a relish bestowed upon the poorer classes, that they may like what they eat, while it is seldom enjoyed by the rich, because they may eat what they like.

THE SECRET IN FOUR LETTERS.

BY MARY BRADLEY.

“Go,” said a gentle mother
To her little girls one day,
“And ask poor lonesome Dorothy
To join you in your play.
You know she has no sister,
And her mother died last year;
’T would be a pleasant task for you
Her loneliness to cheer.”

“We’ll go,” the children answered
With willing hearts and kind,
And swift of foot they hurried off
The little maid to find.
But soon the mother spied them,
As back they trooped again,
To tell her, with a rueful look,
Their errand was in vain.

“She will not come,” said Alice
And Annabel and Grace;
“She will not say a word to us,
But cries, and hides her face.”
Then said the gentle mother,
“Perhaps she is afraid,
And shy of speech before you all,
Poor lonesome little maid.

“But now I know a secret
By which, beyond a doubt,
The child will gladly come to you,
When once you find it out;
Four letters spell the secret—
It is a word so small;
Who knows the word?—And Annabel
Said, “I know; it is ‘doll!’”

And straightway took her dolly,
The prettiest one she had,
To tempt poor weeping Dorothy—
But came back just as sad.
“It’s no use trying, mother;—
She will not even look!”
Then Grace said, “Maybe it’s a bird!”
And Alice guessed a book.

They took down the canopy
From his cage outside the door,
And brought a lovely picture-book—
But she only cried the more,
Till the children grew discouraged,
And turned to go away;
“She doesn’t want us here,” said Grace;
“It is no use to stay.”

But Alice felt such pity
Within her bosom rise,
That she turned again to Dorothy,
With tears in her own eyes,
She hugged her close, and kissed her,
And said, “I love you, dear—
I cannot bear to go away,
And leave you crying here!

“Come with me to my mother!”
Then the child upraised her head,
And presently her sobs were hushed,
Her grief was soorted.
While the others looked and wondered,
And could not understand,
Shy Dorothy, with trustful look,
To Alice gave her hand.

And thus the two together
Back to the mother went,
Who kissed them, smiling tenderly,
In her heart’s full content.
For she was glad that Alice
Had learned those letters four,
Which unlock hearts as easily
As a key unlocks a door.

“And see,” she told the others,
When they looked, and wondered still,
“How love is like a rope around
The neck of stubborn will.
It has a power so mighty
That the blessed Lord above
Himself will follow when you draw
With the strong rope of love!”

THE IDEAL LIFE.

BY JOHN BERRIDGE.

Jesus, cast a look on me!
Give me sweet simplicity,
Make me poor and lay me low,
Seeking only thee to know.
Weaned from my worldly self,
Weaned from the miser’s pelf,
Weaned from the scinner’s ways,
Weaned from the lust of praise.

All that feeds my busy pride,
Cast it ever more aside;
Bid my will to thine submit,
Lay me humbly at thy feet.
Make me like a little child,
Of my strength and wisdom spoiled,
Seeing only in thy light,
Walking only in thy might.

Leaning only on thy breast,
Where a weary soul may rest;
Feeling well the peace of God
Flowing from thy gracious blood!

In this posture let me live
And hosannas daily give;
In this temper let me die,
And hosannas ever cry.

FOR “THE FRIEND.”

The Law of Righteousness.—The Triumph of War.

The reputation of William Penn and his contemporaries in the government of Pennsylvania, is no glittering bubble, destined to pass into oblivion; but as mankind become more and more enlightened with the rays of heavenly Truth, the more will they be led to appreciate the motives which produced this Christian conduct. Men have too generally gazed with admiration on military fame, and the triumphs and glories of war have obtained almost unqualified praise. If, however, we believe in the declarations of holy writ, we may confidently look forward to the period, when the victories of the battle-field will be remembered in connection only with the follies and wickedness of mankind, and when the character of William Penn as a legislator, whose acts were based on the laws of immutable righteousness, will be increasingly admired, and society will award to his name the enduring renown of having been a pioneer to that happier and better day.

From 1756, Pennsylvania ceased to be governed in accordance with the principles of the Society of Friends. It was now no longer the Arcadia of peace. The whole social system of this once favored community seemed affected by the change. With the presence of armies, its high tone of morality rapidly declined. Theatres were built, and lotteries were encouraged; duelling was not unfrequent, and brutalizing sports were patronized; whilst gaming, and cursing and swearing, became lamentably prevalent. “During the seventy years,” writes Clarkson, “whilst William Penn’s principles prevailed, or the Quakers had the principal share in the government, there was no spot on the globe where, number for number, there was so much virtue, or so much true happiness as among the inhabitants of Pennsylvania.” As an example of Christian principles applied in the government of a country, it unquestionably stands without a parallel in the history of mankind. Not that her citizens were entirely free from the passions of human nature—for they were men, not angels;—but it is certain that no country on earth ever exhibited such a scene of happiness, innocence, and peace, as was witnessed here during the first century of her social existence.—Bowden’s History of Friends.

"Why I left off Selling Rum."

A man of more than four-score years, of gentlemanly bearing, a resident of this town, who often comes into my place of business for a friendly chat, told me his reason for discontinuing the keeping for sale intoxicating drinks.

He at that time kept a country store, and prominent among his stock of goods was an assortment of liquors. It was before the temperance agitation became so prevalent, and when nearly all general stores sold rum, gin, brandy, &c.

He was about to go to Newport, where he mostly bought supplies, and as usual headed his memorandum with a full list of the different kinds of intoxicating liquors. He said:

"After I had completed my memorandum something said to me, 'Don't buy any more rum.' I was quite surprised at this, as I had not thought of giving up the business.

"On my way to the city, it was repeated, 'Don't buy any more rum.' This produced very serious thoughts, causing me to shed tears, and as I proceeded, again and again was it said to me, 'Don't buy any more rum.' I could not see how I should be able to keep a store without it, and felt undecided what course to pursue. As I was about to enter the wholesale store the command seemed so strong and positive I could not feel like purchasing the intoxicants; and when I handed my memorandum to the jobber, I told him he need not put up the rum, &c.

"The dealer seemed surprised, and remonstrated with me, saying, 'You cannot keep a store without liquors,' &c. I said, 'Well, I will see; but you need not put it up now.' The merchant told me if I did not buy the rum then I would be writing back for it, and I might as well have it shipped with the other goods. However, I did not buy the rum, and have never bought any since for sale."

This man is not a professor of religion, but he said:

"As I returned from the city I was much affected by the change in my feelings respecting this matter, and shed many tears;" adding, "Now you know why I left off selling rum."

I could but drop a tear of joy that the dear old man was enabled to be faithful in this respect, to the Inward Teacher, in his younger years.

"He who rules himself is more a prince,

Than he who nations keeps in awe,

And they who tend to that their souls convince.

Shall never need another law."

If all those now engaged in dealing in intoxicating liquors as a beverage would be as faithful to the precepts of instruction "which are the way of life," what a wonderful and lovely change would it cause in human society, and the consequent ceasing of crime in the world, would bring joy to thousands of hearts.

JOHN W. FOSTER.

WESTERLY, R. I.

A publisher of erroneous and dangerous books assured Semmler, that he only gave them to the world in order to excite inquiry. "That," replied Semmler, "is to set a town on fire in order to make trial of the engine."

The children of a household grow most easily and naturally in the religious life, not when the parents are always talking about it, and pressing it upon them, but when the atmosphere of the house is so full of religion that they do not think of living any other life.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Artificial Rain.—Prof. Newcomb, in the North American Review, shows that a recent theory that rain can be produced by sound, is untenable. Clouds consist of impalpable particles of water floating in the air; they are not vapor. In order to rain, these particles must be aggregated into drops large enough to fall. The aqueous vapor in the air cannot be condensed into clouds except by cooling. If the explosion of a bomb generates five or six cubic yards of gas, the motion of the air diminishes as the square of the distance increases, and a simple calculation shows that at a quarter of a mile the motion would not be one ten-thousandth of an inch.

Cheap Reservoirs.—By running a tunnel into a hill, and blocking up the entrance, a reservoir may be obtained in which there is no waste of the water by evaporation.

Destruction of Mosquitoes.—A writer in Nature, states that in Arctic Norway the plague of mosquitoes, which is so intolerable there, prevails in the latitudes beyond the northern range of the swallow. He also says, that the gnats become more abundant after the swallows and martins have taken their flight.

Water Insects.—The tenacity of the surface-film of water enables many species of water-insects to run on its surface, as others do on the solid land. The little black Podura, which abounds on sheets of still water, has a small hairy body that is incapable of being wetted, and it frisks about on the surface of a pond, as a fly might on quicksilver. Its food consists of decaying vegetable substances, which it finds far below the surface. When Padurus are placed in a beaker half full of water, they are entirely unable to go below its surface; but if a few plants of duckwort are introduced into the beaker, they can, by the aid of this, pull themselves through the surface-film and climb down the rootlets; once fairly below, they can swim downward by their own muscular force.

Temperature of Deep Wells.—A well at Wheeling, W. Va., has been drilled to the depth of 4,500 feet. Thermometers were lowered in it to different depths. The temperature at the bottom (which is 3700 feet below the sea level), is 110°.

The India Rubber Tree.—This tree cannot stand shade, and unless the seedlings are fully exposed to light and well drained, they cannot grow. Owing to this, it is found that in the depths of the forest, where light and air are shut out by the dense crowd of trees, natural production takes place by the germination of seeds carried by birds high up in the crowns of other trees, aerial roots descending in process of time to the ground, and developing into a huge hollow cylinder round the foster stem, which is soon killed. The descent of the roots may take years, but once they have taken hold of the ground, the further growth is exceedingly rapid. In cultivating, the seeds are found to grow much larger than cuttings, and these are tended in large nurseries until they are ten feet high, when they are transplanted into clearings made in the forest, in strips of forty feet wide, alternating with sixty feet of natural forest; this being found necessary to furnish the necessary moisture; while narrower clearings do not give air and light enough. The growth is very rapid, being six feet in height and nine inches in girth per annum.—Demerara Argosy.

Snow Walkers in England.—To the light the snow reveals the doings of the night. Does a mouse so much as cross, she leaves her delicate traces on the white coverlet. Away from the homestead, rabbits have crossed and recrossed the fields in a perfect maze. That ill-defined "pad" tracks a hare to the turnips. Pheasants and wood pigeons have scratched for mast beneath the beeches, and we find red blood drops along the fence. These are tracked to a colony of weasels in the old wall. Last night a piteous squeal might have been heard from the half-buried fence, and the little tragedy would be played out upon the snow. Five white swans cleave the thin air far up, and fly off with outstretched necks. The tiny brown wren bids defiance to the weather, darting in and out of every hole and crevice, usually re-appearing with the cocoon of some insect in its bill.—These delicate footprints reproduce the long toes of the lark; and those are the tracks of the meadow pipit. The hedge-berries are almost gone, and here the red-wing and fieldfare have run along the fence bottom in search of fallen fruit. Those larger tracks by the sheep troughs show that the hungry rooks have been scratching near, and the chatter of magpies comes from the fir-tree tops. Scattered pine cones betoken a flock of incessantly chattering cross-bills, and the scarlet appendages of the rare Bohemian wax-wing.

Along the meadow brook a stately heron has left its imprints; the water-hen's track is marked through the reeds, and there, upon the icy margin are the blurred webs of wild ducks. A bright red-squirrel runs along the white wall. In its warm fur it shows sharply against the fence. Naturalists say that the squirrel hibernates through the winter—but this is hardly so. A bright day, even though cold and frosty, brings him out to visit some summer store. The prints of the squirrel are sharply cut, the tail at times just brushing the snow. The Mountain Jinnetts have come down to the lowlands, and we flush a flock from an ill-farmed field where wheels run rampant. When alarmed, the birds wheel aloft, uttering the white soft twitterings—they betake themselves to the trees. The seeds of brooklime, flax, and knawped the twice seems partial to, and this wild-weed field is to them a very paradise. Just now, walking in the woods, the cry of the bullfinch is heard as perhaps the most melancholy of all our birds, but its bright scarlet breast compensates for its want of cheeriness. A flock of diminutive gold-crests rush past us, and in the fir-wood we hear but cannot see a flock of siskins.

Higher up in the valley, towards the hills, tracks of another kind begin to appear. On the fells we come across a dead herdwick, trampled about with innumerable feet. We examine these closely, and find that they are only of two species—the raven and the buzzard. Further in the scrub, we track a pine-martin to its lair in the rocks. The dogs drive it from its stronghold, and, being arboreal in its habits, it immediately makes up the nearest pine trunk. Its rich brown fur and orange throat make it one of the most lithely beautiful British animals. A pair of stoats or ermines, with their flecked coats, just in the transition stage, have their haunts in the same wood. From the snow we see that last night they have threaded the aisles of the pines in search of food. This clear-cut, sharp track by the fence is that of a fox.—Poachers and Poaching.

The Bob-o-Link.—The merry bobolink is one of the prettiest song-birds in the country. In eastern Pennsylvania, along the Delaware, the bobolink is known as the "reed-bird," and is eagerly hunted by sportsmen. You must likewise know that the bobolink has a third name—"rice-bird." That is what it is called in the Southern States. It is so named because it attacks the rice fields and devours the grain. We of the North know little of the trouble it causes by this especial appetite. The magnitude of the depredations of the little bobolink can hardly be appreciated outside of the narrow belt of rice fields along the coasts of a few of the Southern States. In innumerable hosts the birds visit the fields at the time of planting in spring, eating the seed-grain before the fields are "flooded," and then fly back North into Pennsylvania, New York and New England, where they spend the summer. About the middle of August they commence to migrate South again, and swoop down upon the rice fields once more, just at the time of harvesting the crop. To prevent total destruction of the crop during these invasions, thousands of men and boys, called "bird hunters," are employed by the rice-planters; hundreds of thousands of pounds of gunpowder are burned, and millions of birds killed. Still the number of bobolinks invading the rice fields each year seems in no way diminished, and the aggregate annual loss they cause is estimated by Dr. C. Hart Merriam, Ornithologist of the United States Department of Agriculture, at $2,000,000.

Clay Eaters.—The Montgomery Advertiser says, that among the hills of Marion County, in the northwestern portion of Alabama, there are many white families who have adopted the practice of eating a soft white clay which is found here. The people are poor, and live in a very primitive condition, depending on cultivating small patches of land and on the proceeds of their hunting excursions.

Price of Rare Metals.—Iridium, used for the points of gold pens, is worth about $720 per lb.; Platinum about the same as gold, $350 per lb.

Worship of Art.

I would here enter my earnest protest against the worship of Art which now reigns in the ecclesiastical world. The passion for color and form, in every detail of the Church and its services, has become a national calamity by its excess. The dress of the minister, not the Truth he proclaims; the rendering of the service, not its solemn words; the medievalism of the sacred building in every particular, not the holy use for which it is designed, are most on the tongues of men.

St. Bernard was right in saying, that "the immense height of the churches, their immoderate length, superfluous breadth, costly polishing and strange devices, while they attract the eyes of the worshipper, hinder the devotion of the soul, and somehow remind me of the old Jewish ritual." Life, by Morrison, p. 147.

"The more I have examined the subject," says John Ruskin, "the more dangerous have I found it to dogmatize respecting the character of the Art which is likely, at a given period, to be most useful to the cause of religion. One great fact first meets me. I never met with a Christian whose heart was thoroughly set upon the world to come, and so far as human judgment could pronounce, was perfect and right before God, who cared about Art at all." Stones of Venice, Vol. II, p. 103.

"May the Devil fly away with the Fine Arts," exclaimed, confidentially, once, in my hearing, one of the most distinguished public men; a sentiment that often recurs to me. A public man, intent on any real business, does, I suppose, find the Fine Arts rather imaginary, feels them to be a pretentious nothingness; a confused superfluity and nuisance, purchased with cost; what he, in brief language, denominates a bore." Carlyle, Letter day Pamphlets, Jesuitism, p. 54.

"Early Christians, English Puritans, Cistercian medieval monks, and modern Reformers of an earnest type, agree on one point, however much they may differ on others, namely, that people who are filled with practical sincerity, are apt to pass by Art with indifference, or reject it with anger." Morrison's St. Bernard, p. 149.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER OF JOHN G. WHITTIER.—"In a literary point of view, I do not place a very high value upon what I have written; but I have striven to be true to duty, freedom and humanity; to make, if possible, the burden of life lighter; to reveal the beauty with which our Heavenly Father has clothed the natural world, and the still greater beauty of human spirits in harmony with Him. And, as life draws towards the inevitable close, I find my heart full of thankfulness for the love and kindness and sympathy which my writings have called forth, and which surrounds me like the atmosphere. And I am especially glad when the younger portion of the Society which I love, are interested in my words, and find something of cheer and encouragement in them.

Educational Effect of Prohibition.—We have always argued for the legal prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, because we have believed it was a good thing, and we had the impression that it was a discreditable business. It is well to fasten in the mind, especially of youth, the feeling that it is a business outside the pale of the law—something like keeping a gambling house or a "policy shop." We have now the testimony of an intelligent witness, who writes from the State of Maine to the St. Louis Globe Democrat that this is precisely the result which it produces. He says: "The boy observes that a man to sell or consume liquor must act like a sneak-thief. Hardly a week passes that does not leave the memory of a liquor chase or trial in which the offenders are pursued in much the same way as one would suppose a thief to be pursued. And the boy knows all this. If he should want a drink he would pause and consider for quite a while before he would take it. It would not be like pushing through a swinging door, behind which were lights and music. Of course, it is not expected that prohibition will absolutely prohibit in this generation, but the effect is prohibitory on generations to come." Prohibition is, therefore, educational, and the training results in a public opinion which holds with increasing firmness and tenacity that liquor-selling is a disreputable business.—Selected.

Sacerdotalism.—Now, in view of this intellectual and moral drift it is certain that sacerdotalism, to say the least, can have little or no value in the conflict with rationalistic unbelief. The day of forms and mere sacraments as an apologetic force, is gone by. Even in the mildest form of sacerdotalism, and quite apart from the Jesuitical system, it would seem that for good men to haggle over questions of candles, and vestments, and genuflections, and east or west facings at the altar, and even the mild bigotry of insisting upon an apostolic succession, and when the world is dying for the bread of life, is too small business long to command the respect of earnest men.

Evil Effects of Smoking.—"Our doctor would rather 'pass' a whiskey drinker than a cigarette smoker," said the manager of a big life-insurance company, "because he believes that there are more chances of a man living with a hardened liver than with a softened brain."—Philadelphia Times.

Catholic Clergyman on Temperance.—"The liquor traffic is undermining the best interests of the country and is a source of demoralization to the laws of both God and man. Drunkenness and corrupting influence of the saloons are ruining our young men; yes, and in many cases, through the brutality and neglect of drinking parents, leading our young women to lives of shame. The saloon keeper, through his lewdness and henchmen, is corrupting politics and throttling legislation with an iron hand. The day of the Lord is desecrated, and untold sins are committed because there is no healthy public opinion to coerce the saloon keepers into closing their places on Sunday. The Catholic Church is the natural foe of hoodlumism and the dishonoring of the Lord's day. The priests will not shrink the duty resting upon them of raising their voices in defence of morality and civic decency." "Contemplate," he added, "the spectacle of a mayor of a city of over 200,000 inhabitants welcoming a Convention of liquor dealers within its gates. That very thing happened in Jersey City only a few days ago, and his Honor even went so far as to intimate that he felt honored at the privilege of addressing the rum sellers. A mayor of a Christian city has no right thus publicly and in an official capacity to offer an affront to the better sense of the community. It is repulsive to every honest mind."

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 21, 1891.

We have received a book tastefully gotten up, and entitled "An Old Meeting-house." It contains a description of the old Friends' Meeting-house at Newtown, Delaware County, Pa.; and contains, in addition to the letter text, lithographs of the front and of the gable end of the building, and two views of the interior, one of which represents the elderly Friends who are facing the meeting. There is a representation of the wagon sheds, the horse block, and the grave-yard.

The whole constitutes an interesting production. It is for sale at the book stores, including that at 304 Arch St., Philadelphia. Price $1.25.

A Friend has suggested the republication in our columns of an address to their members, adopted by the three Monthly Meetings of Friends in Philadelphia, in the Third Month of 1805. He says: "This address refers to the financial difficulties in which some members were involved at the time it was originally written, and it seems to me the remarks made by the committee (which prepared it) are very valuable and lively."

From this address the following paragraphs are extracted:

"Our minds have been sorrowfully affected under the consideration of the many failures and bankruptcies which of latter times have taken place among us, to the wounding of the testimony of truth, the reproach of our Christian profession, and the ruin and distress of individuals and families. As we seriously wish that more instances of this kind may be avoided, we think it right to warn and caution all against improperly grasping after the things of this world, and engaging in hazardous undertakings out of the counsel and wisdom of Truth, whereby they may be rendered incapable of being punctual to their promises and just in the payment of their debts.

One cause of these sorrowful effects has particularly engaged our attention, to wit, the practice of giving and taking promissory notes, called accommodation paper, and endorsing them one for another, and thus improperly becoming sureties, and sometimes even to a greater amount than such parties are capable of paying. How much better would it be, to be contented with such trade and business as are within the reach of our capitals?

We are also engaged to caution every individual against imprudently entering into joint securities with others; for by these practices many innocent wives and children have been unexpectedly involved in ruinous and deplorable circumstances.

Finally, dear friends, we recommend all to attend carefully to the principle of grace and truth in their own minds, which is sufficient to preserve and keep us from falling, and leads to do justly, love mercy and walk humbly."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Brazilian Minister at Washington has received a cablegram from the Brazilian Minister of Foreign Relations, denying the reports of the death of the Emperor, which the public has not scolded and where the issues are purely local.

A dispatch from Washington, dated the 10th inst., says: "The public was taken into the confidence of the diplomatic branch of the Government this afternoon in the continuation of the hearing begun yesterday before the United States Senate. The Count in the case of the Canadian sealer W. P. Sawyer, seized for illegal sealing in Behring Sea, and the first announcement made that the prolonged diplomatic correspondence between Secretary Blaine and Lord Salisbury had resulted in an agreement by which, with the consent of the Senate, the United States Court in the case of the sealer in Behring sea will be definitely settled.

The Acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs, on the 16th inst., received a telegram from the Acting Agent at Pine Ridge, Captain Penney, stating that Bear Eagle's party had arrived there from the Cheyenne River Agency. Captain Penney expressed the opinion that the Indians' conduct was dissatisfied with their treatment at their agency. The inspector now at the Cheyenne River Agency was instructed to investigate the complaints of the Indians.

The United States Grand Jury, at San Antonio, Texas, has returned four indictments against President Paul Conrad, Vice President John A. Morris and the other members of the Louisiana Lottery Company. They are charged with using the mails to distribute lottery advertisements in violation of law.

The case has been brought to the United States Supreme Court, the argument of the Governors of the two States, by the State of Iowa against the State of Illinois, in order to ascertain whether the boundary line between the States is in the middle of the Mississippi River or in the middle of the navigable channel. The suit grows out of a long-standing legal quarrel between Hancock County, Illinois, and Hamilton Bridge Company in regard to taxes. The Hamilton Bridge company not only claims that it is unjustly assessed, but is compelled to pay taxes to Hancock County, Illinois, on 721 feet of property located in Iowa.

Judge Conrad, of the District Court at Des Moines, the only purely platinum mine in existence, it is reported, has been discovered in Oregon. This mineral usually occurs in conjunction with other minerals.

More than 1,000 of the chrysanthemum plants shown at the Hampton County, Mass., flower show in Springfield last week were grown and exhibited by school children of that section.

At the Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of the Manhattan Elevated Railroad Company, held in New York City last week, it was reported that the number of passengers carried on the entire system during the year were 200,745,718, and since the opening of the road to Ninth Month 30th, last, 1,501,869,927 passengers were carried.

The number deaths reported in this city last week was 291, being 19 less than last week, and 24 more than the corresponding week last year. Of the foregoing, 184 were males and 207 females; 46 died of consumption; 28 of pneumonia; 37 of diseases of the heart; 28 of diphtheria; 17 of old age; 17 of crop; 15 of Bright's disease; 13 of cholera; 11 of apoplexy; 10 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 11 of marasmus; and 11 of paralysis.

FOREIGN.—The result of the election in North Devon, last week, resulted in a Liberal victory. Geo. Lambert (Gladstonian), receiving 4,222 votes; and Charles W. Buller (Liberal-Unionist), 3,010. The district has been represented by a Liberal-Unionist.

A great wreck, which was reported to have taken place on the 13th inst. The accounts agree in describing it as one of the most destructive storms on record. Even now the full extent, so far as the Continent goes, cannot be ascertained, the telegraph wires in places having been wrecked for many miles. Floods and wreckage, however, are general in Europe. The winds on the British coast alone on one day numbered 23 vessels, and the number of lives lost, so far as known, amounts to 87. France, Spain, Germany, Belgium, Holland have all suffered severely from the visitation.

A dispatch of the 13th inst., from Berlin, says: "Influenza is doing very bad business here. Since the disease appeared in this place it has spread very rapidly, and the number of those afflicted by the dread gripe is now quite large. The disease in nearly every case is attended with serious consequences, and in many instances has a fatal termination. Many deaths have already been reported to the authorities, and it is feared before the epidemic subsides the list of fatal cases will be very large. The physicians of the place are in constant demand.

Influenza has also made its appearance in the northern suburbs of Berlin, and already the cases amount to a considerable number.

Express.—Petersburg dispatch to the New York Mail and Express, says: "The governors of the provinces in which famine is crushing out the life of the people have been ordered to send in accurate reports of the number of the hunger-stricken people, as the returns are to be used very hastily compiled in the usual manner, and untruthful and exaggerated.

Several governors who have responded to this new command have concurred in the estimate that 66 per cent. of the entire population is in the most extreme and pitiful want. The Moscow Gazette states that the most incalculable number of the population are unable to meet the incalculable demand for such the cheap artificial intoxicating liquor which is the delight and the bane of the moujiks. This enhanced call for the deadly stuff has been noticeable since the first distribution of relief money. While all villages, say the governors, including adults and children, have been drunk at once, and this universal drunkenness has been followed by slipping mortality.

The epidemic of typhus fever in the famine-stricken districts of Russia, is spreading rapidly. The daily mortality already runs up in the hundreds.

Fearful stories are reported from Southern Russia of the ravages of the violent influenza now raging there. The people are so weakened by famine that they fall easy victims to the disease, and in some of the country districts where starvation is most general the wretched peasantry court infection and death. In the villages the dead lie in many houses unburied, and with no one to bury them until some official comes along to take the loss of seventy-seven lives, or throw them into a common trench. Even the priests are shunning pestilence, and many persons die without religious services.

The authorities of the Russian War Office have resolved to construct a line of forts along the Chinese frontier and to increase the number of officers in Central Asia.

A dispatch dated Calcutta, Eleventh Month 16th, says: "As further details regarding the cyclone which passed over this part of India on Monday last week are received it is seen that the damage done is very extensive, and that the loss of seventy-seven lives, occasioned by the sinking of the Indian Government steamer Enterprise, which foundered at the Andaman Islands, and the killing of fifty convicts, no doubt there has been large loss of life at other places along the coast."

An official statement, published at Ottawa on the 10th inst., shows the debt of Canada to have reached $285,000,000, a considerable increase over last year, notwithstanding the assurance of the Minister of Finance, Foster, that a large reduction might be looked for this year.

NOTICES.

WANTED.—A young Friend desires a position as care taker of an elderly Friend.

Address, Box 285, West Grove, Pa.

ERRATUM.—In No. 15 of "THE FRIEND," p. 113, near the bottom of middle column, for Fifth Month read Ninth Month.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY.—The Library will be open until further notice is given, on Fourth-day evenings from 8 to 10 o'clock. Young men especially are invited to avail themselves of this opportunity of using this collection of books and periodicals without charge.

DIED, at her residence in Haddonfield, N. J., on the evening of Eighth Month 21, 1891, MARTHA E. HILMAN, daughter of the late Abel and Sarah Hillman, in the seventy-third year of her age. A member of Haddonfield Particular and Monthly Meetings of Friends. This dear Friend was for many years deprived of her full physical powers, accompanied by much suffering, which she was favored to bear with an uncommon degree of cheerful patience and resignation to the Divine will. She was ever ready to enter into near and tender sympathy with others in their varied trials and afflictions. While her family and friends felt that she is, through Divine love and mercy safely gathered into one of those mansions prepared for the righteous of all generations; they mourn for that great loss expressing it to be a great cross to her world to rearwards.

—, on 10th of Tenth Month, 1891, REBECCA E. wife of DAVID WICKESHAAM, daughter of Robert and Rebecca Holloway, in the sixty-first year of her age. A member of Middleton Meeting, O. She was afflicted with paralysis five months before her death. Often in that time expressing it to be a great cross to give up attending meeting. Being entirely resigned to give up all earthly ties, she left a few lines of excellent advice to her children, directing them to put their trust in the Lord in the morning of their lives.

—, at Langhorne, Bucks Co., Pa., Tenth Month 31, 1891, JOSEPH EASTBURN, in the seventy-eighth year of his age. A beloved Overseer and Elder of Falls Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, on the 25th of Ninth Month, 1886, ELIZABETH COMFORT, wife of JOSEPH EASTBURN, in the seventy-first year of her age. A member of Falls Monthly Meeting of Friends.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Selections from the Journal of William Evans.

1845.—"A large company collected at Leeds Meeting, towards whom I had some service. When the time to close came, I requested Friends to remain together, while others withdrew; and after a pause, the way opened to address them on the preparation, call and qualification for the ministry of the Gospel, and the duties of elders; also on the danger of mistaking our calling; and hence the necessity of lowly watchfulness before the Lord, and the spirit of discernment in those, whose place it is to judge; that they may be qualified to counsel those who may speak merely to answer the cravings of the people for words, for fear they will be scattered. The danger of setting up a man-made ministry, out of which the Society was originally gathered, was opened; that thereby the testimony would be laid waste, which the Lord gave us to bear, to the spiritual character of Divine worship, in silent, reverent waiting upon Him. When persons mistake their calling, and elders do not discharge their duty faithfully, in silencing such intruders, they bring distress upon the living members, and often make a party to support them; who introduces difficulty into a meeting, in transacting the affairs of the church, they were exhorted to retire to the gift of God in themselves, as in their silent approaches in Divine worship; that they may be made acquainted with their respective duties and services, and enabled to perform them; and when they have delivered what was impressed on their minds to say, to leave it before their brethren and sisters, without urging it, and ruling over them. Christ is given to be Head over all things, to his body the church. These things were laid before them in love, with a sincere desire they might be found laboring together for the faith of the Gospel."

"At Lowville Meeting the company was small, and in sitting with them, it appeared to me, weakness had spread over the heads of the tribes; and the injunction, 'Be watchful and strengthen the things which remain, that are ready to die; for I have not found thy works perfect before God,' was revived and applied. The spirit of prayer was granted, to petition for help from the sanctuary; that those who were negligent and indifferent, and had lost ground, might be forgiven and brought to renew their covenant, and come up in greater faithfulness; also, for the young people, who have so few to lead them in the right way; that the Lord would touch their hearts with the finger of his love, enamour them with the beauty of holiness, and the excellency of his blessed Truth. The hearts of some were affected."

"The very general departure of the young people from plainness of dress, throughout this Quarterly Meeting, gives ground to apprehend that the Society in many places, will decline, if not run out. To the indulgence of parents and others, it is to be much attributed; who, instead of restraining the children, gratify their fondness for dress. What abundant cause is there for mourning; as it is evidence of the degeneracy overspreading many parts of this, as well as other Yearly Meetings.

"We had an appointed meeting at Werkenburg, composed of members and other professors. It was a good meeting, in which was set forth the peculiar glory and excellency of the Gospel dispensation; which brings a knowledge of the Divine will home to every man, with strength to do it; and enables him to worship God in spirit and in truth, without human aid, or the intervention of words. A solemnity was over us. Friends were refreshed, and I felt thankful for the Lord's goodness in qualifying for his work; without which we can do nothing."

"Held a meeting in Westmoreland; in which was emphatically opened and pressed, the danger of being swallowed up in business; by which the work of salvation would be almost or entirely, neglected. I expressed the hope which I felt, that young persons present were designed by the Lord, to be prepared and made use of, in building up the waste places, and restoring the former desolations among us. These were pleaded with to yield to the convictions and drawings of his Spirit, that they might be redeemed from the love of the world, and know Him to fit them for his service in the church. It was a tendering time with some, which was renewed at our lodgings, in a religious opportunity with a number of young persons; some of whom, I believed, if they are faithful, will be qualified to support the ark of the testimonies. It was pleasant to see marks of care and religious concern in some here, to keep to simplicity, and to bring up their children rightly. Oh how are the reins of government thrown upon the necks of children, and they are encouraged to copy the corrupting fashions, and manners of the people around them, with whom they too freely mingle; much to their hurt."

"We had a meeting at Burlington. They were encouraged to individual faithfulness, from the example of Nehemiah, who, notwithstanding, his besetments, effected much by perseverance; through the Divine blessing. I hoped it was a good meeting; there being, as I thought, sincerely concerned ones, who would rejoice in the prosperity of Zion. Under a sense of the protecting power and goodness of our Heavenly Father, extended to us in this journey, I was led to bow before Him, and acknowledge his mercy in visiting us in the morning of life, and keeping us to this hour; and implored his continued preservation, through the remaining snares and temptations with which a cruel enemy might assail us; in order to destroy that which He had done in us and for us.

"In a view of the trials awaiting us, from the unsettled state of our religious Society, there is great need of watchfulness and fervent prayer to our Heavenly Father, for his delivering arm, that it may be found about his afflicted children and servants.

"After dinner we proceeded to Ononta. Here we felt like coming to the close of our visit, this being the starting point where we set out, for the meetings in this part of New York Yearly Meeting; and acknowledgments of the Lord's mercy, secretly rose in my heart, He having thus brought us safely through this trying and laborious journey.

"Attended the First-day Meeting at Butter-nuts; in which I felt a strong interest in some of the young men; to whom the language of persuasion was offered, to yield to the convictions of the Holy Spirit, which would change their hearts and their actions, and give them true peace; in place of a restless, unhappy condition, which often attends disobedience of the Divine law. We must leave our labors with the Lord."

"After a season of long silence, my mind was invested, at our own meeting, with the sense that what is wanting, is the life of religion; accompanied with a renewed evidence, that He who is the resurrection and the life, is graciously near to manifest himself in that character. The duties which are of an outward nature are to be performed; but they may be fulfilled, and the power of godliness denied. Many appeared to me in that situation; plain in the exterior, regular in coming to meeting, and desirous of hearing ministry; but are destitute of that travail of soul and fervency in seeking after Christ, which He would reward with the cheering beams of his countenance, and the bread which nourishes up the soul to everlasting life, and renews our love and courage to follow Him, and to wait for Him."

[Our friend arrived at his comfortable home, on the 27th of Second Month, 1845; having been absent about three months. He had for companion, his kind and beloved friend, Joseph Elkinton, an Elder of the same meeting. The visit was performed amid sacrifices and difficulties; owing, in part, to the deep snows and intense cold of a Canadian winter. At his home he thus writes: "My heart was clothed with gratitude and thanksgiving to our gracious Caretaker, for his unmerited mercy and goodness in preserving us;" &c.]

"The Monthly Meeting of the Western District, was held to-day, which I was drawn to visit. The company was unusually large; and after a time of silent waiting, the stirring of the Lord's power was felt, under which I was gradually enabled to preach the Gospel of salvation, through our Lord Jesus Christ; showing that the work of regeneration had its beginning in the heart, through obedience to the manifestations of his Spirit, in little things. Our Saviour thanked the Father that He had hid the things of his kingdom from the wise and prudent, and revealed them unto babes. To be brought into this blessed experience, we must become babes in Christ; and the only way to experience the new birth and change of heart unto righteousness, is by faithfulness to the requisitions of the Divine will, made known in us. Many things were brought forth out of the treasury, by Him who alone has the key and command of it; and through Divine mercy and condescension, the baptizing and solemnizing power of Christ, went forth over the assembly; to the comfort and strength of the hungry, weary and exercised ones.

"This afternoon, my wife and myself went to visit a Friend in the country. There is a union of spirit between those who see eye to eye, and their countenances and company are cheering. Where the Son of Peace abides, a harmonious converse can be maintained between fellow travellers on the heavenly journey. Their experiences and their Divine openings, with which their mutual Lord and Leader has instructed them, are brought forth from the treasury as things which are new and yet old. Such converse is both entertaining, and, at times, very strengthening, and according with the practice of the earliest disciples. Two of them walked from Jerusalem to Emmaus, talking as they went, of the things which had just transpired. Jesus joined himself to them, and asked, 'What manner of communications are these that ye have one to another, as ye walk, and are sad?' At a time of singular trial and disappointment, it was natural for them to speak upon that which lay the nearest to their hearts. And so it is now. Disciples of the same Master will commune upon their trials, and the straits and becomings of the church, as well as upon its hopes and encouraging prospects. Paul talked with his contemporary believers, on one occasion, until break of day. In old time, when the proud were called bappy, and they that worked wickedness were set up, and they that tempted God were delivered; 'Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another; and the Lord hearkened and heard it; and a book of remembrance was written before Him, for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name. And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels; and I will spare them as a man spareth his own son that serveth him.' This has been the case with the devoted children of God in various ages since that period; and thereby they have consoled one another; and he that watered, was watered himself."

"TWO MITES."—The widow held in her hand two lepta (Heb., perutah), the smallest of all coins. Two of these make a quadran, the ninety-sixth part of a denarius—so that each was worth about the tenth part of an American cent or English half-penny. It was considered not lawful to put in less than two of these coins, and they were all the widow had to live on for that day, and till she wrought for more. Of course, the lesson to be learned is that the most precious of all gifts to God is the gift of absolute self-surrender and sacrifice; and so this widow's offering has remained in the church like the perfume of Mary's alabaster-box that filled the house.—*H. The True Story of a Dog.

In the year 1871 the steamship Sadgool left the Cape of Good Hope, bound for England—"for home," the passengers, all English, called it. Among them was a child of two years and a nurse. The lady had also brought with her a huge, handsome Newfoundland dog.

The voyage had lasted about six days. No land was visible, and the island of St. Helena would be the nearest point. The day was a beautiful one, with a soft breeze blowing, and the sun shining down brightly on the sparkling waters. A large and gay company of the passengers were assembled on deck; merry groups of young men and girls had clustered together; now and then a laugh rang out, or some one sang a gay little snatch of song, when suddenly the mirth of all was silenced by the loud and piercing scream of a woman.

A nurse who had been holding a child in her arms at the side of the vessel had lost her hold of the leaping, restless little one, and it had fallen overboard into the sea—into the great, wide Atlantic Ocean. The poor woman, in her despair, would have flung herself after her charge had not strong arms held her back. But sooner than it can be written down, something rushed swiftly past her; there was a leap over the vessel's side, a splash into the waters, and then Nero's black head appeared above the waves, holding the child in his mouth.

The engines were stopped as soon as possible, but by that time the dog was far behind in the wake of the vessel. A boat was quickly lowered, and the ship's surgeon, taking his place in it, ordered the sailors to pull for their lives. One could just make out on the leaping, dancing waves the dog's black head, holding something scarlet in his mouth. The child had on a little jacket of scarlet cloth, and it gleamed like a spark of fire on the dark blue waves.

The mother of the child stands on the deck, her eyes straining anxiously after the boat, and the black spot upon the waves still holding firmly to the tiny scarlet point. How long the time seems! The boat seems fairly to creep, though it speeds over the waves as it never sped before.

Sometimes a billow higher than its fellows hides for a moment dog and child from the anxious, straining eyes. One can almost hear the watcher's heart then throb with fear, lest the waters may have swallowed them up. But the boat comes nearer, near enough at last to allow of the surgeon's reaching over and lifting the child out of the dog's mouth, then a sailor's stout arms pull Nero into the boat, and the men row swiftly back to the ship.

"Alive?" is shouted from every lip, as the boat comes within hail of the steamer; and, as the answer comes back, "Alive!" a "Thank God!" breaks from every heart.

Then the boat comes up to the ship's side. A hundred hands are stretched out to help the brave dog on board, and "Good Nero," "Brave dog!" "Good fellow," resound on every side. But Nero ignores the praise showered so profusely on him; he trots sedately up to the child's mother, and with a wag of his dripping tail, looks up into her face with his big, faithful brown eyes. It was as if he said, "It is all right; I have brought her back quite safe."

The mother drops on her knees on the deck, and taking his shaggy head in both hands, kisses his wet face again and again, the tears pouring down her face in streams. There is indeed, not a dry eye on board. One old sailor stands near with the tears running down his weather-beaten brown face, all the while unconscious that he is weeping.

Well, as one can imagine, Nero was for the rest of the voyage the pet and hero of the whole ship. He bore his honors with quiet, modest dignity. It was curious, however, to see how from that time on he made himself the sentinel and body-guard of the child he had saved. He always placed himself at the side of the chair of any person in whose arms she was, his eyes watching every movement she made. Sometimes she would be laid on the deck, with only Nero to watch her, and if inclined to creep out of bounds, Nero's teeth, fastened firmly in the skirt of her frock, promptly drew her back. It was as though he thought, "I have been lucky enough, Miss Baby, to save you once from a watery grave, but as I may not be so lucky again, I shall take care you don't run any unnecessary risks in the future."

When the steamer reached her destination, Nero received a regular ovation as he was leaving the vessel. Some one cried, "Three cheers for Nero!" and they were given with a will. And "Good-by, Nero," "Good-by, good dog," resounded on every side. Every one crowded around to give him a pat on the head, as he trotted down the gang plank. To all these demonstrations he could, of course, only reply with a wag of his plummy tail and a twinkle of his faithful brown eyes. He kept close to the nurse's side, and watched anxiously his little charge's arrival on dry land.

He was taken to the home of his little mistress, where he lived, loved and honored, until he died of old age, with his shaggy gray head resting on the knee of the child (a woman now) that he had saved. His grave is in an English church yard. He lies in the burial plot of the family to which he belonged. His grave is marked by a fair white stone, on which is engraved—

"Sacred to the Memory of Nero, Faithfullest of Dogs."

His portrait hangs over the chimney-piece of an English drawing-room, beneath which sits, in a low arm-chair, a fair-haired girl, who often looks up at Nero's portrait as she tells the tale of how he sprang into the waters of the Atlantic ocean after her, and held her up until help came.—Harper's Young People.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Eastern Shore of Chesapeake Bay.

Soon after the settlement of Friends had commenced in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, a proposition emanated from the meeting held at Burlington, N. J., that Friends in the different provinces in America, from New England in the north to Virginia and Carolina in the south, should be drawn into closer union. To consider the proposal and communicate it to Friends at a distance, a committee was appointed consisting of William Penn and five others. The result of this movement was the appointment in 1685 of representatives by Herring Creek Quarterly Meeting, which included those Friends in Maryland, west of Chesapeake Bay, who were with them the following year, viz., Tenth month 1686. Our prayer is that the God of Truth and wisdom may be with you, and that true unity, peace and prosperity may remain forever in the Church, of which Christ Jesus is Head and Lawgiver.

"Signed by appointment of our Quarterly Meeting at Herring Creek, the 5th of the Sixth Month, 1685.

"WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
RICHARD HALL,
RICHARD JOHNS."

At this Yearly Meeting arrangements were made for the suitable accommodation of those Friends who came from other provinces as representatives.

Although the proposal for a general meeting to be held yearly met with some favor, yet the practical inconvenience of it, at a time when there were no such facilities for journeying as now exist, but distant travel involved great fatigue and exposure, and considerable danger; prevented it from ever becoming general.

Among the records of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting there is preserved an epistle of advice issued to its members by Maryland Yearly Meeting, in 1699, which shows the righteous concern of that body for the preservation of its members. It contains cautions on many specific points, the 15th of which is as follows:

"Whoever they are that makes profession of God's Truth, and do not walk answerable in a holy, innocent and harmless conversation, all such are tenderly to be admonished and dealt with in the wisdom of God in meekness, according to the Gospel order of our Lord Jesus Christ, that the Truth may shine forth in the pure innocency of it, and all hypocrisy and deceit may be made manifest and denied."

The epistles from one Yearly Meeting to another were generally short, containing grateful acknowledgment of the Lord's mercy as manifested by his presence in their assemblies, informing that meetings and the Discipline of the Society were kept up, and expressing fervent love and concern for each other's preservation in the Truth. That from Maryland, in 1742, appears to have been written under some degree of depression. It refers to the fewness of their numbers [occasioned by the death of many of those who had been standard-bearers among them, and whose places had not been filled by successors from among the youth]. The epistle says, "By the accounts brought from the several churches, we think the same not so ready as of late; and we are ready to be truly the things which remain, that are ready; but or I have not fondly thy works perfect used by God, was revived and applied. The spirit to thy prayer was granted, to petition for help from the sanctuary; that those who were negligent and indifferent, and had lost ground, might be you are but a few in number, if such continue to retain their love and integrity to God, and walk worthy of his many favors and blessings, that in his own time, He will be pleased in Divine goodness to renew his visitation of love to the young and rising generation; and, to your comfort, increase and add to the number of the faithful and sincere in heart among you."

The cause of the falling away which had taken place in some parts of Maryland is set forth in the memoranda of Robert Jordan, a valuable minister from Nansmond, Virginia, who appeared in the ministry about the year 1718. He says: "I early found a concern upon my mind to visit Friends in Maryland, which I did on both sides of the bay, in fear and trembling; I being so young and weak and the work very exercising by reason of a declension which has for some time been on a growing hand in that Province, which has still occasioned me much exercise in speaking and writing unto and amongst them, against the spirit of liberty, superfluity of naughtiness and conformity to the world, which hath got ahead, and for which in many particulars ancient Friends suffered much; now, with many is the offence of that cross ceased, and Friends' sufferings trampled under foot, to the great grief and suffering of my spirit, respecting thythes, apparel, &c. Close and wholesome Discipline being neglected appears to me the ground cause of these evils."

In 1725, in company with Thomas Pleasants I went over into Maryland. We were at Choptank Yearly Meeting, where we met with divers Friends of the ministry, particularly Abigail Bowles, from Ireland, who had extraordinary service. My concern was principally to labor for the restoration of wholesome Discipline, the neglect whereof I conceived had been the principal cause of the great disorder and undue liberty run pretty generally into by the professors of Truth there.

The epistle from the Yearly Meeting held at West River in 1747 mentions that the meeting had been large "and in some measure favored with the insinuing of the heavenly word of life and salvation: whereby the name of our God has been glorified, the souls of his people comforted, and the affairs of the church treated of in love and unity." They are hopeful that a Christian care is felt to maintain good order and Discipline, yet are sorry that "the fashions, customs and friendship of this world prevail too much with many educated amongst us."

The epistle from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, of the same year, to Maryland, states that "many living and weighty testimonies" had been borne among them "to the sufficiency of the pure principle of life and grace, which we as a people have been peculiarly called to publish to the world, to be the means appointed for the restoration of fallen man to a state of acceptance with his Maker—and through this blessed Counsellor the affairs of the Church have been managed in brotherly love and condescension."

In the epistle to Maryland of 1751, occurs this passage: "Let the souls of our servants, whether white or black, be precious in our eyes, remembering that they are each one a part of God's creation, over which we are but as stewards, and that He will require an account thereof at our hands."

The epistle to Maryland in 1755, speaks of the correspondence between the Yearly Meetings as being likely to be of singular benefit, when the communication of advice and caution to each other results from hearts duly influenced with a pious concern for our confirmation and establishment in the life and virtue of religion.

"As the aim and tendency of all true Gospel ministry is to direct to the immediate and unerring dictates of the Holy Spirit in ourselves, let us be particularly observant in all our religious assemblies to wait with reverence and humility to know our minds abstracted from every object that would divert us from the performance of true and acceptable worship. As a constant and uniform care is observed in this respect, it will discover to us the weight and necessity of abiding faithful to every branch of our Christian testimony, that when a time of suffering may come (which appears now more nearly to threaten us in these provinces than heretofore), we may secure to ourselves an interest in that Rock and Refuge which hath been a sanctuary to the righteous in all ages."

The Habit of Borrowing.

We are naturally and justly shocked at the absconding clerk, the defaulting cashier, the faithless trustee; but we rarely pause to consider how these unhappy men have come to such a pass. It has been no sudden plunge from innocence to guilt, but a gradual loosening of the principles—a slow deterioration of the character that has at length made such crimes possible. While we may not be able to trace, step by step, this downward process in any given case, it is safe to say that many, if not most, of these overt acts of dishonesty had their root in a loose habit of borrowing. Now, in itself borrowing cannot be called a culpable act. It is often a great convenience. We need a knife, a book, an umbrella—perhaps a small sum of money, which we cannot easily obtain at once; a friend is near and willing to lend; we borrow it, use it and return it promptly. So far no wrong has been committed, no harm is done. Our friend has been glad to oblige us, and we are grateful. If the same limits and conditions were always preserved, no further evil could ensue. But often these limits are gradually extended; we borrow more and more freely, and become less careful and prompt in the return. Sometimes we seriously infringe another's rights, without any intention of wrong-doing, simply by delay in returning borrowed property. The courtesy and kindness that lends freely is often sadly imposed upon, and compelled to withhold its favors.

From this habit to that of borrowing sums of money on slight occasions is not a difficult transition. Of course there are times when necessity justifies a man in asking a temporary loan. But it is not usually those who are in the direst poverty that are the most inveterate borrowers. It is much more frequently those who allow their desires for superfluities to outrun their ability to obtain them that resort to this dangerous and insidious practice. All such desires grow by what they feed on, and become more and more exacting, while the strict rectitude which cannot brook the long continuance of a debt is gradually impaired. The victim of such a snare finds himself increasingly involved in its meshes; it becomes ever easier to borrow, ever harder to repay. Of course, this cannot continue forever. People after repeated disappointments decline to lend with so small a chance of return, and he then resorts to darker and more questionable methods of obtaining the means to gratify desires which have acquired such tyranny over him. Temptation comes, opportunities arise; he thinks he can restore what he takes and avoid detection, and perhaps, before he realizes what he is doing, he has committed a crime. It is but the culmination of a long process, during which self-indulgence has been fastening its clutch upon him, and the principle of integrity has been loosening its hold.—Philadelphia Ledger.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Dredging Oysters.

It was stated in the last number of this article that the food of the oyster was the very minute animals and plants which abound in the bays into which our large rivers pour their waters charged with the debris of the lands which they drain.

All human food is vegetable in its origin, and whether we eat the plants directly or the animals which have been fed on them, we are ultimately carried back to the vegetable kingdom. For plants alone have the power of taking the inorganic materials of the earth and turning them into organic matter which is fitted to sustain the life of animals. This is as true in the water as on the land. The blue-fish preys on smaller fishes; many of these on still smaller ones; these in their turn upon minute crustacea; these upon still smaller animals, and these pasture on the microscopic plants which swarm at the surface of the ocean. Most of these plants are so small that they are absolutely invisible to the unaided eye, and even when they are gathered together in a mass, it looks like slimy, discolored water and presents no traces of structure. Their vegetative power is wonderful past all expression. It can be shown that a single marine plant, very much smaller than a grain of mustard seed, would fill the whole ocean solid in less than a week if all its descendants were to live. As countless minute animals are constantly pasturing upon them, the multiplication of these plants is kept in check, but in calm weather it is no rare thing to find great tracts of water many miles in extent packed so full of them that the whole surface is converted into a slimy mass, which breaks the waves and smoothes the surface like oil. The so-called "black water" of the Arctic and Antarctic oceans, the home and feeding ground of the whale, has been shown by microscopic examination to consist of a mass of these plants crowded together until the ocean is discolored by them. Through these seas of "black water" roam the right whales, the largest animals on earth, gulping at each mouthful hundreds of gallons of the little mollusca and crustacea which feed on the plants.

These plants themselves derive their nourishment from the mineral matter dissolved in the water. The rocks are gradually ground down by the action of water in frost and rain, and worn away, and their fragments conveyed to lower levels, forming the fertile soil of the hillsides and valleys. Each year the heavy rains wash great quantities of this soil into the rivers, and so it ultimately finds its way into the ocean.

The Chesapeake and Delaware Bays are great valleys, each of which receives the drainage of a vast area of fertile land, the most valuable part of which is deposited over the bays in the form of a fine, light, black sediment, known as oyster mud, which furnishes the food for a luxuriant growth of small plants, which in their turn support in corresponding abundance the animalcules which feed upon them.

If this chain of existence ended with these microscopic animals, man might well deprecate the constant waste of rich material carried off from his fields by the water. But the all-wise Creator of the universe has provided a means by which these invisible creatures may be converted into a tangible and edible shape so as to assist in supplying the needs of the human race. The myriads of oysters which line the bottom of the bays are constantly drawing them into their stomachs, digesting them and fattening on this diet, until they become large enough to be dredged by man for his own food.

Captain Sheppard, who so kindly explained to us the system of oyster culture, said that he planted about 10,000 bushels of seed oysters each year. These were mostly obtained by dredging in the bay above Egg Island Point—a part of the waters which are free to all the oyster planters for about two months in the spring and early summer. As there are between four and five hundred vessels engaged in this business, which soil from the Maurice River, it seems surprising that sufficient young oysters can be found to supply the enormous demand. This would be impossible, if it were not for the immense productiveness of this shell-fish. Professor Brooks says that the average female Manhattan oyster of good size, produces about 16,000,000 eggs. When these are mature, which is usually in the summer, they are small cells with food stored in them, they are separated from the body of the oyster and swept out into the surrounding waters by the currents which are always flowing through the shells. The male oyster also produces cells which are smaller than the true egg cells, having no supply of food in them, but furnished with a cilium or vibrating hair, by which they are enabled to move through the water. As soon as one of these comes in contact with an egg it fuses with it and is lost in its substance, which is thus fertilized, and at once begins its development into a new oyster. The fertilized egg rapidly goes through the primary stages of its development and when about thirty hours old begins to acquire the cilia which are its swimming organs. The young animal then swims about for a few days without much increase in size, until it voluntarily attaches itself to some hard substance, when it becomes fixed for the rest of its life, and commences to eat and grow.

The eggs which are unfertilized speedily perish, and these probably form a very large majority of the whole number.

When the contents of a dredge were emptied on the deck of our schooner it was a matter of considerable interest to note what other inhabitants of the bay besides oysters had been gathered by it. Occasionally a large green crab, one of the kind used for food, would be seen crawling away. These were picked up and thrown into a basket. Then a much smaller kind of crab, only an inch or two across, would move about among the shells. These our boatmen called oyster crabs. They frequent the oyster grounds and are said to be the same species that are found inside of the oyster shell apparently living harmoniously in company with the rightful owners of the pearly home. It is probable that they feed on particles of organized matter, animal or vegetable, that are carried within their reach by the ceaseless current of water produced by the cilia that line the gills of the oyster.

The meshes of the chain-bag of the dredge are made large, so that the mud and the sea worms and other smaller animals which burrow in it pass through them, and are washed away as the dredge is dragged through the water, so that there is not to be found so large a variety of animated forms as are brought up by the finer meshed dredges used by the naturalist. The largest of the shells that were lying among the dump-heap of the dredge were those of the Pear-Conch (Fulgur), a snail-like univalve; of these there were two kinds, the F. Carica, which is furnished with tubercles or projecting points on the angles of the whorls; and the F. Canaliculatus, which has no tubercles, but in place of them a small channel running spirally around the tops of the whorls. Another shell of considerable size, was a globular one, about as large as a small apple (Natica). Like many other of the univalve shell-fish, this animal is carnivorous. It is furnished with a long horny ribbon in place of a tongue, which is closely beset with minute teeth, and by its backward and forward motion it can rasp down objects that are brought into its way. In this manner it can bore through the shell of a clam or mussel, and eat the flesh inside of it.

We picked up among the refuse quite a number of a small snail-like shell, whose spiral whorls ended in rather a sharp point. They were called Winkles by the fishermen, but are not the true periwinkles, but a smaller animal, the "drill" (Crossopline Cincta). They are destructive among oysters, boring small round holes through the shells with their horny tongues, not with the sharp point of their spiral shell, as we inferred the sailors thought. These were the destructive little animals that our Captain said were formerly so numerous, but were mostly killed in the storms of 1876. They seem now again to be multiplying.

Several of the shells of different kinds brought up by the dredge were those of dead animals, but nearly all of these vacant houses had been taken possession of by two species of hermit crabs—"soldier crabs" as our seamen called them. The hinder part of these crabs is not protected by a shelly covering, and would be eagerly seized by any passing fish, if it were exposed. So the crab takes possession of any vacant shell that suits him, and in its recesses hides his body, while the opening in front is filled up by his formidable claws. Two or three shells thus tenanted were laid on the roof of the cabin, and the crabs soon began to emerge and explore the neighborhood; but on the approach of a hand, or anything which alarmed them, they retreated to their fortress with surprising suddenness.

Lying on the deck were some fragments of a buoy, which had been in the water about three months, and in that time had become so eaten up by the ship-worm (Teredo Navalis) as to be almost worthless. A large part of the wood except at the centre of the stick had been removed, leaving numerous holes, mostly about one-eighth of an inch in diameter, and some of them several inches in length, with thin plates of wood between them. Many of these holes were lined with a calcareous coating. The ship-worm is probably a native of tropical waters, but has been introduced into all parts of the ocean. The young Teredo when but about the size of the head of a pin bores into timber that is under the water, and follows in a sinuous line the grain of the wood, avoiding knots. The burrow increases in size with the growth of the animal, and the wood soon becomes honeycombed. Insignificant as this little shell-fish may seem in itself such are its numbers and voracity that Packard speaks of it as "one of the most destructive to human interests of all animals." Besides the Teredo Navalis other species are found in some parts of the world.

Hanging up in the office of the oyster shipper at Bivalve was a string of curious little fish, which at some seasons of the year are brought up by the dredges. They were four or five inches in length. The head curiously resembled in its outline that of a horse, hence they are called sea-horses. The mouth is placed at the extremity of a prolonged snout, and the tail is flexible, and often used to grasp submarine vegetation. This fish is slow in its movements and when placed in a bucket of water slowly propels itself around it, using its small fins, and aiding these by a jerking motion of the tail.

A curious peculiarity of this fish, and of the family to which it belongs, is the presence on the belly of the male of a sac into which it receives the eggs laid by the female, and there guards them until they are ready to hatch and take care of themselves.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Encouragement from Nehemiah's Successful Labors in his Day.

The following encouraging testimony is from the pen of the gifted John Barclay. "Though under twenty-one years of age when it was written, he seems to have been favored with unobscured vision as respects the state of our Society; and after the scriptural account of Nehemiah, to inspire with the lively hope that even now there are hidden ones here and there who, guided and governed by the teachings of that Spirit of Truth, which leadeth into all Truth, will in the Lord's own time arise and "build the old waste places," through "a sinking down and bowing down yet lower and deeper than many of us have hitherto humbled ourselves," and by "a full surrender and sacrifice of everything which the law written in the heart calls for." May the all-wise Holy One hasten it, in his time.

"It is my belief, and feel freedom to mention it, that there are or will arise, those who will, in some sense, 'build the old waste places.' I live in the faith that the Truth shall spread; and the number of those that are guided and governed by the teachings of that Spirit, which leadeth into all Truth, will be greatly multiplied. Surely there are even now those that 'are left of the captivity,' who 'are in great affliction and reproach;' we may also say, that, in some acceptance of the passage, 'the wall of Jerusalem is broken down, and the gates thereof are burned with fire.' May I not also add, that there are, even in this day, those, who can in measure adopt a similar language with that of Nehemiah—'When I heard these things, I sat down and wept, and mourned certain days, and fasted, and prayed before the God of heaven.' Surely there are those that can say, 'I arose in the night, neither told I any man what my God had put in my heart to do at Jerusalem: then went I up in the night by the brook, and viewed the wall, and turned back; and the rulers knew not whither I went, or what I did: neither had I as yet told it to the Jews, nor to the priests, nor to the nobles, nor to the rulers, nor to the rest that did the work.' There are doubtless some that are ready to laugh these to scorn, and to despise them; and to say, 'what is this thing that ye do?'—and I judge there are those that can reply, 'the God of heaven, He will prosper us: therefore we his servants will arise and build.' To such as endeavor to entice the sincere hearted, and to take them off, by whatever specious pretence, from their watch and work, their unceasing concern and travail for the prosperity of the great cause; I am clearly of the mind that the reply should be, 'I am doing a great work, so that I cannot come down; why should the work cease, whilst I leave it and come down to you?' Now the work that is waited, as far as I have in this and some other favored seasons had capacity to see, is, a sinking down and bowing down yet lower and deeper than many of us have hitherto humbled ourselves—even under the government and dominion of the holy seed, Christ Jesus; that so we may, through subjection to Him, be led to "cease from our own works," and to let Him do and work all things in us according to his own Divine will. Wherever this blessed work hath gone forward with strength and beauty, wherever this constraining power has been fully and faithfully given up to, I believe a necessity has been sooner or later felt, to make a full surrender and sacrifice of everything which the law written in the heart may call for."

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

A SUMMER DAY.

The early morn was bright and clear,
The birds proclaimed their joyous cheer

From orchard, grove and glade;
The rising sun on tree-tops shone,
On distant hills his rays were thrown,
The valleys lay in shade.

The air was still, no leaf was stirred,
Save when a brown or russet bird
"Sprung from his leafy perch;
And winged its way to neighboring tree
Or to the dew-draped leaf,

Its morning meal in search.
How lustrous bright the earth appears
Baptized in morning's crystal tears,
The hills and fields aglow;
The maple's leaves are wet with dew
Where gleaming sunbeams filter through,
And fleck the ground below.

From barn and yard around the lane
The farmer's herd a mottled train,
With loitering footsteps go;
They seek the pasture grasses sweet,
Where daisies bluish, and clovers meet
Beside the rivers flow.

On such a morn who idly strays
Will see before his careful gaze,
A mimic rainbow's span;
Each pearly dew-drop at his feet
Is with the threads of light replete,
Which he may quickly scan.

As rose the sun in blue concave
Oppressive grew the heated wave,
The air has sultry grown;
But gentle fanning breezes yield
A fragrant scent from harvest field,
Or meadows newly mown.

More sultry grows the humid air
And shines the sun with dazzling glare,
High noon is now hard by;
Far on the west horizon's edge,
A belt of clouds like rocky ledge;
In seeming quiet lie.

The singing birds have ceased their notes,
Save where from out the forest floats,
Some song from deepest shade;
Or when from distant fields the quail,
Whose whistlings on the gentle gale,
A fitting cadence made.

Beneath the oak tree's spreading boughs
Lies couched to rest the tranquil cows,
Screened from the noon-tide heat;
Or in the cowpods' quiet recess
They lie in pensive quietude,
Of rest, a type complete.

The sun has passed the noon-tide hour,
Nor yet his rays have lost their power,
Welcome, the coming shade,
Uprising in the western sky,
That ragged cloud we now desery,
Like frowning palisade.

Oh! ye, who roam in far-off lands,
O'er mountains wild—on ocean strands—
Where from the rocks enshroud;
Do scenes like these, the awe impart,
With adoration fill the heart?
As does the thunder cloud.

The storm is o'er, in western sky
See dappled clouds like flocks that lie
In shepherd's fold at even;
While eastward glows serene and warm
God's light on the passing storm
Of covenant once given.

Now smiles the earth refreshed with rain,
The drooping plants revive again
Fresh to beholder's gaze;
While robins on the apple tree
So freely chant their melody
In songs of joy and praise.

A LESSON LEARNED.

SELECTED.

"Thy will be done." The broken words fell slow,
For I was weary of the harrowing strife—
My bleeding heart lay quivering from the blow,
And, "All was lost except a little life!"—
As suddenly, at crimson set of sun,
I bowed—and, pining, sobbed, "Thy will be done!"

Once more, the Reaper walked amid the grain—
"The yellow bending grain of hope grown strong!"
And reaped my life's joys with the scythe of pain,
While I sat by and wept! The hours were long,
But, ere the last pink cloud had westward flown,
I meekly knelt, and sighed, "Thy will be done!"

He came once more! But I had slowly learned
The God-love that must smite—if it would save;
And though the tears fell, and the spirit yearned,
I sat and smiled, beside my dead hope's grave!
And looked away from earth—up to God's throne,
And gladly, truly cried, "Thy will be done!"

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Reflections and Contemplations in the Meeting for Worship at Stillwater, Ohio, Ninth Mo. 30th, 1891.

In taking a view over this, the largest and most solid solemnly gathered meeting of consistent Friends in dress and deportment I ever attended, the language of one formerly was brought to mind when he saw Israel abide in her tents: "How goodly are thy tents, O Israel."

How is it, that after two hundred years of successive generations, thou art thus preserved and in measure openly manifesting to the world that the doctrines and practices promulgated by the first generation of Friends are still held near and dear; whilst on the right hand and the left, by far the greatest number of those once in profession with us have departed therefrom? Of the two fundamental doctrines of Christianity—Christ truly enlightening every man that cometh into the world, and Christ, the one offering for the sins of the whole world.—The Hicksites denying the second, the Gurneysites deviating from the first in actual practice, until now, little by little, some of them are as open in their rejection of the Light, as the former were in their attack upon the second. Is it not, then, the holding of both in an even balance, each in its own proper place, that has so far preserved us?

Let us examine and investigate the ground over which all bearing the name of Friends have passed in the last century, and see the fruits of the various positions taken, as now openly exposed to light. Shall we close our eyes and say such investigation is too painful? The same seed will always produce the same kind of fruit, with a little variation in quality and quantity, according to surrounding circumstances. In thus making a definite contrast between the two large factions and our own present position, and reviewing the way by which we have been led, a deep feeling of humility, mingled with gratitude and praise, filled my soul, while listening to the living ministry of six ministers, closing with prayer to God, vocally offered in the spirit of life, uniting the hearts in felt praise for the rich tokens of fatherly love vouchsafed, I trust, to a hungry and thirsty gathering depending upon Christ, the Head, to feed and lead his own Church.

Much outcry has been made against our "forms." Let it be remembered that life cannot be seen until it takes upon itself a form, whether it be in the vegetable or animal kingdom. The apostle tells us that faith without works is dead; that the devil believes there is a God, and shudders. Work is the active motion of true life, manifesting itself in "form." Show me thy faith without works, and I by my works will show my faith. The ambiguity on the subject of faith in Gurney's observations, together with other subjects passing as sound Friends' doctrines, manifests the general low state and dimness of vision, even of many honest and well-meaning Friends; whilst others compromising for the sake of present peace, have checked the pure spring of life, seared their conscience, and thus become an easy prey to the subtle Serpent's design.

"Whosoever is not for me is against me, and whosoever gathereth not with me scattereth abroad." Are we gathering with that which gathered us at the first? even the true Light; and abiding in that which convinceth of sin? Compromise is shunning the true cross, and often takes upon itself a covering bearing the name "charity." "We must have charity." Yes, but of what sort? That which cherishes purity in ourselves to the uttermost.

How definitely may this prophetic token of that coming to pass which has been spoken apply to those who sounded the alarm against the innovations which now, in their fruit-bearing state, are seen and judged by the world itself as non-Quakerism! Therefore "to thy tents, O Israel, and to thy tabernacles, O Jacob." Thine enemy is falling by his own device. Nothing short of a faithful and diligent adherence to God's own gift, the Sun's Light that gives Light, can now, as then, raise up children to Abraham of these stones. But we are unwilling to submit to the thoroughness of the inward work required to make Quakers. The freedom wanted from "form" has now set the Society back unto all the world's forms of man-made and man-regulated congregational worship, "building up that which we once destroyed," becoming offenders. We need first a deepening in the root, that our banner may again become unfurled, as in days of old.

Dear young friends, great as is the favor of a true Christian education, it is coupled with an equal degree of responsibility. Oh, that you might know and feel an increased yearning after God, a praying without ceasing—"let not thy hand spare, nor thine eye pity until righteousness is brought forth in its brightness." You can never be benefited by cleaving to anything which God has a controversy with. Every plant which He has not planted shall be rooted up.

Dear young friends, the mind requires food. Our development depends upon the kind, as much as the quantity of food we digest; evil company always corrupts good manners. Love retirement, that is Christ's school, where he teaches his own to know and feel our Father's love. Abide in Him; then as you love the spirit of Truth in yourselves, you will love it wherever you feel it, and have fellowship with it; and as holy men of old wrote the Scriptures as they were moved by that spirit to write of what they experimentally knew of the good word of life, so you will love to read them above all books, and they will answer your own experience; and you will not think any strange thing is happening to you now, but such as always has been the lot of all them that would live godly in Christ Jesus. Chastening is the indispensable schoolmaster to lead to Christ,—what child is he whom his father doth not chasten, &c.; therefore recollect that the crown lies at the end of the race. So persevere, remembering, "My grace is sufficient for thee."

Natural History, Science, etc.

The Great Auk.—In 1888 an egg of a great auk was sold for one hundred and sixty guineas, whilst more recently an egg of the same species fetched two hundred and twenty-five pounds; and although these may seem enormous sums to give for a relic, the transactions are not without others to keep them in countenance. Only a few years ago two eggs of the same kind fetched one hundred, and one hundred and two guineas respectively; while the egg first named realized thirty-three pounds ten shillings a little over twenty years ago. At that time it was discovered, together with four others, packed away in a dust-covered box in the museum of the Royal College of Surgeons, these being sold in 1855. From this it would seem that in the ornithological market the complete shell of a great auk's egg is worth nearly one hundred and seventy pounds, and a broken one only seventy pounds less. It will be seen that the purchase of one of these may be a good investment; and what a mine of wealth a great auk that was a good layer might prove to its fortunate possessor can only be conjectured. At the present time the number of eggs of this species known to exist is sixty-six, twenty-five of which are in museums and forty-one in private collections. Of the total number forty-three are retained in Great Britain. When a bird becomes so rare that the individual remains can be counted, the same may be taken to be practically extinct as a species. The great auk has pursued a policy of extinction for the past two or three centuries, until now like the mighty moa and the dodo, it has ceased to exist. The great auk, or garafu, was one of those birds which, from long disuse, had lost at once the power of flight and preservation. It was a great shambling bird, as large as a goose, and ill adapted to travel on land. How these things told against it may be inferred from the story of one Captain Richard Whitbourne, who writing of the discovery of Newfoundland in 1620, says that among the abundant water-fowl of these parts are penguis (great auks) "as bigge as geese, and flye not, for they have but a short wing, and they multiply so infinitely, upon a certain flat island, that men drive them from thence upon a boord, into their boats by hundreds at a time." This process of extinction went on at Iceland and elsewhere until about the middle of the present century hardly any birds remained. The Icelanders robbed the auks of their eggs for domestic use, and upon one occasion the crew of a British privateer remained upon one of the skerries all day, killing many birds and treading down their eggs and young. This went on until the last birds were taken, and there is but the faintest hope that it may yet linger on in the inaccessible North. Although awkward and travelling with the greatest difficulty on land, the great auk was perfectly at home in the water, and travelled both upon and under the surface with the rapidity of a fish. The time of haunting the land was during the breeding season in early summer. At this period the auk resorted to the rocks, in the dark recesses of which the females deposited one large egg—large even for the size of the bird. These had a whitish-green ground, streaked with brown, and nearly five inches in length.—Poachers and Poaching.

Eider Ducks.—In our own country (Great Britain) the birds breed along the shores of the Firth of Forth, as well as in the Orkneys and Shetlands; on Colonsay and Islay it also abounds, and less frequently in many other northern breeding stations. It is in still more northern haunts, however, that the vast breeding colonies are found—in the Feroes, Iceland, and along the shores of the Scandinavian peninsula. In Norway, as in some other places, this bird is protected by law, though only to be persecuted the more persistently by private individuals. On one island, that of Isafjardur, the eider ducks are said to nest in thousands. Speaking of the breeding sites by the shore, Mr. Shepherd, who visited the colony, tells us that the brown ducks sat upon their nests in masses, and at every step started from beneath the feet. On this island, of three-quarters of a mile in length, it was difficult to walk without stepping into the nests. The island was one that was farmed. A thick stone breakwater ran along its coasts just above high-water mark. At the bottom and sides of the wall, alternate stones had been left out so as to form a series of compartments for the ducks to nest in. Every compartment was tenanted, and as the visitors walked along, the ducks flew out all along the line. These were welcomed by the white drakes, which were tossing on the water, "with loud and clamorous cooing." A farmhouse on the island was tenanted in like manner. The house itself was "a great marvel." Ducks were hatching on the turf walls which surrounded it, in the window embrasures, on the ground, on the roof. The house was "fringed with ducks," and "a duck sat in the scraper." Then a grassy bank close by was cut into squares, every one of which was occupied. A windmill was packed, and so was every available object on the island—mounds, rock, and crevices. This was an eider-down farm. So tame were the ducks as to allow the farmer's wife to stroke them as they sat on their nests. Of course there is another side to this pleasant picture, as we see, when we learn how the "good-lady" of the island repays the confidence of the birds. But we will allow Dr. Hartwig to tell it in his own way. He says: "The eider-down is easily collected, as the birds are quite tame. The female having laid five or six pale greenish-olive eggs, in a nest thickly lined with her beautiful down, the collectors, after carefully removing the bird, rob the nest of its contents, after which they replace her. She then begins to lay afresh—though this time only three or four eggs—and again has recourse to the down of her body. But the greedy persecutors once more rifle her nest, and oblige her to line it for the third time. Now, however, her own stock of down is exhausted, and with a plaintive voice she calls her mate to her assistance, who willingly plucks the soft feathers from his breast to supply the deficiency. If the cruel robbery be again repeated, which in former times was frequently the case, the poor eider-duck abandons the spot, never to return, and seeks for a new home where she may indulge her maternal instinct undisturbed by the avarice of man."—Poachers and Poaching.

Artificial Almonds.—The wooden nutmeg of fraud fame has been eclipsed by Dutch ingenuity. According to word sent from Utrecht, the Hollanders are making artificial almonds in large quantities from paste composed of glucose. They are shaped and colored to nature, and steeped in nitro-benzole to give the necessary odor. Hundreds of bushels have been sold to unscrupulous dealers, who mix them with the genuine article. The same people are at work on a varnished coffee bean.

Forest Fires.—There are many miles of excellent forest timber in the vicinity of Biglerville, Southern Pennsylvania, which will never be disturbed by forest fires, in consequence of cattle raising being carried on in connection with forestry. Cattle being allowed to graze under the trees keeps down all underbrush, and when there is no dead underbrush there can be no forest fires.—Mechan's Monthly.

Longevity of Birds.—As instances of longevity in birds while in a state of captivity, Nature reports the death of a European crane (Grus cinerea) which had lived nearly forty-three years in the London Zoological Gardens. This is exceeded, however, by the case of a black parrot (Coraopis fusa) which died in 1884, after having lived fifty-four years in the Regent's Park.

Age of Trees.—Some German scientists have recently furnished information in regard to the ages of trees. They assign to the pine tree 500 and 700 years as the maximum, 425 years to the silver fir, 275 years to the larch, 245 years to the red beech, 210 to the aspen, 200 to the birch, 170 to the ash, and 145 to the alder and 130 to the elm. The heart of the oak begins to rot at about the age of 300 years. The holly oak alone escapes this law, it is said, and there in existence near Aschaffenburg, in Germany, a tree of this kind which has attained the age of 410 years.—Boston Globe.

Kansas Yearly Meeting (Conservative) convened at Emporia, Kansas, on Sixth-day, Tenth Month 23d, at 10 o'clock A. M. Meeting for ministers and Elders on Fifth-day, at 2 o'clock P. M. Archibald Crosby, a minister from Iowa, accompanied by Clarkson T. Penrose, was present. The meeting was nearly the same as usual as to numbers. In the meeting for worship at the opening of the Yearly Meeting, the principal subject spoken of in the ministerial communication was the nature of true spiritual worship, showing that it is not to be performed in the will and wisdom of man, and that, by his own intellectual ability, can no more perform it, or search out the deep things of God, than could the poor ignorant woman at Jacob's well, and how the Saviour could draw water without accommodations for that purpose. On Seventh-day morning the meeting was somewhat disturbed by the beating of a drum and other noises occasioned by the convening of a political meeting, but soon after gathering it was enabled to settle down into a deep stillness. One of the prominent features of the meeting was the manifest desire on the part of most present, that the broken walls of Zion might be rebuilt; and that each one might begin at his own door. On First-day morning quite a number of the other Body were present as well as many of the towns-people. The offices of Christ, both in his outward body and his spiritual appearance in the heart of man, were largely dwelt upon, showing that by the one we were reconciled unto God or brought into a salvable condition, and that by the other, the law written upon the fleshly tablet of the heart, we are enabled to see our sinful condition, and that by placing implicit confidence in its power to save, and suffering a willingness to be wrought in our hearts to obey its guiding influence the sinner will be changed from a state of nature to a state of grace, and by a continuance in well doing, finally hear the welcome answer of well done, &c. In the afternoon, the nature of the cross of Christ was feelingly touched upon. The ordinances of baptism, &c., and Friends' views of them, in accordance with Scripture doctrine, were clearly explained. The performance of vocal prayer or of prayer because the best appointed will come was spoken of, as well as the impossibility of being pleasing to God with the unfeeling harmony of a choir of trained voices; and, to use the minister's words, "How silly to think of worshipping an almighty being by dangling with the fingers upon a musical instrument, and then believe that He is pleased with such outwardism." Although the answers to the Queries showed that in the subordinate many deficiencies existed, and that there was a want of Christian fellowship on the part of some, yet the Yearly Meeting was favored to transact its business without the least degree of disunity, and Friends separated with the universal feeling, that it had been good for them to be there.

The meeting feeling that the time had come, established Emporia as the place for holding the Yearly Meeting, and adjourned to meet there next year, at the usual time.

The Death Penalty.—The Independent publishes an article on the New Penal Code of Italy, which shows that punishment by death is not recognized by the laws now in force in that country. It says:

"In providing the punishments to be awarded to offenses, the first question before the framers of the Code was whether the penalty of death shall be retained. This had long been a burning question in Italy. Twenty-five years ago the popular house in Rome had adopted a plan to abolish the gallows, although the ministry was opposed to the reform. In 1872 a congress of jurors at Rome unanimously demanded the abolition of capital punishment, and four years later the magistrates of Italy, by a large majority, seconded the demand. The Chamber of Deputies in 1877 passed a bill for the purpose with but one dissenting vote, but it failed in the senate. One year later the Chamber of Deputies adopted a plan to commute, and uniformly commuting every death sentence to life-long imprisonment; and since 1879 no judicial execution has taken place in Italy. After ten years of this practice, the Government and the parliamentary commission united in asking Parliament to enact a code which should formally do away with the death penalty. The discussion which followed was the most thorough and statesmanlike ever given to the subject.

The advocates of death as a punishment relied largely on the notion that this penalty is necessary and effectual to deter the criminal from the gravest crimes. They were answered by the largest historical induction ever applied to a question of legal policy. It was clearly shown by official records, that the threat of the severest punishment has failed to deter from crime, wherever it has been tried, and that where this plan has been abandoned, crime has not been encouraged thereby. The entire disuse of the death penalty in Italy, as in several other countries, has been followed by a marked diminution of capital offenses. In all civilized nations which retain the gallows, there is a steady increase in the proportion of the condemned who are finally executed; so that even in England, the judicial execution has increased, and that elsewhere, the popular mind, not one in five of the convicted murderers is put to death, while convictions are less than half as numerous, upon equal strength of proof, where the sentence must be death as where it will be imprisonment. In short, the death penalty in the law has practically no effect in preventing murder; and any deterrent effect it might in its nature have is wholly neutralized. In our modern age, the only possibility of inflicting it with absolute certainty. The result of the discussion was a large majority for the entire abolition of the death penalty.

Lottery Artifice.—How the lottery dupes are caught is illustrated by the failure of the attempt to make Mortimer J. Lyon, a retired plumber of Brooklyn, bait for their hook. He was visited by the agent of the lottery company, who asked nothing more of him than that he should accept $5,000, and then allow it to be published, and acknowledge it as a fact, that he had received $15,000 as a lottery prize. Said the man: "There is one prize of $15,000. We will give you $5,000 if you will give out to your friends that you have won $15,000, and make a little splurge over it and let it get into the papers. You are a popular man and it will be talked about." Mr. Lyon absolutely refused, saying he had too much respect for his character. The agent told him of a popular insurance clerk in Chicago who had accepted $5,000 on the same conditions. It seems that the trick is to allow no large prize to be taken, but to pay a man a handsome sum to pretend to have won it.—The Independent.

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 28, 1891.

There is scarcely any point of doctrine more clearly set forth in the Holy Scriptures than the antagonism between the religion of Christ and a worldly spirit. Our blessed Saviour said of his chosen Disciples, "They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." Self, like a strong man armed, keeps possession of the hearts of men, until a stronger than he—even the Spirit of Christ—casts him out and spoils his goods. This is a conflict through which all must pass, who would receive eternal life—for it is only those who come under the government of Christ while in this state of being, and become his obedient children, and are washed from their sins and impurities "by the Spirit of our God," that have a well-grounded assurance of admission into heaven when done with the things of time.

The Apostle John exhorts the believers: "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." And the teaching of the true ministers of the Gospel has always been in accordance with this—bearing testimony to the spiritual nature of true religion, against the evils and corruptions that existed; and calling upon their hearers to deny all unrighteousness, to take up their cross and follow Christ.

The Divine Power that accompanied the ministry of the early preachers of Christianity, and the blameless lives of their converts were greatly blessed. "The Lord added daily to the Church such as should be saved," and despite the persecutions to which they were exposed, the Christians became a numerous body, until finally the political power of the Roman empire passed into their hands.

At an early period in the history of the Church, Satan artfully endeavored to lessen its power for good, and even to convert it into an ally of his kingdom, by suggesting, that such a modification of its doctrines and practices as would render it less distasteful to the surrounding Pagans would greatly promote the increase of its nominal adherents. So it happened that the purity of the Church was soon contaminated by the introduction into its manner of worship of various features which had before belonged to the heathen temples. So that in the fourth and fifth centuries, as stated by Backhouse and Tylor, "the public worship of the Christians had approached perilously near to that of the ancient Greeks and Romans. Thus there were in both rituals, splendid robes, mitres, tiaras, croziers (identical with the titulus or crook of the augur), processions, illustrations, images, gold and silver vessels, and, in the course of the fifth century, incense.

The result of this was, that superstition partially took the place of true religious feeling, and the professing Church entered upon a long period of darkness and degeneracy, from which it is as yet only partially rescued.

Among the many reformers whom God raised up in modern times to proclaim anew the primitive truths of Christianity, George Fox and his co-laborers were among the most radical, in holding up to view the spiritual nature of religion—the intility of all outward observances—the necessity of knowing the Spirit of Christ—to take possession of our hearts, and bring everything into conformity to his holy and pure will, as the appointed means by which we are made fully to partake of that salvation graciously offered to mankind through the coming and sacrifice of Christ. These honest laborers in the Gospel did not dare to soften its requisitions so as to attract half-converted converts into their ranks. But even in matters of outward deportment, such as clothing, language and address, they adhered to the convictions of the spirit of Truth, although they were thereby exposed to great reproach, ridicule and even personal abuse. The Lord blessed their labors, so that in a short time, thousands were turned to the Truth through their testimony.

It is said that history repeats itself. The natural tendencies of the human heart remaining the same, it is not surprising to see similar fruits re-appearing in successive periods. Hence in some parts of our Society individuals appear, who wish to imitate their neighbors in partaking in the outward rites of water baptism, and what is termed the Lord's Supper, thus failing to bear testimony to our spiritual views, and the baptism of Christ is with the Holy Ghost and fire—and that the supper of the Lord is spiritual communion with Him. Others favor the appointment of specially selected persons, as pastors, to watch over the spiritual interests of the flock, and attach to the office duties which should be distributed among all the members—in a healthy state of the Church all ought to watch over each other for good.

In a recent visit to Baltimore, it was a satisfaction to see cause to believe that the members of that Yearly Meeting were generally clear of the errors and mistakes above alluded to. Yet it must be admitted that to a large extent they have practically dropped the ancient testimony of Friends to "plainness of speech, behavior and apparel." Not but what some of the older members still maintain these in their own practice; but they have in some places almost ceased to expect or to ask their younger members to adopt those peculiarities which would distinguish them from those around them. The acknowledged motive for this has been, the difficulty of inducing their younger members to submit to these restraints. There is among Friends of Baltimore a sincere concern for the spiritual growth and development of their young people, which commends itself to the feelings of an observer, although he may feel that they have made a mistake in lowering the standard in this respect, and have weakened their hands in opposing further inroads of a worldly spirit, which is opposed to the Cross of Christ.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The State Department received a cablegram from Consul General Crawford, at St. Petersburg, on the 21st inst., announcing that the Russian Government had issued a ukase, prohibiting the export of wheat from Russia.

There are about 30,000 locomotives in the United States—being one to every five miles of railroad—and 1,109,000 cars of all kinds, of which 27,000 are passenger coaches. The locomotives cost $450,000,000, the cars $800,000,000, making the approximate cost of the railroads about $1,500,000,000. Each year a freight engine hauls 35,000 tons, and a passenger engine pulls 60,000 passengers. These railways employ 725,000 persons, nearly all men, who provide a living for nearly 8,000,000 people, or about one-twentieth of the whole population.

They have reached Port Townsend, Washington, that the people of Alaska are about to demand some form of territorial government from Congress. The Juneau Morning Record, in a recent issue, advised the people "to rise as one man and unfurl the motto, 'Alaska for Alaskans,' to elect their own judicial officers, and resist all processes emanating from officials whose tenure of office is under organic act."

The South Dakota Railroad Commissioners met at Huron, on the 17th inst., to devise means to relieve the financial blockade, "which has been increasing in magnitude for the past two weeks." Every storage space is over and for the month of $292,407 in the mortgage indebtedness was made during the Tenth Month. For five months the net reduction of farm mortgage indebtedness in Eastern and Central Kansas was $2,300,000.

A Minneapolis dispatch says that the lumber season is over and that the cut for the year reaches 447,713,252 feet, 207,221,000 shingles and 97,267,000 lath. "This beats all records, and exceeds the output of 1890 by 103,138,890 feet of lumber, 45,003,500 shingles and 17,460,250 lath."

Deaths in this city last week numbered 40; which is 49 more than during the previous week, and 81 more than during the corresponding period of last year. Of the whole number, 219 were males and 97, 267 females; 52 died of consumption; 40 of pneumonia; 39 of diseases of the heart; 39 of diphtheria; 20 of Bright's disease; 18 of convulsions; 16 of cancer; 15 of bronchitis; 14 of apoplexy; 14 of marasmus; 14 of old age; 12 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 12 of cholera; 11 of cramp and 10 of inflammation of the brain.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 100; 4's, 116 1/2 a 117 1/2; currency, 8's, 111 a 121.

COTTON was quiet and unchanged. Sales on a basis of 8 1/2c per pound for middling uplands.

WHEAT.—Winter, in bulk, $20.25 a $21.00; spring, in bulk, $19.50 a $20.00.

FLOUR.—Western and Pennsylvania, super, $3.60 a $3.85; do. do., extras, $3.90 a $4.25; No. 2 winter family, $4.25 a $4.50; Pennsylvania, roller, straight, $4.50 a $4.75; Western winter, clear, $4.50 a $4.75; do. do., do., $4.75 a $4.90; winter patent, new, $5.00 a $5.25; Minnesota, clear, $4.65 a $4.90; do., straight, $4.90 a $5.10; do., patent, $5.15 a $5.40; do. do., favorite brands, $5.50. Rye flour moved slowly at $5.10 a $5.15 per barrel. Buckwheat flour was in fair demand and firm, at $2.10 a $2.20 per 100 pounds for new.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, $1.04 a $1.04 1/2.

No. 2 mixed corn, 67 a 67 1/2 cts.

No. 2 white oats, 39 1/2 a 40 cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, none here; good, 4 1/2 a 5 cts.; medium, 4 1/4 a 4 1/2 cts.; fair, 4 a 4 1/4 cts.; common, 3 1/2 a 3 3/4 cts.; culls, 3 a 3 1/2 cts.; Texans, 3 a 4 cts.; fat cows, 4 a 5 cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5 1/2 a 5 1/2 cts.; good, 4 1/2 a 5 cts.; medium, 4 1/4 a 4 1/2 cts.; common, 3 1/4 a 4 cts.; culls, 2 a 3 cts.; lambs, 4 a 6 1/2 cts.

HOGS.—5 1/2 a 6 cts. for Chicago, and 5 1/2 a 5 1/2 cts. for other Western.

A dispatch from London states that the European powers have determined to interfere and have sent the Chinese Government an ultimatum stating that unless adequate satisfaction was speedily obtained for the outrages against foreigners, the city of Shanghai and the river from it down to Woosung, in Central China, will be occupied by the foreign fleets until satisfaction is obtained. The business of Shanghai will go on as usual, but the receipts of the Custom House will be taken and held for the present. In addition the mouth of the Yangtze and as much of that river as may be thought necessary will be placed under British naval control.

Queen Regent Christina of Spain, has approved the appointments by Senor Canovas del Castillo, the Prime Minister, necessitated by the resignation of the Ministry, which took place on the 21st instant.

Influenza is spreading in France and Germany. The epidemic has closed several schools in the department of Gers, France, and one school in the Pere la Chaise quarter of Paris.

The epidemic has extended all over Berlin, where the painter Spangenburg, with many others, has succumbed to the disease. It is also very prevalent in Posen and West Prussia. The death rate in Hamburg for the last ten days of the weekly average, the increase being chiefly due to influenza.

The soldiers of the Odessa garrison have voluntarily asked that the daily bread ration issued to them be reduced one-third for the benefit of the starving people in the famine-stricken districts in Russia. Self-sacrifice for the benefit of the whole people is general among all classes of the public, and often takes novel forms.

During the nine years and six months preceding Twelfth Month, 1884, there had occurred in Japan, according to statements published in the Illustrated American, five hundred and fifty-three earthquakes, averaging one earthquake for every six days and six hours.

Sixty-six thousand men, women and children form the population of Iceland. All these good people are now in a state of great excitement through having a murder to deal with, the first to occur among them for fifty-six years. A young man killed his sweetheart.

A cablegram from Rio Janeiro, received in London on the 23d inst., states that Fonseca, Dictator of Brazil, has resigned in favor of Vice-President Peixoto. The Santiago correspondent of the Times says that, with the exception of the formal scrutiny by Congress, Admiral Montt was, on the 19th inst., unanimously elected President of Chili.

The new President's characteristics are modesty, firmness and taciturnity.

A translucent mineral substance, the color of amber and with the properties of asbestos, is reported to have been discovered in immense deposits in the United States of Colombia.

According to La Nature, there are about 1,500,000,000 people in the world, with very nearly an equal division of sex. One-fourth dies before the fifteenth year, and the average duration of life is about thirty-two to 40 years. Young men especially are invited to avail themselves of this opportunity of using this collection of books and periodicals without charge.

WANTED.—A young Friend desires a position as care taker of an elderly Friend.

Address, Box 285, West Grove, Pa.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY.—The Library will be open until further notice is given, on Fourth-day evenings from 7 to 10 o'clock. Young men especially are invited to avail themselves of this opportunity of using this collection of books and periodicals without charge.

DIED, Tenth Month 29th, 1891, at her residence, after a lingering illness which she bore with exemplary patience and resignation, Mrs. ELIZABETH COLLINS, in the sixty-fifth year of her age, a member of Barnegat Particular and Little Egg Harbor Monthly Meetings of Friends (N. J.). She was of a retiring disposition, having an humble opinion of herself, saying but little of her religious experience. But when sensible she was nearing the close, said "she had not been a sufferer for so long a time without a preparation to be ready for the change."

—, at her residence in West Chester, Pa., on the 13th of Eleventh Month, 1891, Srs. A. W. and M. NORRIS TEMPLER, aged nearly eighty-five years. This dear Friend possessed, in a remarkable degree, a sweet, gentle, loving spirit. A short time before her decease, and when in about usual health, she said, "that she was daily concerned to know a preparation for the day of death, and that she had never met any heavenly things." The end came suddenly, but quietly and peacefully. She often repeated the farewell words of our blessed Saviour, "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you, not as the world giveth, give I unto you." Let not your heart be troubled, and do not fear, for I, Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Selections from the Journal of William Evans.

1846.—"Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting being held this week, E. Pitfield, my wife and myself went over to it. That on Fifth-day was pretty large, many young and middle-aged Friends being there. Very unlooked for, the declaration of the prophet Jeremiah, in relation to the Jews forsaking the Fountain of living water, and heaving out cisterns that could hold no water, was brought before me. There was a quickening virtue accompanied, and after some waiting, it appeared proper to rise with it, and to declare that it described the cause of all our difficulties. I was led to show the process of the work of regeneration, commenced by the inhaling of the light of Christ in man's dark heart; its convictions for sin; and, as yielded to, its making an entire change in him. Nothing could begin and carry on this work, but the Author and Finisher of the saints' faith; and the Lord would not give his glory to any of man's devices. Nothing is fit to receive the water of life, but regenerated souls, sanctified vessels in the Lord's house; and if we changed our glory for that which profiteth not; heaving out cisterns that can hold no water, desolation would overspread the Society. The language of affectionate entreaty was held out to the young people, to enlist under Christ's banner, and to follow Him in the way of the cross. The work is the Lord's, and He alone can carry it on: before whom we are bound to bow in reverent thankfulness for the least of his mercies, and with prayer and supplication, as the Spirit gives ability, to ask Him for the continuance of his preserving power, and for wisdom and strength to serve Him, in the Gospel of his dear Son. I returned to the city, leaving my wife to make some visits she has had on her mind a long time."

"Being First-day, at our meeting, I was led to extend a renewed call to those who were seeking their ease and enjoyment in the comforts of life, and in great danger of forgetting their Heavenly Father, the bountiful Giver of all we have. Some who had set out, with very humble views and desires, in relation to earthly possessions, may let go their exercise when things, through industry, grow lighter, and they are released from the anxiety they once felt about the means of subsistence. When this takes place, the eye which once saw, may be again blinded, and the lively sense they once had of the importance of the cause of Christ, above everything else, may be gradually blunted; and then when we meet for the solemn act of Divine worship, the things of the world bring a stupor over the meeting, and the great object of coming together is almost altogether frustrated in some. I hoped that through the tender mercy of the Shepherd of Israel, there was a little of his quickening power felt. The warning, and yet confiding language of the apostle was brought into view, 'Oh death where is thy sting? Oh grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.' The awful period will arrive to every one, when, above everything else, it will be of the utmost consequence to be able in truth, and in our own experience, to adopt that language. But only through obedience to the Lord Jesus, can we know this victory, and be enabled to thank God for it."

"Our beloved friend Hannah L. Smith, a minister, died last week and was buried to-day. Attending the burial, I felt impelled to preach Christ crucified and glorified, and also appearing by his Spirit in the heart. I reminded the company, that the period would arrive to them, when, if they had a right understanding, it would be the most desirable thing to realize the testimony of the beloved disciple, that those who had come out of great tribulation, and washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, should hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat. "For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne, shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." This would be of the greatest importance to us at the day of account, whether rich or poor; and we must all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ, to give an account of the deeds done in the body. Then, all the riches and gratification, the honor and pomp of this world, would be lighter than a feather, in comparison with that exceeding and eternal weight of glory, which would be revealed to the saints in light. I declared that Christ took upon Him the body prepared of the Father, to do his will in, and offered himself a most holy and satisfactory sacrifice for the sins of the world; that He suffered for our sins, the just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God. But it was only as we opened the door of our hearts and let Him come in; and witnessed Him to sit as a refiner's fire, and as a fuller with soap, removing all impurity, washing us in the laver of regeneration, and renewing us by his Holy Spirit, that we could know our garments made white in his precious blood, and experience our past sins to be blotted out; having on the wedding garment, and being accepted in Him, the Beloved. I spake from the necessity laid upon me; my mouth being opened almost before I was aware."

"I have been let down into a low state, so that faith seemed ready to fail. These dispensations of the withdrawing of all sense of Divine good, have a very reducing effect upon self-importance; and teach us true charity and tenderness towards those who are in affliction, and those who may be wrong. I was brought to cry for mercy, and then to examine whether I had desired that mercy might be showed to others, as I desired it shown to myself. I believe I have craved it even for many, who I apprehended, had neither been nor done what they ought. But this state of seemingly entire desertion by our Heavenly Father, is a bitter cup to drink. May I be more humble, more steadily fearful of getting off the watch unto prayer, and more constant in resisting a light spirit, which would take its ease and indulgence on the sabbath day. We cannot pray when we please, but it is our duty to watch, and to wait for the pouring forth of the spirit of supplication, which produces a broken heart, and a contrite spirit; and enables us to cry availingly to God for mercy, and for help to keep us from falling, through his dear Son, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

"In our evening meeting, the essential importance of knowing the Lord Jesus revealed in our own hearts, and not only believing in the record of the Holy Scripture, in relation to his coming and suffering in the flesh, but also receiving Him in his spiritual, inward appearance, to break every yoke, and prepare the soul for the Lord God, by his spirit, to dwell in, was opened and enforced. Many can say much respecting Him, and what He has done for us, without us, who yet seem determined to keep Him without them; while they judge and condemn those who plead for the inward and spiritual knowledge of God and Christ, as well as for a full belief of all that He has done for us, in the prepared body; and as our Mediator and Intercessor with the Father."

1847.—Second Month 4th. "I attended Abington Quarterly Meeting, held at Germantown. In the meeting for discipline of the general meeting, I was enabled to invite the young men to be faithful to the manifestations of the Light of Christ, and they would feel themselves bound to maintain the doctrines and testimonies of the Gospel held by Friends, whosoever they went, both great and small. Hereby they would be prepared for service in the church, and be constrained in our meetings for discipline, to speak a word in the authority of Truth, at the Master's bidding, to the business before their meetings. They would feel it a religious duty to support the discipline, and to stand for the blessed cause, entrusted to our Society to uphold in the world."

"Third Month. On the 28th, being First-day, I went to the Northern District Meeting, feeling a particular draft there; and was led to treat upon the beginning and growth of true religion in the heart; which is through obedience to the requisitions of the blessed Saviour, made known there. Also to show the numbing, stupefying effects of a constant pursuit of riches; in which the extraordinary talents bestowed upon man, by an all-wise and beneficent Creator, are prostituted to inferior objects; so that he finally loves and serves the creature, himself and his temporal acquisitions, instead of the Creator. Thus the great and noble purpose for which he was made, to glorify God, is lost sight of, and altogether neglected. There was also a cup of consolation and encouragement to the sincere in heart, to keep their trust in the Lord alone; who never was foiled in battle; but whose omnipotent arm is round about to preserve, and will carry through and over all opposition, those who look to and confide in, and follow Him faithfully to the end.

"31st. I attended the Western District Meeting; and after some time of silent waiting, it opened to me, to show the way by which we come to obtain peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ; to wit, by denying ourselves, taking up the cross, and obeying his commands, as He makes them known to us by his Spirit. No device of ours will be taken as a substitute. God will not give his glory to any other, but to his well-beloved Son, whom He hath given for salvation to the end of the earth; and if we are saved, it will be by Him, and that by doing his will. To these He gives the reward of true peace, for every sacrifice and service, which is performed by his direction. The Lord helped me, by his saving strength, to preach the Gospel of life and salvation, through Christ Jesus, both in the flesh as He walked among men, and in the Spirit, as He appears in our hearts by his light and grace, to the tendering of some present, and to my own peace and comfort. Blessed forever be his great and glorious name and power! He still condescends to the low estate of his poor unworthy creatures; lifts them up at times out of their depressed conditions; gives them the oil of joy for mourning, and shows to them, that He has not forgotten to be gracious; unworthy as they are of the least of his mercies."

The Religious Value of a Quiet Hour.

The evangelists have recorded several instances in which Jesus retired from the distracting turmoil of his life into the solitary places of communion with God. We see Him after a busy day, while the multitudes are streaming away to their homes and caravans, climbing to some distant hill-top to pray. There, under the canopy of night, in the solitude and stillness, his heart built its sacred altar of prayer, and offered its sacrifices of praise. There He threw off his burdens of care, and took the refreshment and rest of a still hour in communion with his Father.

Christian people of this age might profit much from the study of that inner life of Jesus into which such incidents give us a glimpse. The conditions of our time are unfavorable to such hours of meditation and devotion. Everything goes with a rush. Nothing is so grand as a throng. In the Middle Ages, quiet, and even seclusion, were thought to be the conditions most favorable to religious edification and growth. Then the church built cloisters and monasteries away from the thoroughfares of men, where "the many were coming and going." Now she pitches her mammoth tents where the throngs are assembled. The medieval idea which culminated in monasticism was an extreme idea. Men need not sever themselves from their fellows, and go into seclusion in order to grow in knowledge and in grace. But it is to be remembered that the temper of our busy, bustling age may carry us to an opposite extreme. It is possible to give to the religious life a sort of hurrying activity which will tend to superficiality, if not supplemented by the use of the quiet hour of meditation and devotion. The abundance of our agencies of religious instruction, and the demands for stir and action on our part, will be in danger, without such reflection as the still hour insures, of coming in between the soul and God and of obscuring the sense of the soul's relation to God, and so of hindering, more than helping, to communion with Him.

There is so much preaching and teaching about God, so many books, so much religious reading, so much doctrine and argument and theology! These are all useful for their purpose, but it should not be thought that the use of any of these helps is the real essence of the life of religion. If they are so regarded, they hinder the simplicity of our piety, and dull our sense of the immediate relation of God to our spirits. One great division of Christendom finds a serious objection to the worship of another part in the fact that it introduces images and symbols and priestly mediations between the soul and God. But, certainly, these are not the only media which are capable of such misuse. Without the constantly quickened consciousness of the spiritual realities of religion, the very best means and agencies of religious instruction and impression may become ends beyond which our thoughts do not rise, and so be turned into checks and hindrances to real aspiration and devotion.

"The souls of the great 'men of religion' in ancient Israel dwelt under an intense sense of God's immediate nearness. They saw his work in nature; we see electricity and gravity. They saw his handiwork in the heavens; we see astronomy and algebraic equations. Thus our very study of the works of God may concentrate our thought so much on the product of his wisdom and might as to withdraw it from Him as the personal, living Creator. Without a thoughtful use of them the same might prove true of God's revelation in the Scriptures. We are to see God in and through the Bible. It is given to bring God nearer to our thought and apprehension. If we resort to it merely or chiefly in search of doctrines and theology, instead of in search of the living God who speaks in them, it will become to us an end in itself, instead of a means of revealing God and of bringing us nigh to Him.

Nothing will more surely save us from such perversions than the use of periods of quiet for meditation and rest in God. What an warmth and zest it would give to our practical piety! We break the law of spiritual growth, and fail to learn one of the lessons of Jesus' life, if we do not take such hours. No Christian has a right to undertake so much, and to be so busy, that he cannot, at least occasionally, take them. They give spiritual refreshment, and a firmer, steadier hand and a warmer heart for every task.

Above all, we can in such hours see our Saviour more clearly. God is not in the thunder of popular clamor, nor in the earthquake of excitement and tumult, so often as He is in the still small voice that speaks to the heart in its secret communications. In the heart's own holy of holies is the true shekinah of his presence who dwells no more in temples made with hands.

CHALLENGE.—Calling upon a man who has hurt your feelings to give you satisfaction by shooting you through the body.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Eastern Shore of Chesapeake Bay.

The Epistle from Maryland in 1756 notes with thankfulness the edifying labors of several ministers who had visited them at the time of the Yearly Meeting, but acknowledges a deficiency in their meetings, "in regard to our ancient testimony against priest hire."

The Epistle from Philadelphia encourages their brethren to the faithful support of our Christian Discipline, particularly that "against the support of an anti-Christian hireling ministry. It states that during the time of ease and tranquility which Friends had latterly enjoyed "there hath been too great a deviation in many from that simplicity, spirituality and purity (the peculiar ornaments of our profession) which our ancestors were preserved in through severe persecutions." It alludes again to a "day of distress and probation that appears to be advancing fast upon us." And it mentions that out of a feeling of sympathy with those of their members residing on the frontiers, they had provided a fund for the relief of such of their brethren as might need it.

In 1756, a committee which had been appointed to visit the Monthly Meetings made a report, in which they say, "that taking into consideration the distressed state of the frontier settlements of these provinces, and that we have just grounds to apprehend many of our Friends who are now situate in parts immediately exposed to danger, may soon stand in need of relief and assistance, and for want of a timely care and provision being made, may in the approaching winter suffer deeply,"—for these reasons they recommended that the Yearly Meeting raise a sum of one thousand pounds, the distribution of which should be referred to a committee composed of twelve Friends living in or near Philadelphia, for the convenience of getting soon together, to be nominated by the Yearly Meeting and that the several Quarterly Meetings be recommended each to appoint four Friends to represent them. The committee thus constituted is to "hear and consider the cases of any Friends under suffering, especially such as suffer from the Indians or other enemy. Other duties were also assigned to this body, especially to represent the Yearly Meeting in the intervals between its sessions. This body was found so useful and convenient that it has been continued from that time, without interruption, under the well-known name of the Meeting for Sufferings.

The Epistle from Maryland in 1757 states, that there do not appear to be any of their members on the frontiers of the province that were in need of relief at that time. It contains a sorrowful acknowledgment that the payment of priests' wages is "too much complied with."

The reply from Philadelphia thus refers to this subject: "We apprehend that a faithful maintenance of our Christian testimony against that anti-Christian yoke is our indispensable duty, founded on the precepts of Christ, the doctrines of the apostles, and the nature and tenor of the Gospel dispensation."

The Epistle from Maryland in 1759 refers to slavery, and says: "Many among us are sensible of this iniquitous practice. And we with thankfulness have to inform, that a concern is revived and rests on the minds of some Friends to guard as much as possible against being any way concerned in the importation or purchase of them; and those we have by inheritance or otherwise, we hope Friends will be careful to use in a tender and conscientious manner."

The reply to this epistle thus refers to the subject of slavery: "The particular exercise you mention that some of your members are under, to discourage that iniquitous practice of enslaving our fellow-creatures, is matter of rejoicing to us, and we desire the number of such may be increased."

The Epistle from Maryland in 1760 acknowledges "great remissness and neglect in many in observing our ancient testimony against the anti-Christian yoke of tithes."

The Epistle to Maryland in 1761 quotes the command of our Saviour, "To do unto all men as we would they should do unto us;" and then adds, "We desire that, all temporal considerations laid aside, you may impartially consider whether so many of you as are possessed of negro slaves are not living in the breach thereof, thereby bringing a wound on their own souls, and cause of stumbling to the enquirers after the way to Zion."

The Epistle from Maryland in 1762 expresses the belief that many Friends have been much distressed in their minds with regard to keeping slaves. But have a comfortable hope raised in us, that all who truly wait on the Most High for wisdom will be favored to clear their own consciences in that respect."

The reply to this epistle expresses the belief, that as the feeling of distress on account of slavery is abode under, "light will increase, whereby we may see, that no former precedent from men can justify any of us now in continuing a conduct so absolutely opposite to that weighty injunction of our Lord and Saviour, "Do unto all men, as ye would they should do unto you."

In this epistle (as also in that to Virginia) a paragraph was inserted cautioning against settling on lands "in the purchase of which the native owners may not have been fully considered."

The Epistle from Maryland in 1764 "heartily desires that the concern on account of the poor captives among us may increase, which we are of the mind it will, if Truth is eyed enough therein, for it is with sorrow of heart that many of us do behold that unchristian practice."

"And we have to inform you (with thankfulness to our Heavenly Father) that many among us begin to see the inconsistency of contributing to a hireling ministry, and are made willing to suffer for the same."

It informs that they had appointed a committee to confer with Friends of Philadelphia "on account of this meeting being joined to that of Philadelphia."

The reply to this epistle mentions the satisfaction with which the account had been received, of the growth of a testimony against hireling ministry, and in reference to slavery, says: "A righteous testimony is gradually spreading and rising higher against every branch of the practice of buying, selling or keeping slaves." One paragraph of this epistle refers to the excitement caused by the murder of the Conestoga Indians, and the march to Philadelphia of the "Paxton Boys"—an excitement which induced many young Friends in and around the city to take arms to check the progress of this numerously-inclined mob. It says: "We think it necessary to inform you that the conduct of those of our religious profession who deviated from our peaceable principles in the time of the late commotion in Philadelphia by bearing of arms, appears to be under the notice and care of Friends there; and after much deliberation thereon we have been deeply baptized into the suffering state of that Monthly Meeting, and hope strength and confirmation will be administered to them to persevere in the discharge of their duty with Christian charity and zeal, in the spirit of meekness and wisdom."

Of this Conestoga massacre, Bowden, in his history of Friends in America, gives the following account:

"The massacres that had taken place during the late war, had raised in the minds of most of the settlers on the frontiers, a strong feeling of hatred towards the Indians, and also towards those who were supposed to be advocates of Indian rights, or friendly towards them, more especially Friends. In no part was this feeling more conspicuous than in Lancaster County, where also some unyielding discourses of a sort of zealots, chiefly Presbyterians from the north of Ireland, added religious fanaticism to the already excited passions of the people. At Conestoga in this county there resided a small remnant of an Indian tribe. They had always preserved an inviolate friendship with the settlers, and had lived in harmony and good will with those in their own immediate neighborhood. Their numbers had, however, gradually dwindled, and in 1763 their community consisted of but twenty individuals. In the Twelfth Month of this year, a band of cruel fanatics came to their village, with the avowed intention of destroying them, to avenge the whites slain on the frontier, and to extirpate, as they declared, the heathen from the land, that the saints might inherit the earth. The ruffians were all armed, and, surrounding the Indian huts, they fell upon the defenceless inmates, and murdered, in cold blood, three men, two women and a boy, being all that happened then to be at home. After the massacre, the murderers set fire to the huts."

"The news of this dreadful act produced great sensation in the province, and a proclamation was issued, calling upon the officers, both civil and military, to exert themselves in bringing the perpetrators to justice. No inconsiderable number of the inhabitants of the county of Lancaster abetted this wicked proceeding, and with this encouragement, in about two weeks after a similar band of ruffians actually rode into the town of Lancaster, and in full day, broke open the workhouse, where the remaining fourteen Indians were placed for protection, and deliberately put them all to death. But the wickedness of these lawless destroyers did not stop here; they even attempted to murder all the Indians within their reach, and, understanding that some of them had fled to Philadelphia for protection, they determined to march on to the city, to carry out their dreadful designs. Their numbers were formidable, amounting to between two and three hundred, and they advanced as far as Germantown, threatening death, not only to the officers of the Government, but also to some prominent members of the Society of Friends. On the emergency, the governor called a public meeting; a large number of citizens enrolled themselves for the common defence; cannon were planted to command the principal streets; and the ferries on the Schuylkill were put in a state of defence."

"The determination of the citizens of Philadelphia to resist these wretched men by force of arms, caused them to hesitate in their mad career, and on reaching Germantown they contented themselves by forwarding to the governor a detail of their alleged grievances."

(To be continued.)

Consider not what might have been done, but what is now to be done.

The New Lake in California.

In explaining the formation of this lake, filled by the waters of the Colorado River, J. W. Powell, of the United States Geological Survey, in a valuable article in Scribner's Magazine, says: "We may regard the Cordilleran system as a great plateau, of unequal height in different parts, and everywhere bearing upon its surface a system of mountain ridges, small or large. Toward the southwest it slopes downward beneath the Pacific Ocean, and one of the great ranges on its back stands partly upon the land and partly upon a shoal of the ocean, constituting the peninsula of California. The trough left between it and the next ridge to the east, lies partly upon the land and partly beneath the water, and this submerged part, to the southward, is marked by the Gulf of California. The Colorado River enters the great trough on its east side, two or three hundred miles from its head, and has built, from the mud and sand that it drives along, a conical plain or delta that stretches quite across the trough, dividing it into two portions. The southerly portion, still filled with salt water, is the modern gulf; the northern portion, thus partitioned off by the river delta, is the Coahuila Basin."

"The material of the delta comes from far away. In the mountains of Colorado, Wyoming and Utah, far to the northeast, the frost of winter, burrowing in the crevices of the rocks, loosens them so that they fall asunder. By the storms of summer the fragments are tumbled into the torrents, and by them are dragged along and worn as they go, into pebbles, sand and mud. Hundreds of mountain torrents unite to form a score of rivers which course through the cañons of the great mesa region and finally unite to form the Colorado itself, which travels for hundreds of miles through the grandest cañon of all, before escaping to full daylight. Through these channels the debris from the mountains is transported to be added to the delta at the river's mouth. But the river has a long history, and it has not merely transported the debris from the sculpture of mountains; it has itself carved the mighty gorges through which it runs, and its branches have carved their gorges, and from the surface of the mesa there have been degraded thousands of feet of rock, and all of this material, sufficient for the building of hundreds of mountain ranges, has been carried away by the river and thrown into the sea. The visible mound at the river's mouth represents but a trivial fraction of the whole work of the river, and the wonder is not that it has built so much, but whither it has carried the product of its earliest work."

"In the building of the delta the river does not flow continuously in one course. As its current is slackened on approaching the sea, it is no longer able to move forward the detritus with which it is loaded, and a portion is dropped to the bottom. Another portion is carried forward to the edge of the delta and falls to the bottom in still water, extending the delta front. As the delta front is built out, the bottom of the river channel is built up, and there comes a time when the river channel is higher than portions of the delta on each side. When the course it follows to the sea is not so short as a course which might be chosen to one side, then at the time of some great flood the river bursts its banks and chooses a new and shorter channel along a lower line. This line of channel is in turn built up until the river's course is no longer stable, and it is shifted to a new site. Thus in turn the river visits all parts of the delta, building them up in succession. Quite commonly, too, its current is divided, and the partial channels sometimes interlock so as to form a plexus over the area of the delta. The bayous of the Mississippi are such a plexus, and every crevasse that bursts a levee is an effort of the river to escape from the high-lying channel to which man would confine it and find its way to the ocean by a shorter course along a lower line. The Hoang Ho, whose history is known for 2,500 years, has in that period shifted on its delta scores of times, and the extreme positions occupied by its mouth are 460 miles apart. As the delta at the mouth of the Colorado bridges the great trough from side to side, and as the river in the building of the delta has shifted its course from place to place, it cannot be that it has always, as now, flowed southward to the Gulf. Part of the time it must have turned westward to the Coahuila Basin. Whenever it has turned in that direction it has filled the basin, making a lake twenty-five miles broad and nearly one hundred miles in length, with a depth of 250 feet. Whenever it has turned to the southward, the lake, having no other perennial tributary, has dried away, leaving the basin as we know it now.

"The fact that such a lake has existed was discovered before its relation to the Colorado River was known, for on the floor of the desert were found the dried shells of innumerable mollusks, such as live in the waters of fresh lakes."

"Where water does not run, the delta of the river is a desert, so inhospitable that it has been but imperfectly explored. The channel along its margin, formed by the water outflowing from the Coahuila Lake, has been discovered, and is known as Hardy's Colorado. A number of abandoned channels of the delta, called by the frontiersmen 'sloughs,' although destitute of water, have been discovered and partially traced, and one of these leading toward the Coahuila Valley is called New River. Through this a temporary discharge takes place whenever the river at the flood stage reaches an exceptional height, and the resulting shallow lake in the bottom of the valley this year is but a repetition of similar occurrences known by tradition.

"The fine earth which floors the flat bottom of the valley is saline, a fact not difficult to understand, for whatever salt may be contained in the partial floods that come from the Colorado is thus entrapped. It cannot escape to the air with the evaporating water, but remains as a crust where the last of the water dries away.

"We have seen how the basin was formed, and how it lies below the level of the sea because it is, in fact, a portion of the sea-bed partitioned off."

BAIT.—One animal impaled upon a hook, in order to torture a second for the amusement of a third. Were the latter to change places, for a single day, with either of the two former, which might generally be done with very little loss to society, it would enable him to form a better notion of the pastime he is in the habit of pursuing.—N. B. To make some approximation towards strict retributive justice, he should gorge the bait, and his tormentor should have all the humanity of an experienced angler.

BANDIT.—An ungalvanized soldier, who is hanged for doing that which would get him a commission and a medal, had he taken the king's money [enlisted as a soldier], instead of that of travellers.

SELECTED.
THE MORNING BREAKETH.

Baron Von Canitz, a German nobleman, who lived in the latter half of the seventeenth century, was distinguished both for talent and purity of character. When the dawn broke into his sick chamber on the last morning of life he desired to be removed to the widow, and once more behold the rising sun. After a time he broke forth in the following language, "O! If the appearance of this earthly and created thing is so beautiful and so quickening, how much more shall I be enraptured at the sight of the unspeaking glory of the Creator himself!"

He was the author of the following exquisite lines which, their translation into English, fail to convey the deep melody of the original:

Come, my soul, thou must be waking—
Now is breaking
Of the earth another day.
Come to Him who made this splendor,
See thou render
All thy feeble powers can pay.

From the stars thy course be learning;
Dinly burning
'Neath the sun their light grows pale;
So let all that sense delighted
While benighted
From God's presence fade and fail.

Lo! how all of breath partaking,
Gladly waking,
Hail the sun's enlivening light!
Plants, whose life mere sap doth nourish,
Rise and flourish,
When He breaks the shades of night.

Thou, too, hail the light returning,
Ready burning,
Be the incense of thy powers;
For the night is safely ended;
God hath cared
With his tend'ring thy helpless honors.

Frey that He may prosper ever
Each endeavor,
For thy high aim is good and true;
But that He may ever thwart thee,
And convert thee,
When thou evil would'st pursue.

Think that He thy ways beholdeth,
His unfeeling
Every fault that lurks within;
Every stain of shame glossed over
Can discover,
And discern each deed of sin.

Fetter'd to the fleeting hours,
To Him all powers,
Vain and brief, are borne away;
Time, my soul, thy spirit is steering,
Onward veering,
To the gulf of death a prey.

May'st thou, then, on life's last morrow,
Free from sorrow,
Pass away in slumber sweet;
And, released from death's dark sadness,
Rise in gladness,
That far brighter sun to greet.

Only God's free gift abuse not,
His light refuse not,
But still his Spirit's voice obey;
Soon shall joy thy brow be wreathing,
Splendor breathing
Fairer than the fairest day.

If aught of care thee this morn oppress thee,
To Him address thee,
Who, like the sun, is good to all;
He girds the mountain tops, the white
His gracious smile
Will on the humblest valley fall.

Round the gifts his bounty show's,
Walls and tow'rs
Girt with flames thy God shall rear,
Angel legions to defend thee
Shall attend thee,
Hosts whom Satan's self shall fear.

WITHIN.

Within the circling storm there is a centre
Of perfect rest;
Within the cloud we so much fear to enter
Are visions blest.

Within the husk the harvest lies enfolded;
The chaff falls dead,
But the sweet life the summer months have molded
Becomes our bread.

Within the bark, all rough and deeply wrinkled,
Flow liquid streams,
Bearing a thousand flowers with perfume sprinkled—
The sun's bright beams.

Within the shell are wings, and songs unspoken,
A perfect bird;
All useless wings until the shell be broken,
And songs unheard!

Within, the spirit dwells—the outer letter
Is not the whole;
'Tis but the body, or at times a fetter
Binding the soul.

Within the veil, beyond this world's pollution,
Are seas of light,
Giving to each enigma its solution—
The perfect sight!

A NOTE UPON THE LATE STRIKE AT MILLVILLE.—At the glass-works of Whittall, Tatum & Co., in Millville, New Jersey, the lads who tend or wait upon the blowers, went on a strike a few days ago, because the firm saw fit to employ some boys of the Jewish race. Backed no doubt by some mischief-makers among their elders, the juvenile strikers held a meeting and passed resolutions declaring that they would not work with the Jew boys, and, as the trade was brisk, asking also for a ten per cent. increase in their wages. The firm at once closed their factories, and three thousand men and boys were thrown out of employment. This condition of affairs continued about five days, when the boys went back to work.

Without having had any consultation with the firm or their employees relative to the matter, I would nevertheless characterize it as a very ill-advised strike. I believe the foundations of this business-house to have been laid in righteousness, and not in the desire for mere money-getting; and I trust that a large measure of the same purity, integrity, straightforwardness and fair dealing which controlled the daily life of the late John M. Whittall, continues to animate his business successors.

If I rightly recollect what was told to me, it was when captain of an East Indian man that the heart of J. M. Whittall was savingly drawn to his God, whom thereafter he endeavored to acknowledge in all his ways. Later, entering into the glass business, he encountered a severe reverse, which threatened to take away all that he possessed; but, his creditors refusing to accept the full amount of their claims, he resumed, was abundantly successful, and soon was enabled to pay in full all that he had owed. When chosen president of the Board of Guardians of the Poor, the management of the Blockley Almshouse had grown to be so loose and corrupt, that self-respecting citizens did not care to connect themselves with it. J. M. Whittall, however, accepted the position from a sense of duty, and, with the co-operation of some of his associates, succeeded in winning for the management a better name. It is related that he had been known to kneel in prayer at the business meetings of the Board, for Divine help to administer the trust with wisdom and faithfulness. It was his daily habit, in the early morning, after rising, and again before retiring to rest at night, to visit in retirement before the Lord.

The firm are so far believers in the principle of total abstinence from intoxicants, that they refuse to fill any orders for bottles, &c., to be used for holding whiskey or other strong liquor intended to be used as a beverage. I understand that they have refused orders amounting to many thousands of dollars, through adherence to this principle. And now at a time when the demand for glass jars was almost unprecedented, owing to the exceeding abundance of fruits of every kind, it is gratifying to know that they were willing to entirely stop work and to risk the loss of very large profits, rather than acquiesce in the demand to turn fourteen little Jew boys away from their works. The little episode of the "Judenhetz" at Millville, had signally failed, and, it is to be hoped, will not be tried again in this latitude.—Josiah W. Leeds, in Christian Statesman.

SCRIPTURE ILLUSTRATIONS.—"Casting . . . Gifts into the Treasury."—The connection in thought with the warning immediately preceding, in chapter 20, is very close. We have an example of the humility of almsgiving in contrast with the ostentation of the Pharisees; of self-sacrifice in contrast with their self-seeking; of charity in contrast with their greed. The "treasury" was a series of thirteen large chests, in the Court of the Women. These chests were, from their shape, called trumpets, and the alms in each were appropriated to distinct purposes: but all connected with the temple worship. The shopharoth, as these alms-boxes were named, bore inscriptions, stating whether the alms were for certain sacrifices, or to procure incense, wood, or for other gifts. One of them was in a chamber called "the silent," where gifts were distributed in Israel to the children of the pious poor. The gifts of the rich Jews were enormous. Josephus tells us, at the time of Pompey and Crassus, the temple treasury, after lavishly defraying all expenses, contained in money nearly half a million English pounds, or two and a-half million dollars, and precious vessels to the value of nearly two millions sterling. Yet the rabbis were clear in their teaching as to the value of the offerings of the poor. Thus one of the essays of the Mishna closes with the words, "Alike as regards burnt offerings of beasts and those of fowls, and the meat offering, we find the expression, 'for a sweet savor' to teach us that to offer much or to offer little is the same, provided only that a man direct mind and heart towards God."

In the city of modern Rome, at the foot of the Capitoline Hill, adjoining the ruined Forum, is a deep, dark and terrible dungeon, called the "Mamertine Prison." It consisted originally of two vaulted chambers, one above the other, excavated in the rock of the ancient hill. The upper dungeon was far below the surface of the ground—the lower deep of the one beneath, could be entered only through a small circular opening in the stone floor of the one above; as a man might descend into a well by a rope. No window or loop-hole was left for the fresh air to enter into that dread abode. The floor, the walls, the roof are all of stone—damp, dark and cold. That terrible dungeon was hollowed out of the rock 2500 years ago.

It is said the Apostle Paul was confined in the lower dungeon when he sent his last message of love and counsel to his young friend and disciple Timothy.—Daniel March.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Reply to an Enquiry Regarding the Ministry.

Why is it that there exists not among Friends as powerful and as reaching a ministry as in the earlier days of the Society?

Faithful Friends, who have the true welfare of Israel to heart, have often been seriously led to the consideration of this query.

In replying thereto, there are three parties concerned—the Lord, his under shepherds, and his flock.

That the Lord enargeth not, that his mercy endureth forever, that the bowels of his love and compassion fail not, that He willeth not that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance, and by the drawing cords of his love leadeh men thereto; that his ear is not heavy that it cannot hear, nor his arm shortened that it cannot save, we cannot question. The tender sympathies of a Saviour, himself made perfect through suffering, who is touched with a feeling of our infirmities, and afflicted in all our afflictions, is surely enough for us that it is not his will, who suffered for our sins, who ascended on high leading captivity captive, and who gave gifts unto men, that these precious gifts be held in abeyance, or their lustre be dimmed.

[While we gladly and reverently believe that the Lord is good and that his mercy endureth forever, yet experience shows that there are seasons when to human vision it seems more abundantly manifested than at other times. There come times of peculiar visitation both to individuals and to the church; when it pleases the Lord to raise up ministers endowed in an unusual degree with power and wisdom. In considering the question with which this article commences, this variation in the Divine dispensations must not be overlooked.—Ed.]

The question then remains to be answered by the second party to the covenant, "the ministers and hearers of the Word."

The minister of the Word, under the New Covenant dispensation, is not a mere minister of the letter, that is of the words of Truth as contained in the Holy Scriptures, and which man, by his own wisdom, in a manner may encompass, but one who receives power from above, to quicken the dead, strengthen the weak, heal the sick, and confirm the faithful. He is a minister of the "Gospel which is the power of God to salvation to every one that believeth," neither is this power placed in subjection to the power and will of the man, to be used when and where and in whatsoever manner he listeth, but is described by the Lord, who promised, and now sendeth it, to be like "the wind (that) bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit." John iii: 8. The power is not vested inherently in the man, but is all of Christ, and it is as the faithful commissioned servant diligently followeth his Divine Master, that the promise of his Lord is verified, "where I am, there shall also my servant be." John xii: 26.

Paul, the Apostle, says, "We have this treasure, in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us." Now these earthen vessels are by the law of the house to be broken after every service. Lev. vi: 28. And well did he know what it was to have this "strength made perfect in weakness."

The Apostles who for three years had accompanied the Lord on earth, who knew and believed the true history of Christ's crucifixion and glorious ascension, and who after his resurrection from the dead, had verbally received this Divine commission, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature," were yet commanded "to tarry in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high" (Luke xxiv: 49), which they did; when on the day of Pentecost, the promised spirit came in power, "As a sound from heaven, as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the place where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues, like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance." Acts ii: 2-4. The Apostle Peter, speaking under this Divine inspiration, declared that this was what the prophet Joel foretold, when God said, "I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh" (Acts ii: 16, 17), and that this effusion of the spirit was but the first fruits of the more bountiful harvest of souls to follow and which was to continue throughout the dispensation of these hot days, is evident by what Peter says, "For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call." v: 39.

This speaking as the Spirit giveth utterance, became a standing ordinance in the Lord's church, as a divinely appointed means whereby the members may edify one another in their most holy faith. And that this dependence on the openings of the Spirit of Truth, and of utterance given by Him was adhered to in the Church of Christ in apostolic times, is plain.

The Apostle Paul prayed for the Thessalonian Church, that "the Lord might direct their heart into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for Christ." 2 Thess. iii: 5. The Apostle Peter, after referring to the gift of the ministry, commands that they were to "minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God. If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God; if any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth, that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ, to whom be praise and dominion for ever and ever." 1 Pet. iv: 10, 11.

Now as the great glory of this dispensation of the New Covenant which God hath made with his people through Christ, is that God may dwell amongst his sanctified people, and teach them himself, it is said to them as it was to the Jews of old, so long as they remained true to their God, "Ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people: that ye should show forth the praises of Him, who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light." See 1 Peter ii: 9, and Ex. xix: 5, 6. And it is as the church is gathered together in the name of Jesus, worshipping the Father in Spirit as Jesus himself teacheth them, that He calleth whomsoever it pleaseth Him, to offer incense before Him, He speaketh his message in the hearing of the ear which is to be proclaimed upon the housetop. No man can exceed the measure of life and power with which the Lord hath filled him, as a vessel sanctified and meet for the Master's use, and what is more, the hearers of the word cannot receive more than what ability is given to them to understand.

Of Jesus, to whom the Spirit was given without measure, on one occasion it was said, "He did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief." Matt. xiii: 58. So doth He now, being ever present with his Church, feed every member of the flock with convenient food. So, the growth in faith and obedience of a church, through individual faithfulness, tends to the enlargement in his gift of him who is called to minister. Paul compares his own ministry to the Corinthians as having fed them "with milk, and not with meat," and subjects not his reason alone but his Divine Master's, "for hitherto ye were not able to hear it." 1 Cor. iii. 2.

An unfaithful minister to a faithful church, will not long be permitted to wear the holy linen. "Because thou hast rejected knowledge, I will also reject thee, that thou shalt be no priest to me, seeing thou hast forgotten the law of thy God." Hosea iv: 6.

Thus the least member in the Church as an integral portion of the body has, as it were, a part in this ministry, and when the ministry is enlarged in life and power, all the faithful do rejoice, not alone those who are thus called into active service, but those also who tarry with the staff, for all share alike.

"Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion! when the Lord bringeth back the captivity of his people, Jacob shall rejoice and Israel shall be glad." Ps. xiv: 7. It is as the Church obeys the call of God, to come out of the spirit of the world, that ruleth among those who walk in darkness, that they separate themselves by following the Spirit of Christ, who is given to them to be their "leader and commander," that they come away from the Babylon, of which the vainly puffed up mind of man can say, "Is not this great Babylon that I have built for the house of the kingdom by the might of my power and for the honor of my majesty?" Dan. iv: 30. As we come to Zion with mourning and yet with subdued gladness, a temple will yet be reared (of living stones) whose glory shall exceed that of Solomon's, and teaching priests shall be given to us, and the Lord will fill the hungry soul, and satiate the priest with fatness—so that the query shall no more be heard in our land, "What is the cause that the former days were better than these?" Eccles. vii: 10.

The Peculiarities of Friends.

MUSIC AND DANCING.

It has been considered a peculiarity of Friends that they have discouraged the practice of music, both vocal and instrumental, not only in their meetings for worship, but in all places and at all times. It cannot be gainsaid that Friends, as a body, have discontinued and disallowed music as an art. They have also taken a similar attitude respecting dancing and many other amusements and entertainments. Their peculiarity in these other respects, however, is not so noticeable, because of other professing Christians having borne similar testimonies. Many who warmly approve of music condemn dancing. Friends deprecate both. So far as I understand Friends, their principles and their practices, what caused them to separate from other religious societies in their origin, and what causes men and women to take a similar step at the present day, it seems to me that their testimony against the practice of music is but a necessary consequence of their religious faith. Not that there is any more harm in producing musical sounds than in producing sounds discordant, or that, necessarily, there is evil in exercising the limbs in a dance. Music is merely rhythm or sound; dancing, rhythm of motion. Either may be very attractively executed and afford pleasure to both performer and hearer or spectator. There may be as much or as little religion in the one as in the other; but, little or much, it is purely of a ceremonial character. As a physical exercise dancing is superior to any musical exercise, and possibly it is quite as edifying, as entertaining, and as attractive. It is not, however, so much in fashion. Except among savage nations it is unusual for people to entertain their friends by dancing to them, whereas there is no more common entertainment provided for guests than music and song.

In considering the peculiarity of Friends respecting singing it will help us to understand the ground of their testimony if we associate it with their testimony against dancing. The minds of a large number of Christians are polarized or set by custom against dancing as a pastime, but they are as rigidly set in favor of singing. Were they polarized to take place and the magnet of their minds to swing loose, so as to be at liberty to point to the true lodestone, it is possible that these two forms of entertainment should lie at opposite poles? Or, could one be near the centre of gravity while the other was at the extreme of levity? The difference between the two is marked, but their relationship and affinity are quite as striking. Is one, then, good, and the other evil; or are both good or both evil? We must set aside the abstract question. The mere producing of rhythmical motions or sounds, considered by itself, cannot be said to be either good or evil. But many questions may arise for consideration when we look at the purposes which the production of such sounds and movements is made to serve, and the effect which they produce. But while motive may largely determine a question of guilt, motive can never make evil good, or good evil; and so it often happens that "evil is done from want of thought, as well as want of heart;" and sometimes even in doing evil, men think they are doing God service. Whatever our motive therefore may be, and the innocency of our intentions, evil acts will produce evil consequences, and how grave these may be is beyond our calculation. We do well, therefore, when we avoid the very appearance of evil, and cleave only to that which we know to be good.

What is the ground of Friends' testimony against music and dancing? Is there anything special about them which calls for their animadversion? or are other amusements and recreations included in the same testimony? We find that in former days all worldly amusements were condemned by Friends as unworthy their high calling as Christians. Bowling on the green was as pointedly testified against as singing and dancing, and yet there could be no evil in the simple act of rolling a ball from one end of a green to the other; but it altered matters altogether when this ball-rolling was engaged in as a pastime—when men deliberately squandered hours upon hours, day after day, rolling balls on the green, competing against each other to determine the most skillful player, and making bowling the business of their leisure hours. It needs no enlargement of the subject to make evident that such a method of spending time was not consistent with the injunction to "redeem the time," or an occupation profitable for the Christian to engage in.

Music and dancing may be considered as individuals of a class, the whole of which fall under the reprobation of Friends, and they may also be taken alone, in which case they are open to objections peculiar to themselves.—The British Friend.

The "Selections from the Journal of William Evans," in which his visit to Lost Creek Quarterly Meeting, Tennessee, is mentioned, recalls an incident in a business journey I made to that State fifty years ago on horseback, before railroads had opened that country. In approaching a village of some five hundred inhabitants in the mountains, I was directed to the house of a physician who occasionally entertained strangers. His family consisted of himself, wife, mother-in-law and several small children. We spent the evening very pleasantly around a bright wood-fire, talking over many things of mutual interest. When the family was about to retire, the doctor whispered to me to remain. We drew close to the cheerful fire, and after a pause of a few moments, he turned to me with an interested look and asked if I was a "Quaker." "I have never seen a Friend," he continued, "and I want you to tell me all about your principles and your people." I told him I was sorry that his first interview was with so young and inexperienced a member. However, I did the best I could, and we became mutually interested. I was deeply impressed by the history of his conviction of the views held by Friends, which occurred as follows:

A controversy had arisen in the village between the Baptists and Presbyterians upon the doctrine of baptism, and he and another were selected to discuss the respective modes of administering the rite, whether it should be by immersion or sprinkling. After a careful and prayerful study of the question, he came to the conclusion that neither was right, but that baptism under the Gospel was that of the Holy Spirit and of fire; that it was the work of the Holy Spirit upon the soul of man. The entire community was surprised at his conclusions, and his family was plunged into grief. He soon found, in the growth of his religious experience, that he could not say "grace" at his table in a perfunctory way, but only as he felt a grateful sense of God's blessing and provision. At this time he received a message from the village tailor that two men who passed through the town in a carriage had given his shop-boy a pamphlet setting forth the doctrines of the Society of Friends, and that they were the same held by him upon baptism. He read the pamphlet carefully and found that he could subscribe to all it taught. We continued our conversation until late in the night, much to my edification, for he had been taught of God.

I learned, upon attending the Friends' Meeting at Lost Creek, that William Evans and Jeremiah Hacker had visited Tennessee about the time referred to, passing through Carter County, where the doctor lived, and that they had distributed pamphlets and tracts.

Upon my return to Baltimore, I sent the doctor quite a number of Friends' books, but learned that he died soon after my visit. When I saw him, he was apparently in good health, and very bright and attractive. In continuing my journey, I made a business call on General ———, a large iron manufacturer, member of Congress, and commander of the State troops, and he told me that he had attended a religious meeting in his town appointed by William Evans, and that he was so much pleased with his ministry, that he thanked him for it, and told him that he could preach what he pleased in East Tennessee, even abolitionism, and he would protect him with his troops if necessary.

God's Providence.

It is an authentic fact that during the terrible massacre in Paris, known as the massacre of St. Bartholomew, in which many eminent Christians were cruelly killed, the celebrated preacher, Peter Moulins, was preserved for further usefulness to the cause of the Gospel in a most remarkable manner. He crept into a brick oven to conceal himself, but had little hope of remaining undiscovered in the ferocious search for slaughter that was carried on. In the kind providence of God, a spider immediately crawled to the opening of the good man's retreat, and wove a web across it. The dust blew upon the airy screen, and made it dingy, so that the place appeared to be long unvisited. The enemies of the Christians soon passed by, and one of them carelessly remarked, "No one could have been in that oven for several days!"

The following anecdote is related of an Englishman, named Churchill, who had taken up his abode in India, about two miles from Vizagapatnam. Soon after sunset, on one occasion, while he was sitting in his dwelling, of which the outer door was thrown open, meditating with deep sorrow upon the recent loss of his wife, and the helplessness of his little children, who were lying asleep near him, he was suddenly filled with error to observe a monstrous tiger cross the threshold of his house, and enter his room, with glaring eyes and a ferocious howl. But the animal caught sight of his full-sized image reflected in a large mirror opposite the door; and rushing at it with all his fury, breaking it into a thousand fragments, he suddenly turned and fled from the spot. Thus providentially did God preserve two little children and their father from the jaws of a wild beast.

Less thrilling, but even more remarkable, is the incident related in the following epiphany, which appears on a tomb near Port Royal, in the island of Jamaica:—

"Here lieth the body of Louis Calda, a native of Montpellier, in France, which country he left on account of the revolution. He was swallowed up by the earthquake which occurred in this place in 1692, but, by the great providence of God, was by a second shock flung into the sea, where he continued swimming till rescued by a boat, and lived forty years afterwards."

It is said of John Knox, the great Scottish reformer, who had many friends and many enemies, that it was his frequent custom, while in his own house, to sit at the head of a table with his back to the window. On one evening, however, he would not take his usual seat, and gave a positive command that no one of his family should occupy it. He took another chair in a different part of the room, and shortly afterwards a gun was fired, the bullet of which passed through the window, grazed the top of his vacant seat, and shattered the candlestick that stood upon his table!

In the Bartholomew massacre, which has already been mentioned, the Admiral de Coligny was, at the order of the king of France, put to death in his own house. His chaplain, the pious Merliu, fled from the murderers, who designed also to take his life, and hid himself in a loft of hay. After the days of blood were over, and the Protestants were suffered to keep their lives and their religion, a Synod was convened, of which he was moderator. In this assembly, when it was stated that many who had taken refuge in similar retreats perished from starvation, he was asked how he contrived to keep himself alive. He replied, giving thanks to God while he said it—that a hen had laid an egg every day during his concealment, in a nest which he could reach with his hand.

In view of these striking instances of Divine providence, we cannot but admire the goodness of God in thus caring for his children. Shall we not, therefore, cast all our care upon Him, who so wonderfully careth for us!—The British Friend.

Preparation for the Ministry.—In an article on this subject from the pen of Richard Henry Thomas, published in the Friends' Review, occurs the following paragraph:—

"Some one will say that a minister is more efficient when he is educated in the schools than he is when uneducated. This is a pure assumption, unsupported by historical evidence; for, while we have examples of great work done by men who were highly educated, such as the apostle Paul and Apollous, we have a still larger number of instances where great results have been brought about through the ministry of those who have been unlearned, and, according to human standards, ignorant men. It would be very difficult to prove whether educated or uneducated preachers have been the more effective. The conclusion from this is that education is not an actual requirement, or even always desirable, in the work of the ministry. If this be so, then to set up an educational standard shows either that we have departed from the simplicity of the Gospel, or that we have formed a standard for the ministry different from that set up by Christ."

The Students of the Colleges made in India in 1881 and 1884, have been confronted with some facts of great interest, as indicating some of the beneficent results of missionary work in that land. The Times, of London, considers the figures so remarkable that it finds upon these figures one of its strong editorials. "The facts developed are, 1. That the native Christians of British India are increasing at a rate unknown among any other considerable section of the population, at a rate more than four times higher than the population of India as a whole. This has been true during two decades and has now to be an ascertained and indisputable fact. 2. Now for the causes of this marvellous increase. They are that "the native Christian community in an Indian district is, as a rule, better looked after in childhood, better educated in youth with relation to its practical needs, better treated in sickness, more promptly aided during scarcity, more continuously used for and disciplined throughout its life, than any other of the laboring castes." A good object lesson in social economies are these native Christians. But mere growth in numbers is not all that indicates progress in this class. Taken, as they generally are, from inferior social conditions, rarely from among the Brahmans, they have pushed themselves forward and upward. The social position of the class is raised. They learn to aspire, and are successful in their aspirations. A report of the Board of Public Instruction in Madras, says of native Christians: "There can be no question if this community pursues with steadiness the present policy of its teachers, that, with the immense advantage it possesses in the way of educational institutions, in the course of a generation it will have secured a preponderating position in all the great professions, and possibly too in the industrial enterprise of the country."

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 5, 1891.

In some parts of the Christian world, there is much effort used to enlist the younger members in church services and in active work of a religious nature—sometimes before they are properly prepared to perform aright the duties devolved upon them. It is a pleasant thing to see our young people interested in anything that we may reasonably hope will promote the good of mankind, or the kingdom of the Redeemer in the earth. But in this, as in all other matters, it is wise to seek for the guidance of Christ our blessed Head, who alone can preserve his children from the dangers, often hidden, to which they may be exposed.

The experience of many of the devoted servants of God has been, that in the early visitations of Grace extended to them, they were drawn into quietness and retirement, in which situation they felt the working of the Divine Power bringing them into a state acceptable to their Heavenly Father. The heavenly seed implanted in their hearts grew most surely and safely in this state of retirement; and they were thus prepared for the active labors in the Church and the world, to which, in the fullness of time they were called.

Isaac Pennington, in speaking of the Puritans of his day, said there had been among them much sincerity and love and tenderness. But they were misled into seeking life among dead forms, ways and worship. "Though they carried some life with them into their forms, yet by degrees the form grew, and the virtue and power of godliness decreased."

Job Scott, who paid a remarkable religious visit in the Southern States, about one hundred years ago, found the same process going on among the Methodists in that section. Their hearts had been touched with a live coal from the holy altar; but they had been hurried forward into much religious activity; and Job Scott feared that many of them would quite run out, and finally shake off their religious exercise, "this being the natural consequence of making haste into religious performances without the pure leadings of Truth therein."

In another place, commenting on the same subject, he says: "Although God has for a season favored many individuals and societies, as they have arisen; yet, it is certain, that as they have thus continued in their self-activity, and running before the only true guide, they have lost the life of true religion; fading or withering has come over them, and they have settled into flat formality. This, he adds, will be the case with all who do not learn to wait for Divine help."

We have no wish to discourage those who are young in years from taking an active interest in the work of the Church. Our concern is, that they should seek in the first place to know the Spirit of Christ to operate on their hearts, and to be their leader in all that they undertake. This will preserve them in a tender and susceptible state of mind, and out of mere formality. Knowing that their ability to labor in the cause of Christ comes from Him, they will be kept from that pride which would lead them to glory in their own works.

It is the duty of every one to live in a state of filial submission to our Father in Heaven, and to be always obedient to his commands. Yet recently, at Baltimore Meeting, we heard this doctrine so enforced as to convey the impression, that in attending our religious meetings, those assembled ought to expect to offer vocal service in some shape, as if that were the great duty of the members of the Church. Whereas, as Robert Barclay expresses, "The great work of one and all ought to be to wait upon God; and returning out of their own thoughts and imaginations, to feel the Lord's presence, and know a gathering into his name indeed, where He is in the midst, according to his promise."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A delegation of Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians had a conference with Secretary Noble on the 30th ult., asked that the $50,000 that they had as compensation for their lands ceded to the Government be paid in cash, instead of in stores. The Secretary, in the course of the conversation, intimated that he would consider their request after he had shown a disposition to take lands in severalty.

A Talequah, Indian agency, reports that the committee of Cherokee agents has completed its negotiations for the sale of the public strip with the United States Cherokee Commission. The Commission agreed to pay $87,000,000 for the strip, or about $1.40 an acre, or fifteen cents per acre more than they ever offered before. In consideration of this rate the Indians waived all other claims and demands. The agreement thus arrived at was presented to the full council for ratification, with the recommendation that the Government's offer be accepted forthwith.

Dr. Mott Smith, a member of the Cabinet of the Queen of the Hawaiian Islands, has negotiated a new treaty with the United States which provides for absolute free trade between the two Governments in the products and manufactures of both countries. The treaty has been signed by Dr. Smith and by the representative of the United States through whom the negotiations were carried on. It has been in the possession of the President for several days, but has not been signed by him, at last accounts.

The American steamer Roseville, which arrived at Manzanillo, Mexico, on the 29th ult., reported having passed on the wreck of the brig Tahiti. She was drifting down upon it, and almost heaving to. As her bows were with it, it is feared that all of her company of 291 souls have been lost. The brig put into Drake's Bay, near San Francisco, on Ninth Month 30th, in distress. She had 270 Gilbert Islanders on board under contract for work in Mexico at starvation wages, and some of her crew had been taken there with much talk of seizing the vessel. The Collector of Customs, however, decided that he had no right to detain her, and the brig left. Besides the Gilbert Islanders the Tahiti had twenty-one officers and seamen.

On the 24th ult., the Dutch engineers handed out 1,004,673 bushels of wheat, and 612,869 bushels in addition were "inspected into store." This is said to be the greatest on record for any one day's operations.

A dispatch from Ishpeming, Michigan, says that the plant established by the owners of the Michigan mine for the separation of iron ore by electricity has given a success, 278 tons of work have so far turned out 30,000 tons of high grade Bessemer ore. "By improvements being made, the low grade ores are refined into the best of Bessemer."

A special train on the Pennsylvania Railroad, on the 28th ult., covered the distance between New York and Washington, 228 miles, in 1 hour and 11 minutes. This is said to be the fastest time ever made between the two cities.

Professor S. C. Chandler read before the Boston Scientific Society, on the evening of the 24th ult., an analysis of observations showing that the parallels of latitude which were commonly supposed to be fixed lines, are really mutable. In general, Professor Chandler's discovery is that the pole of the earth recedes about a circumference, with about thirty feet radius, in 427 days. This discovery, it is claimed, accounts for many of the discrepancies in astronomical calculations which have been bothering astronomers for nearly 200 years."

Aluminum ore is reported to have been discovered in large quantities and unusual richness in New Mexico.

A mass meeting of citizens of Harrison, Tennessee, has been held, at which proper arrangements were made to secure the Prohibition National Convention for that place, which will be held up as "the Prohibition object lesson of the United States."

The number of deaths in this city last week was reported to be 435; being 5 less than the previous week, and 77 more than the corresponding week last year. Of the whole number, 227 were males; 208 females; 50 died of pneumonia; 45 of diseases of the heart; 44 of consumption; 37 of diphtheria; 16 of old age;

15 of convulsions; 15 of inflammation of the brain; 14 of apoplexy; 14 of Bright's disease; 13 of bronchitis; 12 of scarlet fever; 12 of marasmus; 12 of cramp; 11 of nephritis; 11 of casualties and 11 of influenza of the stomach and bowels.

Markets.—U. S. 2's, 100 1/2; 4's, 110 1/2; 117 1/2; currency 6's, 111 a 121.

COTTON was quiet but steady, at 8 1/2c per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter bran, in bulk, $19.75 a $20.50; $3.60 in bags, at $19.00 a $19.50.

FLOUR.—Western and Pennsylvania super, $3.60 a $3.85; do. do., extras, $3.90 a $4.25; No. 2 winter family, $4.25 a $4.50; Pennsylvania, roller, straight, $4.50 a $4.75; Western winter, clear, $4.50 a $4.75; do. do., straight, $4.75 a $4.90; winter patent, new, $5.00 a $5.15; Minnesota, clear, $4.65 a $4.90; do., straight, $4.90 a $5.10; do., patent, $5.15 a $5.40; do. do., favorite brands, $5.50. Rye flour was scarce and firm at $5.15 per barrel for choice Pennsylvania. Buckwheat flour was quiet but steady, at $2.10 a $2.20 per 100 pounds for new.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, $1.03 a $1.04. No. 3 do., 94 a 95 cts.; corn, 56 1/2 a 57 cts.

No. 2 white oats, 39 1/2 a 40 cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5 1/2 a 5 3/4 cts.; good, 4 1/2 a 5 cts.; medium, 4 1/4 a 4 1/2 cts.; common, 3 1/2 a 4 cts.; culls, 2 a 3 cts.; and lambs, 4 a 6 1/2 cts.

HOGS.—Chicago, 5 1/2 a 5 3/4 cts.; good Western, 5 1/2 a 5 3/4 cts.; and other Western, 5 1/2 a 5 3/4 cts.

FOREIGN.—Speeches were made last week by Arthur J. Balfour, first Lord of the Treasury, at Glasgow and at Huddersfield, in the first named place he said that, whatever the success of the Government's policy in Ireland, it, at any rate, had been a sincere policy. The first duty of the Government was to see that the laws were obeyed, and, by wise administration and a lavish expenditure of money, to endeavor to increase the happiness of the people in every part of her Majesty's dominions. He declared that no matter what the future might bring forth, it would never bring Home Rule to Ireland.

At Huddersfield, after announcing that Chaplin, President of the Board of Agriculture, would, at an early day, introduce a small holdings bill, Balfour pointed out that such a difficulty existed between the wide difference between the conditions in Ireland and the conditions in England. In the former country, he said, small holdings were already in existence, while in the latter they had to deal everywhere with large estates, with buildings which would be worthless by conversion into allotments. He emphasized the desire to re-establish the yeomanry in England; but small proprietors ought to consider the difficulties they would encounter from lack of capital, machinery, etc. He suggested co-operative farming as a possible remedy, but he frankly admitted that no hope of this could be realized in the immediate future. Still it was an ideal to be thought after. He also pointed out the success of the Liberals' espousal of the agricultural question. Their heads, he said, had been turned by election successes.

A dispatch has been received in Paris from Peking, which confirms the statement that well-armed bands have been raiding the whole district in the northern part of China, and that they have pillaged and burned Belgian mission stations. In addition to the destruction of the mission stations at Tayon and Sanchi, where over 100 converted natives were massacred by the bloodthirsty bands, the station at Gehol was sacked and the missionaries and converts were massacred.

The priest in charge of the mission, a Belgian by birth, was killed by the mob, and several other Christians were also massacred.

Advices received in London from Shanghai are to the effect that the rebel forces in Manchuria have defeated the Imperial troops sent to suppress the rising in that region. The Imperial forces numbered 4,000 men, and their defeat causes the Government the gravest anxiety. Reinforcements to the number of 6,000 men have been despatched from Tien-Tsin to oppose the rebels, who are marching on Peking. If the Imperial troops are again defeated the position of Peking and Tien-Tsin will be in a very dangerous state.

A dispatch from Berlin dated Eleventh Month 27th, says, the influenza now so prevalent there is of a much more virulent type than that which caused so much suffering in 1889. Thirty deaths from the affection have been reported in six days passed are reported. Physicians estimate that 40,000 persons have been attacked and influenza since Eleventh Month 1st in Berlin alone.

The London Times, in its financial article of the 30th ult., says that the report that Russia is buying silver is true, but that only enough will be bought to provide a new subsidiary coinage to replace the nickel alloy known as fillor. The fairly large amount required for this purpose, the Times adds, will be purchased in instalments.

The area affected by the famine in Russia comprises a section of the empire equaling in size nearly half the area of the United States, and a very low estimate places the population of this part of the country at 4,000,000 souls. In many districts no winter sowing whatever has been done, and consequently the inhabitants have nothing to look forward to, even should they be so fortunate as to manage to sustain life through the winter.

Dispatches of the 25th ult., from Rio Janeiro, state that on that day President Peixoto promulgated a manifesto, which is received with general satisfaction. In this he altogether abandons the arbitrary and dictatorial authority assumed by Da Fonseca, and declares that the legal order of affairs is re-established. As a consequence of this general statement the manifesto announces that the resolutions of the Congress decreed by Da Fonseca is annulled, and the state of siege in the federal district has been raised.

The manifesto summons Congress to re-assemble on Twelfth Month 18th and resume its functions. The British Minister telegraphed the same day that Marshal Da Fonseca's readiness to abdicate was due to the fact that he is critically ill.

The statement of the Chilean Finance Minister shows that ex-President Balmaceda expended during the civil war an amount equivalent in paper money to $73,000,000. Of this amount, he obtained $20,000,000 from the surplus cash, an loan, $50,000,000 by the illegal issues of notes and notes taken from banks, and $23,000,000 from the ordinary receipts.

Advices from Manzanilla, Mexico, state that the volcano of Colima still remains active and the column of fire from the crater at nights can be seen for one hundred miles at sea. The hamlets at the base have been covered with lava and ashes.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Selections from the Journal of William Evans.

1847.—"Was at the North Meeting; in which Ezekiel's vision of the dry bones in the valley, which were very dry, was brought before me. It seemed not only to represent the state of many of the house of Israel, who were very destitute of the love and life of God in their hearts; but also the condition of those who were baptized for the dead, and who, at times, such was their stripped and destitute condition, as to the sensible feeling of the life-giving presence of the Lord, were ready to doubt whether they would ever again experience it, and be enabled to stand before Him with acceptance. Yet He, who is the resurrection and the life, can and does breathe on bones whose energy is departed, clothe them as with sinews and flesh, and breathe into them the breath of life, and raise them up as an army for his service. I hope a little of his quickening virtue was felt among us this day."

"Of latter time being under much exercise, and at seasons clothed with many fears, I have had little call openly to speak in the assemblies of the Lord's people; and when I have believed myself constrained to stand forth on behalf of my gracious Lord and Master and his cause, it has been in but few words, yet attended with the evidence of being rightly authorized, by his peace shed abroad in my mind. To-day I felt called on to bear testimony, that He, who gave his disciples power over all the power of the enemy, so that nothing should by any means offend or harm them, was still with his faithful, devoted children; and according to their respective conditions, growths and services in the church, would give them power over all the power of the enemy, in the various assaults and temptations with which he may be permitted to buffet them; if on their part, they keep faithful to Him. Christ only knows the depth of baptism needful for the humiliation and reformation of his disciples; and if they hold fast the grain of faith, which will never be entirely taken from them, in his time, He will appear to them, as the resurrection and the life; renew their faith, and grant an evidence, that their feet are upon the Rock of ages, the sure foundation, against which the gates of hell cannot prevail.

"I went to Haddonfield, and attended that meeting; in which I was drawn forth to say close things to some, who were doing despite to the offers of Divine love and mercy to them: who had become like the heath in the desert, in a dry and barren soil; not partaking of the water of life, by which alone the soul can be kept alive unto God; and such is their insensibility, that they know not when good cometh. These were pleaded with, to lay these things solemnly to heart; for the time was fast approaching, when the awful message would be sounded in their ear, 'Steward, give an account of thy stewardship, for thou mayest be no longer steward.' Also the fearful, trembling followers of Christ, were encouraged to keep the faith; for in his time He would shed abroad his peace in their hearts, and grant an evidence of his acceptance and approbation."

[Having a minute to attend North Carolina Yearly Meeting, and to visit some meetings belonging to it, in which labor of love he had his beloved friend, Henry Cope, for companion, William Evans thus alludes to some of his services thereupon:]

"Eleventh Month 6th. Attended the Meeting for Ministers and Elders, in which I was engaged to hold up the importance of maintaining our testimony to the spiritual nature of Divine worship under the Gospel dispensation. It requires devotedness to the Truth, and a willingness to endure mortification before the people, at times, in a steadfast waiting for the Master's life-giving presence; not daring to put forth a hand to any work, until He appears and gives strength and authority for it. If this precious testimony, by which we are much distinguished from other denominations, is not preserved, the Society must go down. After meeting, we rode back to New Garden.

"7th. The meeting for worship this morning was crowded, and for a long time much disturbed. I felt impressed with the necessity of advocating the doctrine of the universality of the Light of Christ, as it shines at times in the hearts of all men. It gives man a sight of his fallen condition, alienated from God by sin; and by obedience to it, he is gradually led out of darkness into the marvellous light of the Lord, and thus witnesses, as he perseveres faithfully, a growth and an establishment in the Truth. Christ Jesus is the author and finisher of the saints' faith. True faith is not a faculty of the human mind; but a firm belief and confidence, produced by the operation of his Spirit on the heart, that what He requires of man to forsake or to perform, is the revealed will of our Heavenly Father; and leads us to put our trust in Christ, the Captain of salvation. He came to save us from our sins, not in them; and we must be separated from sin, before we can experience complete justification and redemption.

"8th. Second-day morning, the meeting for business commenced. Towards the close, the importance of rightly holding a Yearly Meeting, coming before me, and of Friends conducting, during the recess, at their respective lodging places, in a manner consistent with the object of their coming together, I felt drawn affectionately to call their attention, particularly that of the young people, to it; and to mention a remark made to me in my early going out on religious visits, by an elder in the church of Christ; that he always found it best to keep under religious exercise. This is a state of inward watchfulness; keeping the fear of the Lord before our eyes, lest we should do anything that would be inconsistent with the object of our leaving home. For want of this, how will Satan rob us and wound us, and deprive us of the benefit intended by these opportunities. The young people were invited to guard against everything of a light and frivolous nature, by which they would suffer loss. Friends expressed their unity with it, and wished it might have proper place with them."

"On the 16th, we went to New Salem, where we had a meeting with the few Friends residing near, and in the village; also some other persons who had been invited. The nature of Divine worship, the necessity of being brought forth from all dependence upon man, and coming to an inward acquaintance with the Lord Jesus, relying upon Him as our teacher and minister, were set before them. All the efforts of man, in his will and time, to comprehend the truths of the Gospel, or to teach others the way of religion, will be fruitless. Man, in his natural condition, may set himself to work, and conclude he knows much; yet proceeding from his own spirit it will not work the righteousness of God, or promote the Redeemer's kingdom. I felt much for the young people, and warned them of the machinations of wicked men and women, who were trying to draw unsuspecting young people into their evil practices. For those who were striving to do right, I was prostrated in vocal prayer, that they might be strengthened, and that the visitations of the Lord's love and mercy, might be extended to the young people; bringing them to submit to bear the yoke and cross of Christ, and preparing them to uphold the standard of pure righteousness where they dwell."

[Upon getting home from this journey, William Evans thus feelingly acknowledges his sense of preservations and mercies:]

"It is cause of gratitude to the God and Father of all our sure mercies, to be preserved from danger and serious accident; and to believe that He provided for us, and was our guide, so as to perform the work He assigned us to do. May I be favored with his continual providence in my outward and spiritual concerns; so as to be kept obedient to his will, and sanctified and fit for his use, through the cleansing, quickening efficacy of his Divine Word in the heart, unworthy as I am of the least of all his mercies; to whom, with his dear Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, be ascribed all glory and honor, thanksgiving and praise, world without end. Amen."

1848.—"To a letter which I wrote to a Friend about this time, I appended the following: 'In the present unsettled state of our religious Society, I am persuaded that the place of safety is individual watchfulness unto prayer; that we may do nothing to create excitement, by which any may be stirred up to do what will not make for peace, and receive the Divine approbation. John Woolman, I think, says, if the church gathers to the place of true prayer, her habitation is safe. In that condition alone, she she be prepared to wait for and to receive the direction of her all-wise and omnipotent Head. And if we stand still, waiting for the salvation of God, we shall have good ground to hope that He will take his case into his own hand, and carry the church through all its difficulties, to its further refinement, and the praise and glory of his great name. It is a great mistake to grow impatient under suffering; and in order to procure relief, as we imagine, rush into any measure, incompatible with the order of the Discipline. If others do wrong, bear a righteous testimony against it; and if it seem to avail nothing, then leave it and them to the Lord, to do what seemeth to Him good."

"Sixth Month 1st. My wife and myself went, this morning to Plymouth Monthly Meeting. It seemed to be our place to encourage the devoted ones, and the visited young people, to hold on in the good old way, in which our fathers in the Truth walked. The enemy is busy at work to draw us away from close watchfulness over our hearts, and to persuade us that there is little or nothing in our testimony to simplicity and self-denial, and that continual exercise of spirit, in which the outgoings of the mind after ease, is detected. And when he has persuaded us that the gentle convictions of Divine Grace are imaginary, or that it is not necessary to be so strict as our fathers were; then the way will be opened to inculcate doctrines that our Society never believed; as, that immediate revelation has ceased; and thus the indispensable duty of waiting upon the Lord, that we may hear and know his voice, and be instructed immediately, as the sheep of Christ, and led along safely by Him, would be forsaken. It is those who are giving heed to the manifestations of his Spirit in their hearts, that will be prepared to make a right use of the Holy Scriptures."

"At Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting, my mind was arrested with the importance of keeping under suffering for the sake of the blessed Master and his cause, and for our own benefit and preservation. The expression of the apostle was brought before me, "For unto you it is given, in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe in Him, but also to suffer for his sake." It seemed to me, that inward suffering, in a state of close watchfulness, was greatly needed; and that much loss would be sustained, if we were to become a self-active, talking people; and not experience those humbling, preparing baptisms into our own conditions, needed to fit us for usefulness, and to bring us in sympathy with Christ; who as the Seed, is pressed down in the hearts of the people, by their worldly thoughts, and desires after things of a perishing nature."

(To be continued.)

To practice righteousness and resist sin, requires the in-dwelling strength of God. "Renew a right spirit within me," prayed the psalmist. The original word signifies a firm, constant spirit, that has no waverings. A steady hand writes a clear, strong line; the shaking, tremulous hand makes a crooked scrawl. Faith is likened to an anchor, because it has a holding power; and that comes from the hold which God has upon the man who exercises.—Dr. T. L. Cuyler.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Lost On the Moor.

Two boys of twelve or thirteen years of age had gone out "St. Thomasing," that is, visiting the farmhouses on St. Thomas's Day (Twelfth Month 20th), and asking "Thomas's gifts." These were usually pieces of pepper-cake (or the customary thick Christmas gingerbread, with perhaps a modicum of cheese, or a bite of cake or maybe a few halfpence. The day was dull and raw, but not bitterly cold. They had reached the farm called Stormy Hall, and then, finding the afternoon growing dark, and more thickness setting in, they made up their minds to give up for the day, and to turn their steps homewards the "soonest way" they could go; and this was to leave the fringe of farmhouses that lie all along the dale just about the level of the highest enclosure, and the rough road that gives the means of going from one to the other all along, and making up the hill slopingly in order to reach the main road running along the top of the ridge from Kirky Moorside to Castleton, where their parents lived. All this, however, was not made out until the next day, for the poor boys had never reached home. The anxiety of the parents—the boys were cousins—need not be dwelt upon.

It so happened the next morning that I had to take an early walk in the outlying part of the parish which Fryup is, and it was near mid-day when I returned to the parsonage. Just before entering the garden from the Fryup side I heard a number of voices in the lane, and presently saw the speakers coming down the lane from the school. This was so unusual at the time named, for twelve o'clock is invariably called "dinner time," that I knew there must be some greatly exciting cause to account for this neglect of the mid-day meal, and instead of going into the house I went into the road to meet the men I had seen. Nearly the first person I met was a stalwart mason, then and always a great friend of mine, who told me that the two boys I have mentioned had never reached home, and to judge by the answers to inquiries made along the line they had taken the previous afternoon, they must have spent the night totally unsheltered on the open moor. My friend Frank's voice shook as he told me this. He was no ways related to the missing lads, but he was himself the father of lads of about the same age, and there was no lack of natural feeling about him. In fact he was a good fellow all round.

We organized our plan of search at once, and passing in loose order along the fields on the west side of the dale, we made towards the moor above Stormy Hall as directly as we could. We had not proceeded far before a shout came down the dale, and was passed on to us in the rear with a speed that seemed almost marvelous, to the effect that "one of the lads had been found, and though very stiff and lame from the exposure, still not materially the worse."

We soon met with further and fuller intelligence, and it appeared that the boys, bewildered by the fog, which they had found very dense as they ascended the moor-bank from the farm and indeed increasing in thickness the higher they reached, had almost immediately, and in a way which they could not explain, gone astray from the right direction, and the deviation was made, although in the clear light it might seem to have been an important one, yet, as always in a thick fog, it had the inevitable consequence of leading step by step to bewilderment. Our poor luckless little lads soon found they were out of the track, and effort after effort to recover it ended in disappointment and hopeless discomfiture. And then the darkness of coming night began to intensify the heavy gloom of the fog. But the brave, hardy little chaps did not give up or lose either heart or head in their trouble. They were lost, and they must spend the night on the open moor. Well then, they must make the best of it, and do what they could towards making the inevitable as bearable as they could. And so they looked out a hollow way wore by the feet of the sheep, and dry, and sheltered by the growth of tall ling; and then they pulled some more ling to haph themselves withal, and munching some of the gifts of food they had got at the different farms they had visited, they prepared to spend the night as comfortably as wet boots and stockings and damp clothes would permit.

When the morning broke at last—and the nights are long indeed towards the end of Twelfth Month, and even sometimes to those who have more luxurious appointments than a down-pressure canopy of dull, grayish-white fog, with damp ling for coverlet, and moist shoes and stockings, and clothes in general far from dry, for sheet and blanket—only one of the two was capable of movement, and he stiffly and with difficulty. But with an effort he "got hisself scratched open," and began to think what was best to be done. As he sat and thought as well as he could, poor little chap, he fancied he heard the tinkle of a bell, and if so, it would mean deliverance! It was no sheep-bell that, if a bell at all; but it would be the bell of the leading horse of a "draught" (team), and it would lead him to the high-road, if only he had strength and feet to struggle so far.

A minute or two, and he is assured it is a bell; and then he hears the driver speaking to his horses. Away he goes, hobbling as well as he can; but the passage of the draught along the beaten road is faster than his with his numbed feet over the hindering ling, and the sounds of the rescue that might be are getting a little ahead of him. With a choking sense of something nearer like despair than any yet, he musters all his strength for a last yell, and luckily he is heard. It was time; for his strength was spent, brave little fellow that he was! The driver, who was making his early way to the Rose-dale Head coal-pits, stopped his draught, shouted in response, and presently had the poor, chilled, foot-numb, aching little walf safe in his arms, hoisted him into the wagon, covered him with the hay the horses were to have eaten while taking in the intending load of coal, weighing it, paying for it and so forth, turned away straight back for Castleton, and dropped the rescued youngster at his father's door.

But the boy had not forgotten his fellow in the night's bivouac, who, moreover as being less hardy than himself, was really and sadly disabled, but had given such an account of his own position when he first heard the sound of the bell, and of the way he had taken in trying to intercept the draught, that there was no difficulty for William Robinson, the rescuer, to give minute directions to such as he fell in with on the road, how to look for the lost and helpless sojourner still left in his comfortless night's lodgings. And thus, before the party I had joined had had more than time to spread themselves out in a long line, each individual within hailing distance, if not sight of his right and left-hand neighbors, and to begin our systematic search of every yard of the moor before us, the news came up from behind, that the boy had been found, had been taken down to Stormy Hall, and was there quite "safe," though by no means sound.

In half an hour's time the poor boy had more visitors than ever before or since in his life. We found him near a cheery farm-house fire, where he told he had enjoyed some warm milk, and, except that he had for the time lost the use of his legs and feet, did not seem to be materially the worse. The doctor, too, had seen him; for he had come riding up to join the army of seekers, and was on the spot almost as soon as wanted; and had said that he must stay where he was for a day or two, and then might be taken home without hurt; and that after a few days he would be as well again as ever.

But thick as the fog was, there was more mist than could be accounted for that ground in the eyes of more than one or two of the hardy, rugged men who had joined in that search, when we realized what exposure on a North Yorkshire moorland in a Twelfth Month night must be, and did not as yet even fancy to ourselves that these strayed boys might have had coolness enough, and bravery besides, to try, hopeless as their case seemed, to do the best they could for themselves.—Forty Years in a Moorland Parish.

FROM THE "SUNDAY-SCHOOL TIMES."

A catastrophe befalls a quiet and lovely home, by which the husband and father is taken suddenly away. The eldest son is but a bright and thoughtless boy. At once, however, he is in a new environment. There is for him a new heaven and a new earth. He is changed, as it were, in an hour. New responsibilities press upon him; his struggle to bear up under them develops and strengthens his every faculty. His step is firmer; his bearing is more erect; his face shows the lines of thought and care and unselfish endurance for others. Through that catastrophe he has been raised from the plane of a careless, dependent youth, to the sphere of a noble and holy manhood.

Or, it is the young wife with her helpless babe, who seems crushed under the catastrophe which deprives her of a loving husband's presence and care. How different a world she lives in now! The heaven and the earth are new to her. And how she changes with her change of condition! How her thoughts centre on the little one left to her, and on the home where the family shall be reunited! Through grace, her unspeakable sorrow transfigures her very face and form, until she seems so spiritualized and refined by sanctified suffering that her every look becomes an inspiration and a benediction to all who watch her. She is of a higher order of being than she could have been while the first heaven and the first earth remained to her.

The young man engaged in his studies is startled by the intelligence that his father is a bankrupt, and that he must abandon his plans for a college course, and go out at once to earn his bread by daily toil. The daughter, whose very life has been lived in her mother's love, is summoned by that mother's death to take, as it were, the mother's place in the suddenly changed household. The husband, to whom a devoted wife has been everything, is left in loneliness as by the lightning's stroke. The man of wealth finds his property swept away through unfortunate investments, and is compelled to begin again in poverty after long years of ease and indulgence. He who has trusted another without doubt or hesitation, finds in a sad hour that he has been betrayed by one whom he loved as his own soul. It may be fire or flood or pestilence which changes the whole face and circumstances of a community, and brings through that catastrophe a new heaven and a new earth to all the dwellers there. There are a thousand ways in which the change may come. Coming in any way, influence is manifest in the uplifted characters and the noble lives of all who are truly profited thereby. Without such a catastrophe,—some great bereavement, or disappointment, or loss of possessions, or change of condition and circumstances,—there can never be that great and rapid transformation by which a soul is swept onward and upward at once into a loftier realm of spiritual being. The way "into the kingdom of God" is "through many tribulations," and tribulation often involves catastrophe, with its change of the very earth and heaven.

Has there happened to us a catastrophe that seemed like the very shock of final doom? Have the heavens above us appeared to pass away with a great noise, and the elements of nature about us to be dissolved with fervent heat, and the earth beneath us and all the works therein to be burned up? Then let us recognize the fulfilment of God's promise in the sight before us of "a new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." The new heavens are already to be seen, nearer and clearer than the first heavens, and with so much more of living treasure in them. The new earth is round about us, fuller than the first earth of sacred memories, of hallowed duties, and of holy hopes. The sky is more open by day, and the stars in it are brighter by night, than aught that we knew aforesaid; and in this new order of things "the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Eastern Shore of Chesapeake Bay.

The Monthly Meeting of Philadelphia, to which belonged those Friends who had taken up arms to defend the Indians and their fellow-citizens, was brought under much exercise on account of this act. They could but sympathize with the feelings of humanity which had impelled the offending members to take this step; and they must have recognized the allowance that was to be made for the state of public excitement that existed and the apparent danger of the triumph of the mob over legitimate government; yet they could not ignore the necessity of maintaining the testimony which the Society had long maintained against wars and fightings.

Their course appears to have been one in which prudence and the meekness of wisdom were apparent. At a suitable time the overseers requested the Monthly Meeting to appoint a committee to aid them in administering suitable advice to the delinquents. A number of worthy experienced Friends were accordingly deputed for this service. They found thirty-two of those who had taken up arms were minors, and many of the others were such as were not orderly in their lives and conversations. Many confessed that they had been hurried into the act without due consideration, and they were convinced their conduct had been contrary to the Gospel of peace. Some publicly condemned the course they had pursued, and sent acknowledgments of their error to the meeting; many condemned it to the committee, and a few continued to justify it all they had done.

After about eighteen months of labor, the committee drew up an epistle to Friends, which was adopted by the Monthly Meeting in the Twelfth Month of 1765. In this was set forth the ancient testimony of the Society to the peaceable nature of Christ's kingdom; and the belief was expressed that the principal cause of the defection which had been manifested, was a want of experimental acquaintance with the Divine virtue and power of Christ. It says: "Weighty has been, and still is, the concern which rests upon us, that those of our members who have erred may be convinced and restored into the path of peace, and that the reproach brought upon us and our religious profession may be effectually removed."

After mentioning the repeated visits in tenderness and Christian compassion that had been paid to those who had erred, and referring to the good effects of this labor, it says of those who are not yet so convinced of the inconsistency of their conduct as to condemn the same: "With these we esteem it our duty still to labor with patience and forbearance, as way may be opened in Divine wisdom, hoping a merciful visitation of gracious help will be extended to them, which alone can bless our future labors with success."

A degree of tenderness and conviction followed the patient, persevering labor of Friends, and in the Fifth Month of 1767 a report was made that those who had not been disowned for other causes, nor had made acknowledgment of their error, now expressed "a willingness and hope to be more guarded," and "desire to witness a further growth in the Truth." The committee was released at that time, and this long, patient and successful labor was brought to an end.

The number who were ultimately disowned it is believed was not large; and the labors of the committee were no doubt instrumental in instructing many in the grounds of our testimony against war, and in stirring them up to a closer conformity in their manner of life to the guidance of the Spirit of Christ.

The great conflict known as the French and Indian War was so destructive and so important in its results, that it seems proper to give some account of the causes which led to it.

The most important of these was the conflicting claims to territory in America, of France and England. The Cabots, father and son, had discovered the coast of North America under a commission from Henry VII of England, had explored it in 1496 and 1498 as far south as Cape Hatteras, and had according to the custom of those, and indeed of succeeding times, taken possession by planting the flag of England on the soil—ignoring the rights of the native inhabitants, who were the real owners, or at least claiming precedence of any other European nation. The claims founded on this fictitious possession were supposed to extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

The English colonies at the time of this war had spread along the sea coast from Maine to Florida, but had nowhere penetrated very far into the interior of the country.

The French settlements were along the River St. Lawrence, and gradually extended up its valley, along the great lakes and down the tributaries of the Mississippi. They were much promoted by the proselyting zeal of the Jesuit missionaries, who were ready to endure hardships, torture and even death in their efforts to spread a knowledge of Christianity, as they believed it, among the native tribes. Their explorers traced the course of the Mississippi River down to the Gulf of Mexico, and permanent settlements were made at various points. By occupying the valley of the Ohio they hoped to confine the English to the country east of the Alleghany Mountains.

The traders of Virginia and Pennsylvania had been in the habit of visiting the Indian towns on the upper tributaries of the Ohio, and trading for furs. The Canadian fur-traders began to visit the same villages, and in 1749 sent an expedition to explore and occupy the country. The English traders were expelled, and a letter was sent to Governor Hamilton of Pennsylvania, admonishing him to encroach no further on the territory of the King of France. These aggressive measures were resisted mainly by a company of prominent Virginians, who also sent an exploring party in 1750; and in 1753 a colony was planted on the Youghioheny west of Laurel Hill. In the same year Du Quesne, the Governor of Canada, despatched a company of 1,200 men to descend the Alleghany and colonize the country. These came into collision with the provincial troops, who had fortified themselves at the confluence of the Alleghany and Monongahela, and a war was begun in what was then a western wilderness, while the French and English governments were nominally at peace with each other.

A small army of Virginians under the command of George Washington was sent to recapture the fort at the source of the Ohio River, but owing to the superior number of the French troops was compelled to retreat without accomplishing its object.

Although professing to be at peace, each of the European governments sent out soldiers to their respective colonies, and the war was vigorously prosecuted. An army sent into western Pennsylvania in 1755 was disastrously defeated. There was fighting also in the north of New York about Lakes George and Champlain; but war was not declared between the two nations until 1756, two years after hostilities had actually begun. The war continued with varying success and much bloodshed until in 1759 the English forces prevailed, and Canada and all the fortified posts of the French were surrendered to the English.

Both the hostile parties had availed themselves of the help of Indian allies—and these in accordance with their usual tactics laid waste the frontier settlements, killing or carrying into captivity a large number of the settlers. These were the devastations which so distressing the outlying settlers in Pennsylvania, Maryland and Virginia; and in their execution the Indians were stimulated partly by the influence of the French, and probably also in many cases by a desire to avenge themselves on those who had unjustly settled on their lands. So that the dictates both of equity and of policy were in harmony with the concern which Friends feel, that none of their members should occupy lands to which the Indian title had not been justly extinguished.

Although after 1760 the French no longer retained any foothold in Canada and the valley of the St. Lawrence, yet the Indian tribes who had been friendly to them could with difficulty appreciate that this territory had been finally lost to their former allies; and they looked forward to a time when the struggle would be renewed by the French with fresh forces. Their misapprehension was increased by the ill-treatment of the English conquerors. In this condition of affairs, a far-reaching conspiracy was organized by Pontiac, chief of the Ottawas, whose home was in the district between Lakes Erie and Michigan. He conceived the idea of uniting all the Indian tribes from the Alleghanies to the Mississippi in one confederacy, which on a given day should strike every English fort and every English family west of the mountains. The time fixed for the fatal blow was the 7th of the Fifth Month, 1763. But it was difficult to secure perfect uniformity of action among so many tribes and so widely scattered. Yet the result was terribly disastrous—and by the middle of summer every fortified post had fallen into their hands except three. But a treaty of peace was signed between France and England in 1763, and the news of this reaching the Indian tribes discouraged them from continuing the warfare, and their confederacy soon dissolved. By this treaty all the French possessions East of the Mississippi were ceded to England.

The Religious Parrot.

A well-known writer says: "I do not think we ourselves are aware how much our religious life is made up of phrases; how much of what we call Christian experience is only a dialect of the churches, a mere religious phraseology, with almost nothing behind it in what we really feel and know."

When Paul said to the Philippian jailer, speaking from the depths of his personal experience and a clear understanding of the man's need, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved," the words brought light and life to a dark soul. But when they are repeated, as they frequently are, by persons who have no more real knowledge of their meaning than a parrot, they sound hollow enough, and utterly fail of their purpose. Said a young minister, in an unusually candid mood, when asked what answers he gave to inquirers, "I tell them the regulation things." At the same time he confessed that he had little confidence in these "regulation things." That is just what scores, yes, hundreds, of preachers are doing. They are saying the "regulation things." They are preaching the doctrines and ideas that they imbibed in college and seminary, or the notions derived from their independent reading, instead of uttering the feelings and experiences of their own lives, the convictions of their own hearts. How often are sermons approved as extremely "scriptural" merely because they are made up of many different texts strung together and rattled off parrot fashion, with very little regard to their exact meaning or application?

But come into the prayer-meeting, and listen to the parrots there. Deacon Jones is one. They say he has the "gift of prayer." Hark, how those nicely rounded sentences pour forth! He never hesitates, nor is at a loss for a word. Many good phrases are quoted at length directly from the Bible. Some have been appropriated from the familiar prayer of good Dr. Brown, his former pastor, and are precious bits of real antique furniture. Others are family heirlooms. The prayer is a fine patchwork of words and phrases gathered during long years of attendance at religious meetings. You are profoundly conscious, while the deacon is praying, that he doesn't want anything in particular. The truth is, he is not praying at all. He is simply repeating a string of fine sentences that he has learned. When he reaches the end of his repertoire, he sits down. Then Sister Green rises, and makes a few remarks. She is another parrot. Instead of having something to say, and saying it in the shortest, plainest, and most direct terms possible, she will ramble on about religion being a very "satisfying portion," and hope for a more "realizing sense" of her weakness, and much more of the same kind. Sister Green is an excellent woman, but she is a parrot nevertheless.

Now, strange as it may seem, parrots are made, not born; that is, religious parrots. They are the product of false methods of religious training. The pulpit parrot is the result of that system of seminary training that teaches men to write sermons rather than to preach the gospel, that fills them with theology and church history, instead of setting them on fire with zeal for the salvation of men. The prayer-meeting parrot has been hatched in the incubator of formal experience meetings. He is thoroughly imbued with the notion that speaking in meeting is an essential part of every Christian life.

Some of our evangelists hold children's meetings in which young people of not more than a dozen years of age are urged to speak, to pray, to relate their "experience." They invariably fall into set phrases, and soon become parrots. All speech that is genuine is helpful at once to the speaker and to those who hear. But he who merely repeats the words of others is likely to be deceived as to his own life, and he will surely fail to influence others.—G. H. Hubbard in S. S. Times.

MUCH has been said of late concerning the bi-chloride of gold cure for drunkenness. The administration of the asserted cure being by hypodermic injections, which are said to produce a distaste for alcohol and its compounds. The Christian Cyclops thinks that getting drunk is a sin rather than a weakness, and that a more radical antidote than a chemical cure for intoxication, needs to be sought after. It says:

"The writer knew a young, healthy, fine-looking man, not a Christian, living in Chicago, who had this drink-trist to an uncontrollable degree, although he could be classed only as a moderate drinker. On his way home to sleep, every night, he had to pass a saloon, and every night he went into it and had one drink, going, soon afterward, to bed. Providentially, some influence, perhaps God's Holy Spirit, set him to thinking how weak and foolish he was, not able, with his strong frame and manly form, to get the better of so persistent a habit. But his will was weaker than his appetite for liquor, and he could not overcome the evil that beset him. Something prompted him to pray that his craving for ardent spirits might be taken from him. For a time even under this regular discipline, he could not prevail. But he was sincere, with sufficient faith to keep on praying. A few days more elapsed, and to his great joy and with considerable surprise, he found that he had conquered his appetite, and that he could pass and re-pass that and all other saloons, without a desire to enter or to drink any ardent spirits. The writer heard his testimony given at a Sunday afternoon meeting, and on another occasion. The cure was performed not by the application of drugs, but by that power that has changed many a sinner into a living child of God."—L.

CHARACTER must be built up by the effort of resistance to mere tendency, and by overcoming obstacles. The man who has not to fight the world, the flesh, and the devil is in a perilous state. It must be because these have ceased to need effort to hold him in allegiance to their evil powers.

Led Out of Rome by the Holy Spirit.

[In the Converted Catholic for the present month, there is an interesting letter from a correspondent, Sarah F. F., detailing how her eyes were opened to see the errors of the Romish communion, to perceive her personal need of the one baptism that is essential to the salvation of the soul, and how she was favored to come out of the darkness and bondage which had theretofore surrounded and held her. Her experience affords an additional testimony to the value of turning the hearts of the people away from a dependence upon man to the One mighty to save, who indeed is not far from any who heed his first gentle intimations and press on in the way of his leading and requiring. The readers of "THE FRIEND" will probably be interested in the account. The letter has been somewhat condensed.—J. W. L.]

"I was brought up a Roman Catholic and continued in that church until about a year ago, when I drifted into that great evil, modern spiritualism. The priest whom I consulted was very kind to me, and did all in his power to pacify and help me, but I had been convicted of sin, and was in real trouble, and nothing short of the power of God could help me. One night when I was more than usually troubled I cried unto the Lord and He heard me, and He opened my vision and let me see my glorified Saviour, my Redeemer, my God. He came to me and I welcomed Him to my heart, and I am so glad that He gave me the grace to receive Him. I did not know then, that the blessed Saviour had come from heaven to abide in me and be my life. A few weeks later as I was still pressed by the enemy, God put a prayer into my heart that gave me new life. I was alone in a little garden where I went to pray, as I was too restless to stay in the house, and God caused me to pray that the Holy Spirit might speak to my soul. He wonderfully answered that prayer which He had inspired, and I heard his voice from heaven plainly and clearly, as He said: 'I am with you always even to the consummation of the world.' At the same time my whole being was permeated with the power of the Holy Spirit. But when the rapture had passed I did not even then understand what it meant, for I had never heard of any one living in our times having an experimental knowledge of God, or of any one since the apostles being baptized with the Holy Spirit, as I now know I was that evening.

"A few weeks later I was at my work in the office and felt the pressure of the enemy again, but the Lord spoke to me once more. This time the voice from within said, 'Why do you trouble yourself about these things when you have strength within to overcome,' and at that moment my understanding was opened and I understood my former experience, and knew that Jesus had come to abide in me. Jesus by his indwelling Spirit has been my life and my guide ever since.

"I know to-day that the baptism of the Roman Church did not regenerate me. No outward form or ceremony can save. Jesus says, 'You must be born again,' and when you have been born of the Spirit and have passed from death to life, God makes this known to you. His Spirit witnesses with yours that you are the children of God. Have you this witness, dear friends? If you have not, don't rest until you have it, don't risk your eternal salvation on any sacraments or mediation, no matter how good they may appear. It is a matter to be settled between yourself and God, not after death, nor at death, but now; now is the acceptable time, now is the day of salvation."

THE POOR MAN'S SHEAF.

He saw the wheat fields waiting
All golden in the sun,
And strong and stalwart reapers
Went by him one by one.
"O, could I reap in harvest!"
His heart made bitter cry.
"I can do nothing, nothing,
So weak, alas, am I!"

At eve a fainting traveller
Sank down beside his door;
A cup of cool, sweet water
To quench his thirst he bore.
And, when refreshed and strengthened,
The traveller went his way.
Upon the poor man's threshold
A golden wheat-sheaf lay.

When came the Lord of harvest,
He cried: "Oh, Master, kind,
One sheaf I have to offer,
But that I did not bind;
I gave a cup of water."
To one athirst, and he Left at my door, in going,
This sheaf I offer Thee."

Then said the Master, softly:
"Well pleased with this am I:
One of my angels left it
With thee as he passed by.
Thou may'st not join the reapers
Upon the harvest plain,
But he who helps a brother
Binds sheaves of richest grain."

WHAT OF THAT?

SELECTED.

Tired! well, what of that?
Didst fancy life was spent on beds of ease,
Fluttering the rose-leaves scattered by the breeze?
Come, rouse thee! work while it is called to day;
Coward, arise; go forth thy way!

Lonely, and what of that?
Some must be lonely; 'tis not given to all
To feel a heart responsive rise and fall
To bend another life into his own.
Work may be done in loneliness; work on!

Dark! well, and what of that?
Didst fondly dream the sun would never set?
Dost fear to lose the day? Take courage yet!
Learn thou to walk by faith and not by sight.
Thy steps will guided be and guided right.

Hard! well, and what of that?
Didst fancy life one summer holiday,
With lessons none to learn, and naught but play?
Go, get thee to the task! Conquer or die,
It must be learned. Learn it then, patiently.

No help! nay, 'tis not so;
Though human help be far, thy God is nigh,
Who feeds the raven hears his children cry.
He's near thee whoso'er thy footsteps roam,
And He will guide thee, light thee, help thee home!

BURGLARY.—If the burglar who craftily examines a house or shop, to see how he may best break into it and steal its contents, be a knave, what name should we bestow upon the Old Bailey barrister, who, in the defense of a confessed thief, sifts and examines the laws to ascertain where he may best evade or break through them, for the purpose of defrauding justice, of letting loose a felon to renew his depredations upon society? Bentham compares the confidence between a criminal and his advocate, to a compact of guilt between two confederated malefactors.—Tin Trumpet.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Can a Consistent Christian Go to the Theatre?

"Therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should drift away from them."

It is very easy to "drift away" from the path of Truth, and we cannot fully glorify our Master if we do not keep our eye single so that the whole body may be full of Light.

I know there are some who think an occasional visit to the theatre no harm, but a means of change and recreation, to a mind full of business cares and the like which come to nearly all of us.

First, then, let me say, it is not safe for us to go anywhere or do anything that we do not feel we could in all sincerity ask our Saviour's blessing upon. Can we do this when entering the door of a theatre, no matter how good a play it may be? It seems to me that the question a child of God should ask himself or herself in this matter should not be, Is it wrong? but—Is it right? We should seek to please Him, not see how far we can go and not displease Him. We should seek in all things to glorify our Lord and not to please ourselves. If we think any one thing in our life is not well pleasing to Him we should always ask Him to help us to overcome in his power. If we are trusting our dear Lord to keep us constantly, if we desire Him as an abiding guest, how can we go where we cannot safely take Him with us? Our feeling should be, "If thy presence go not with us carry us not up hence."

It is an acknowledged fact, I think I may safely say, the tendency of theatrical exhibitions in general is away from the best things in this life and the life to come. If they do not create unchaste and unholly thoughts they most invariably do create an unrest and a distaste for serious thoughtfulness and they unfit the mind and heart for work for God.

I know without having to go to the theatre to find out the fact, that there is a fascination about it that is unsatisfying to the soul's best feelings and that the more one indulges in the farther that soul will drift from God and rest.

And yet the effect upon ourselves is not all, by any means. Are we not "living epistles to be read and known of all men" among whom we live? How then do our lives count for God if these see us enter the doors of the theatre? Is not our influence as a Christian weakened? There can be but one reply to this.

No matter what the effect may be upon thee, my brother; no matter if it may not do thee harm, how about thy weaker brother who may follow thy example and be led on far beyond anything thou may have thought. Do not, I beseech thee, open the door by which some one may enter and go to lengths from which there will be no reclaiming.

St. Paul said, he would not eat meat while the world existed if such eating would cause his brother to offend. In many things we are our brothers' keepers; especially are we responsible for the acts of others when they are looking to us as examples in word and deed.

Then let me say, fellow soldiers, followers of a once crucified but now risen and forever glorified Lord, when you are tempted to darken the doors of a theatre under any circumstances whatever, "Enter not." Refrain not for your own sakes only, but for the sake of others who may be watching you and perhaps regulating their own lives in some measure according to the way in which they see you live and act. "No man liveth to himself."

I believe that to the true Christian the theatre has no charm. There are other and better and more elevating things to occupy the spare time, in the way of social enjoyment and rightful recreation. Pleasures that may properly be entered into without the feeling that the time has been lost or mispent. The Christian, in giving up worldly pleasures that may have at former times been very enjoyable, does not lose anything, far otherwise; a true child of God gladly and joyfully lets all these go because he has that which is far better, and he can still enjoy the things of this life that are innocent, that are elevating, that are pure, and that do not in themselves tend to choke the good seed in the heart which the Master has planted there and which He is cultivating.

There may be some to whom this may come who have, indeed, in former days tasted of the good Word of Life, and the blessedness of a Saviour's love, and who do not now enjoy communion as they once did.

Do not, I beseech you, let the enemy of your soul's peace draw you aside into fleshly gratification, but keep close to the side of the Redeemer and He will shield you from the snares of the Evil One.

"Stand therefore having your loins girt about with Truth, and having on the breastplate of righteousness and your feet shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace. And above all, taking the shield of faith wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked." J. H. Y.

NEW YORK CITY.

[While far from believing that all the inmates of all convents are detained against their will, yet the occurrence of such incidents as the following (which seems to be well authenticated) shows the risk that is incurred in placing young women in situations, where they are practically helpless, and from which in ordinary cases, there is no means of escape, no matter how harsh or improper may be their treatment.—Ed.]

Sidelights on Convent Life.

THE RESCUE OF A NUN.

"A Firm of London Solicitors" communicate to the Times a remarkable story of the rescue of a nun by a member of their firm from a Continental convent. The letter appeared in the Times on Monday, and was in substance as follows:

Last Monday we received a letter, of which the following is a copy, names being omitted: "August 22d, 1891.—My dear Mr. —, I hasten to write to you these few lines because I begin to feel quite frightened and suspicious at things I hear the Superior here say. You said a few years ago that a convent was a goal. I now believe it, and therefore beg of you to be kind enough to come here to —, where I shall be, for I must see you, for I have something very particular to speak of, they won't let me go. I thought I should be obliged to wait till September 24th, but I hope not, for there are others than me that leave, I hear. I hope you will come as soon as you can on receiving this, dear Mr. —. I shall be very anxious till I see you. They must not know of your coming, so please don't write unless to let me know if you cannot, for I am suspicious by them saying, 'Ah! you don't know in what house we may put you!' Then, dear sir, relying on your speedy help, I remain, with kindest regards, yours very sincerely,

"—."

"P. S.—The Superior-General will not reply, it appears, but has her instructions given, I suppose, to the Superior here; therefore I am anxious to know their artifices and falseness. What can they do with me? I have no power, having no one. All the stamps and money are locked up, and I am with nothing. The train from Calais to —, from — straight to —, the convent, a large brick building a step from the station."

On the following day, Mr. —, a member of our firm, left London by the eleven o'clock A.M. train, and travelled straight to the small town where the convent is situated. After leaving his luggage at the small inn, he was guided to the convent by a youth and rang the bell. On the door being opened by a nun, he entered the hall without hesitation, and told her that he wished to see Miss —, and that he had travelled some distance for that purpose. She showed him into a small room off the hall with two doors leading into it, one from the hall and the other from a corridor, and asked him to wait till she inquired of the Mother Superior. In about five minutes the Mother Superior appeared, and upon her saying that she had not the honor of knowing him he gave her his card and said that he had come a long way to see Miss —. She then left him, and in about another five minutes returned with Miss —, who immediately advanced to him and, while shaking hands, said in a low voice in English that she was forbidden to speak to him in that language. He then said to the Mother Superior that Miss — was not happy where she was, and that he had come to make other arrangements for her comfort. The Mother Superior stated that her only help would be done with the permission of the Mother General at — (twenty miles off). Miss — then said that they could go to — and see the Mother General. To this the Mother Superior objected. Miss — then spoke to Mr. — very hurriedly in English, imploring him to help her to leave the convent. Mr. — turned to the Mother Superior and said that Miss — wanted to leave at once, to which she replied that she must first of all speak to Miss — outside in the corridor. The moment they had left the room the Mother Superior locked the door. Mr. — then heard a scuffle going on in the corridor, and feeling that he had been failed tried to force the lock, but without avail. He then went out into the hall by the other door and tried to reach the corridor that way, but the door leading into the corridor was also locked. He managed, however, to wrench it open and got into the corridor. When he got there all was quiet, no one to be seen, and he did not know where to go. Almost immediately afterwards he heard screams, which he followed up, and found they came from a room at the end of this long corridor. He threw open that door and found four nuns surrounding Miss —, trying to stop her screams. They had pulled off her cap, torn her dress, wrenched off the cross of the Order, and were apparently trying to wrestle her down to the ground. He ran forward, pushed all four away, and seized hold of Miss — by the arm and helped her along the corridor into the hall. By that time the four nuns had recovered themselves and tore after Miss — into the hall and wanted to pull her away from Mr. —. He waved his arm violently at them, exclaiming loudly at their attempting to detain an English woman against her will. Fortunately the hall door had not been locked, and he had no further difficulty in getting outside the convent with Miss —. She was in a most dishevelled condition, and as they passed along the road the inhabitants of the village by twos and threes formed and followed them, till at last they had a large number of men, women and children close to them as they entered the inn. Miss — bought from the landlady a bonnet and mantle, which Mr. — paid for, and when Miss — was ready to leave the inn the landlady said it was impossible, as such a crowd had collected in the open square who would sympathize with the people of the convent. However, a carriage was prepared in the court-yard of the inn, and they drove rapidly through the crowd to the railway station, and by a few minutes caught a train and returned to England without delay.

We may also mention that some years ago, Miss — wrote to her brother-in-law to come and take her away from the convent in which she was then staying; that he wrote to the Mother Superior to say he was coming over to remove her; that when he arrived at the convent he found that Miss — had been removed to another convent, and that, although he called in the help of a local magistrate, he was not able to ascertain where she was, and had to return to England without her. Miss — had not been in England for twenty-five years up to last Wednesday, and had been in fifteen different convents, belonging to the same Order, during that period.—The Record.

"Abide in me, and I in you."—These were the words of our Holy Redeemer. How comprehensive and how clear—telling plainly that according to the good rule, that works more than one way—the believer must know of having an experimental knowledge of practical religion before he can have a certain knowledge of abiding in Christ, and Christ by his spirit abiding continually in him. Firstly, it is by obedience to the manifestations of the Holy Spirit that the believer gains a certain knowledge that the work of religion is begun in the heart. Experience being as a handmaid to religion, the good work goes on—"First the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear." By the perfection of the fruit brought forth, it is known that the branch belongeth to the living vine, the vine to the root from which flows sap and nourishment into the branch whereby the fruit is perfected to the glory of God.

Thus fulfilling the Divine command with regard to an abiding in Christ—the disciple finds it needful to observe the command "to watch and pray," and that continually, lest he enter into temptation—for "the spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak"—omitting to do this the branch, in time, becomes withered and useless.

Some, professing to be ministers of the Gospel, who have lost their standing in the Truth, do yet claim to be of the Israel of God—even to be the Saints of the Most High, standing sinless before the Lord—often engaged in using words of prayer, while failing to make it manifest that the Divine promise is fulfilled in them. "Ask what ye will and it shall be done unto you." The watchword seems to be, Beware of counterfeiting the Good. P. R. GIFFORD.

Salmon Fishing at Tasmania.—An interesting exhibition of a combination of fish for the purpose of hunting is thus described: "I had scrambled out along a reef of rocks that runs out into the sea midway between the headlands of a little bay, and whilst examining the geological formation, I noticed a disturbance in the water at my feet. The vivid whiteness of the quartz sand and perfect transparency of the sea enabled me to see clearly to the bottom, and showed a circle or wheel, of twenty feet or more in diameter, formed of a dense shoal of little fish, whirling and splashing round and round with great rapidity, and evidently in great terror. I distinctly saw that they were young King-fish from three to five inches in length, their greenish silvery lustre gleaming brightly through the clear water. Looking carefully for the cause of their panic, I saw, outside this wheel-shoal, a number of salmon, from twelve to sixteen inches long, swimming actively to and fro, and forming a barrier guard, reaching from the end of the reef to the east horn of the bay, and through which the little king-fish could not pass. Presently, as if by a concerted signal, a few salmon from different parts of the cordon dashed suddenly in amongst the mass of king-fish, like a pack of wolves into a flock of sheep, snapping them up in all directions, and covering the water with fragments as the victims darted about wildly in vain efforts to escape. The main body of salmon meanwhile kept up their patrol outside, effectually preventing the scattered shoal from evading their vigilance. Then the salmon which had been in action, and were, we may suppose, gorged with prey, returned to the main body, and all continued to swim to and fro as before, until the depressed shoal of the poor king-fish gathered together again and resumed its wheel-shape, the circle being smaller than at first. This occupied perhaps ten minutes, and then another sort of skirmish took place (probably members of the force who had not dined), and another devouring slaughter ensued, which left a still smaller circle for the wolfish sentinels to round up and keep compact for the attack. No well-trained sagacious sheep-dogs could have performed their work with more orderly, systematic order. The same routine went steadily without cessation, only the circle of the king-fish grew less and less and the surrounding salmon came closer in shore, until from a diameter of twenty feet, the living wheel was reduced to three feet or less. Having watched the unequal warfare for more than two hours, I left the reef for a while, and on my return to look again on the scene of conflict all was still. Both hunters and game had disappeared, and whether the poor little fish were all eaten up, or whether when their numbers had been too small to be worth the trouble of pursuit, the persecuted remnant escaped alive, remains unknown."—Tasmanian Friends and Foes.

CHRISTIANITY (Fashionable),—keeping a pew at some genteel church or chapel, of which ladies pay a civil visit when the weather is fine, when they have got a new bonnet or pelisse to display, and a smart, lively servant to follow them with a prayer-book. They curtsy very low at the mention of the Lord's name, making the bonage of the knees as a substitute for that of the heart; and duly receive the sacrament, which, by a strange perversion of ideas, they look upon as a proof of the sincerity of their belief, and an absolution for the laxity of their practice.

Fashionable male Christianity is demonstrated by an occasional nap in a cushioned and a carpeted pew; in cheerfully paying Easter offerings and church dues; in maintaining a certain decency of appearance; and more especially in hating those who presume to differ in matters of religion.

That they possess the outward and visible signs of Christianity, both sexes exhibit incontestable proofs; but as to the inward and spiritual grace, they leave that to the vulgar and fanatical. They are too polite to travel Zion-land in such company, and would rather sacrifice heaven altogether, than reach it by any ungentle mode. Provided they may be among the exclusives here, they will cheerfully run the risk of being among the excluded hereafter.—Tin Trumpet.

FLOATING DOWN NIAGARA.—Two or three miles above the Falls of Niagara, an Indian canoe was one day observed floating quietly along, with its paddle upon its side.

At first it was supposed to be empty; no one could imagine that a man would expose himself to such a well-known and imminent danger. But a turn in the current showed that it was occupied by an Indian, who was lying sound asleep at the bottom. The spectators were shocked. They shouted to the man to rouse him from his danger, but he did not hear;—again and again they united in cries of alarm, but he was deaf to their warning.

It chanced that the current, which was now hurrying along with increased speed, as it neared the fatal precipice, drove the little boat against a point of rock, with such violence that it was whirled round and round several times.

"He's safe! he's safe!" cried the spectators, joyfully; "the man is safe; that shock must wake him."

But alas! no. Fatigue or perhaps intoxication, had so oppressed his senses, that it seemed more like death than sleep that held him.

It was indeed the sleep of death. All hope was gone; and they hurried along the bank in horror to see the end. It soon came; for the torrent was now rolling so rapidly that they could scarcely keep pace with the moving boat. At length the roar of the water, which had been hitherto almost muffled within the high banks, was borne toward them by a sudden change of the wind, with awful distinctness. This dreadful noise, with which the Indian's ear was familiar, did at last arouse him. He was seen to start up and snatch his paddle. He was too late. The dunning sound which had roused him from sleep, told him it was in vain now to strive for safety by rowing.

Nor, indeed, had he time to try. Upright as he stood, he was carried over the awful precipice; and the boat and its occupant were seen no more.

Floating asleep down Niagara! Hurrying faster and faster to certain death, and dreaming all the while of rest and security! But was this, after all, so sad a sight as that of a sinner floating asleep down the stream of time that is bearing him to eternal woe? "Awake, thou that sleepest!" is the call of Divine mercy. "There is time to escape, if a man will but awake." "Turn ye, turn ye, for why will ye die?" are other words of the same compassionate God. There is time still to turn from sin to God. Almost too late, indeed; not too late yet, as long as a man is in this world, where Jesus died and where his blood is crying for pardon and life to every returning soul.

Reader, are you asleep or awake? Escape for thy life! Flee to Christ and be safe!

Opportunity is the flower of time; and as the stalk may remain when the flower is cut off, so time may remain with us when opportunity is gone.—Words of Life.

Progress of Temperance.—John Atkinson, in his account of a Moorland Parish in Yorkshire, England, speaks of the changes in the drinking habits of the people, as follows:

"I am old enough to remember when the dinner parties of the day met at 2 P. M., and sat with the wife before them, after the removal of the cloth, until 6 or 7 o'clock in the evening, the guests being the country gentlemen, the parson, and other professions; when nobody, not even the parson, was thought much the worse of because of such debauches as these. Less than three-quarters of a century ago that was the state of public and private feeling, both within and touching the class of society customarily spoken of as the clergy and gentry. All that is altered indeed. In other words, public opinion has spoken out on such matters, and her utterance is respected."

President Harrison on Arbitration.—The President had been introduced to the Methodist Ecumenical Conference recently held in Washington made some remarks, in which he expressed the desire of America for peace with all the world. Where "there is present a disposition to subjugate, an aggressive spirit to seize territory, a spirit of national aggrandizement that does not stop to consider the rights of others," he thought the true remedy was the growth of a Christian sentiment characterized by a high sense of justice and by a spirit of love and forbearance. When that prevails the settlement of disputes by arbitration would become easy.

Departures from the Usages and Principles of Free Travel.—A letter from a Friend who has recently been travelling within the limits of the Western and Indiana Yearly Meetings, mentions that they found that in the limits of West Branch Quarterly Meeting, it was the custom for the meetings to have paid pastors, and to have organs in their meeting-houses; that many of them have discontinued holding week-day meetings. At one meeting which he attended (at Middleton) there was an organ, hymn books were raised around, and the audience was requested to sing the 300th hymn. The writer says that the number of members in those meetings appears to be diminishing—which is no cause for surprise.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 12, 1891.

Friends of Baltimore Yearly Meeting, in general, are not favorable to the practice of singing in their meetings for worship; and so far as we know, instruments of music have never been introduced into their meeting-houses. While glacially recognizing their allegiance to the doctrines of our Society as to the spiritual nature of Divine worship, there was some cause for fear, in the recent attendance of their Yearly Meeting, lest their testimony to this vital principle might gradually be weakened through the tolerance given to ministers from other parts to interrupt their proceedings by singing hymns. Friends of Baltimore are very polite and courteous, but it is a mistake to carry this feeling so far as to admit, without rebuke, of the introduction of practices which strongly tend to ritualism and the substitution of performances in the will of man, for that reverent waiting upon God which is the best foundation for the exercise of spiritual worship.

One of the strangers present, apparently with the design of promoting singing, quoted from Barclay's Apology a part of the paragraph in which he says:—"We confess singing to be a part of God's worship, and very sweet and refreshing, when it proceeds from a true sense of God's love in the heart and arises from the Divine influence of the Spirit, which leads souls to breathe forth either a sweet harmony, or words suitable to the present condition." But he omitted the remarks which follow this—and the declaration which Barclay makes, that "as for the formal, customary way of singing, it has no foundation in Scripture, nor any ground in true Christianity."

The formal, customary way is for persons to commit to memory the words of a hymn, or to have them given out by some one in the congregation, and then to sing them according to a tune previously arranged by one skilful in music, and learned by the person who sings. This is the method adopted in all ritualistic worship, whether among Friends or others; and is very different from the sweet harmony that arises "from a Divine influence." It is a well-known fact that the voice is influenced by the emotions of the mind; and it is very conceivable that when the heart is filled with a sense of the love of God, and with praises to Him arising from that sense, there should be a very sweet and refreshing harmony in the voice.

In the account given in "Piety Promoted," of Jennet Stow, of Yorkshire, England, who died in 1702, there is preserved a testimony by Dr. Heathcot, who says that in meetings "the sound of her voice was beyond all the music I ever heard, and the least sound that dropped from her in a meeting, with words, or if only a sigh or sound of any sort, I thought it always brought my mind nearer to the Lord, from whence everything of hers had its sweetness."

Is it not reasonable to believe that it was this harmony arising from the immediate sense of the Lord's power, which R. Barclay acknowledges as a part of true worship, rather than any formal, customary practice of singing, which is an intellectual and not a spiritual performance?

A proposition came to Baltimore Yearly Meeting from Iowa Yearly Meeting to join it in the establishment of a Biblical Institute for the training of ministers and missionaries. This it was proposed to locate near Chicago, where the students, it was thought, might largely defray their expenses by working as First-day School teachers and in other forms of missionary work in that large city. The Meeting declined the invitation, being united in disapproving of such training as a necessary preliminary to the exercise of gospel ministry.

A proposition to appoint delegates to a convention of American Yearly Meetings contained a proviso that disputed questions should be determined by majorities. Baltimore instructed its delegates not to vote, as it was not in the way of deciding questions in that manner.

The earnest feeling that exists on the subject of temperance was manifested by an excited discussion on a proposal looking towards admitting the members to vote for prohibition. While all seemed united in opposing the saloon, there was a caution felt by some against committing the Yearly Meeting to any political action, and the case resulted in the adoption of a minute, advising the members to promote the prohibition of the manufacture and traffic in intoxicating liquors by religious, moral and other means consistent with Christian principles.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Both Houses of Congress convened in Washington on the 7th inst. The House adjourned, at noon, until the 8th, and then organized by the election of Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, for Speaker.

The State Department has received a dispatch from United States Minister Reid, announcing the repeal by France of the prohibition of American pork.

The Secretary of the Interior on the 5th inst. settled the long contested case of the Las Vegas land grant, in Mexico. A new survey will be made, and this, it is claimed, will open to settlement from 550,000 to 570,000 acres.

A statement prepared at the United States Treasury shows that there has been a net increase of $12,769,909 in circulation since Eleventh Month 1, and a net increase of $8,867,045 in money and bullion in the Treasury.

A reply has been received at Minneapolis from the Russian Consul in New York "favorable to the gift of a cargo of flour by American millers to the starving peasants of Russia," and thirteen cars of flour have already been subscribed in Minneapolis alone.

An Indianapolis dispatch says that the report of Professor T. Mendenhall, Chief of the United States Geological Survey, concerning the Indiana-Ohio boundary line, has been submitted to the Governors of both States. Ohio had disputed the correctness of the Indiana line, claiming that it was too far east of the northern extremity of the State. The survey of Professor Mendenhall and assistants shows that it is in the most proper place at that point and converging to the proper point at the southern. This would give Ohio nearly one hundred square miles of Indiana Territory.

A bulletin issued by the Pension Office gives the population of Alaska as 31,795, of whom 4,303 are whites, 1,819 mixed Russians and natives, 23,274 Indians, and 2,463 Mongolians. The Arctic District was not enumerated.

A careful survey of the actual state of affairs in Kansas discloses the fact that every acre of available land in the State has increased in value 25 per cent. during the last twelve months.

A disaster occurred on the New York and New England Railroad, at East Thonon, Connecticut, early on the morning of the 4th inst., no less than three trains, a freight and two passenger, being completely destroyed. The accounts as to the cause of the accident vary, but it is known that a "Southbridge collision, covering the track of the New York and New England Railroad, immediately afterwards the east-bound Norwich road express, running at full speed, crashed into the wreck, and following it the Long Island express was added to the confused mass. The wreck at once took fire, this adding to the horrors of the disaster. Three lives were lost and several persons were seriously injured, one probably fatally.

A man who gives his name as H. D. Wilson, went into the office of Russell Sage, the millionaire broker, on Broadway, New York, at noon on the 4th inst., and made a demand for $1,200,000. When the demand was refused, he turned upon the floor a package of dynamite. The explosion which followed destroyed the office and part of the building, killed the bomb-thrower and Benjamin F. Norton, a clerk, and injured six others. C. W. Osborn, Sage's secretary and treasurer, and Frank Robertson, a clerk of Imbre & Co., who happened to be in the office, fatally. Russell Sage himself was not seriously hurt.

The New York correspondent of the Public Ledger of this city, speaking of a sermon delivered in New York City on the 6th inst., on the "New Theology," says:—"In many respects his views suggested those of Swedenborg, set forth in his discourse on the reason, and like him he referred to the Friends as keeping alive a belief which other denominations are now borrowing, that God's spirit still speaks to men."

The number of deaths reported in this city last week was 410; which is 25 less than the previous week, and 24 more than the corresponding week last year. Of the whole number, 214 were males and 196 females; 48 died of consumption; 47 of diseases of the heart; 44 of pneumonia; 33 of diphtheria; 21 of convulsions; 16 of cancer; 14 of croup; 13 of scarlet fever; 11 of bronchitis; 10 of marasmus and 10 of inflammation of the brain.

Merchandise.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 101; 4's, 110½ a 117½; coupon, 117½ a 118; currency 6's, 101 a 102.

COTTON was quiet but steady, on a basis of 5½ c. per pound for middling uplands.

FEED.—Winter bran, in bulk, $19.50 a $20.50 per ton; spring bran, in bulk, $18.50 a $19.50 per ton.

Flour.—Western and Pennsylvania super, $3.60 a $3.75; do, do, extras, $3.90 a $4.25; No. 2 winter family, $4.25 a $4.50; Pennsylvania, roller, straight, $4.50 a $4.75; Western winter, clear, $4.50 a $4.75; do, do, straight, $4.75 a $4.90; winter patent, new, $5.00 a $5.25; Minnesota, clear, $4.65 a $4.90; do, straight, $4.90 a $5.10; do, patent, $5.10 a $5.40; do, do, favorite brands, $5.50. Rye flour was dull and quiet in sympathy with the decline in rye. We quote $4.25 a $4.50; Western winter, for Pennsylvania, as to quality. Buckwheat flour moved slowly at $2.10 to $2.20 per 100 pounds for new.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, $1.02 a $1.02½.

No. 2 mixed corn, 50½ a 51 cts.

No. 2 white oats, 40½ a 40 cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, none here; good, 4½ a 5 cts.; medium, 4 a 5 cts. per head; 4 a 4½ cts.; common, 3½ a 3¾ cts.; culls, 3 a 2½ cts.; fat cows, 2 a 3 cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5½ a 5½ cts.; good, 4½ a 5 cts.; medium, 4¼ a 4½ cts.; common, 3½ a 4 cts.; culls, 1½ a 3 cts.; lambs, 3½ a 6½ cts.

HOGS.—Good Westerns, 51 a 51½ cts.; other Western, 51 a 51½ cts.

FOREIGN.—Dr. Brouardel, the noted medical authority of Paris, states that the epidemic of influenza has increased, and that deaths from the disease occurred in that city, week before last, by the hundreds.

A dispatch received in London on the 7th inst., says it amounted to 13,000 persons were ill with influenza in Hamburg during the last week of the month; however, few were in number. The eldest son of the Crown Prince of Denmark is seriously ill with influenza in Copenhagen. The epidemic is mild in that city, but is spreading. The Supreme Court has been closed on account of the illness of the judges.

Francisco, Cal., 7th inst.—The Emperor of Brazil, died in London on the 4th inst. The event, which was not unexpected, has caused sincere grief throughout Europe, but has been devoid of political effect. The Emperor died as he had lived, quietly and simply.

Doctor Kaiser, of the Colonial Department, announced that 13,000 German Reichsmark, on the 1st inst., had been sold to a syndicate for the sum of 3,750,000 marks. The syndicate has already paid 250,000 marks as an earnest of their intention to complete the purchase. It was provided that if the sale was not completed this sum of 250,000 marks would be forfeited to the Government.

On the 6th inst., report was received of a terrible mining disaster at St. Etienne, in the Department of Loire, and the centre of one of the richest coal fields in France. An explosion of fire damp occurred at noon that day in one of the numerous coal pits in the region, and many of the workers were unable to escape from the mine. According to advices so far received 73 men perished in the pit.

A formal announcement was made on the 3d inst., of the removal of the prohibition on American pork by the Austrian Government.

On the 1st inst., in the German Reichstag, the Austrian Reichsrath, the Minister of Commerce announced that in spite of the commercial policy of the United States, the Austrian Government had decided to take part officially in the Chicago World's Fair.

The London Chronicle's Shanghai correspondent telegraphs that the rebels in China have met a complete, crushing defeat.

Advices received from Japan, at Vancouver, by the steamship Empress of China, place the number killed by the recent earthquakes at 7,500, and the injured at 10,120, with 89,630 buildings totally, and 28,625 partially destroyed.

A dispatch was received in London on the 7th inst., from Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil, stating that all signs of discontent have disappeared and that everything is quiet throughout the State.

The volcano of Colima, Mexico, was in violent eruption on the 3d inst., and the city of Colima was covered with ashes.—The inhabitants were greatly terrified.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Selections from the Journal of William Evans.

1848.—"At Germantown Meeting, I felt engaged to revive the statement, that in certain places, Jesus did not many mighty works, because of their unbelief; and to declare that to be the cause why there is so little vital religion among many professors of Christianity in this day. They do not believe in the manifestations of the Lord Jesus, by his Spirit in their hearts. They profess to own Him as their Lord and Saviour, but deny Him, in refusing to do his will; and while they continue in sin, they cannot, in truth, call Him their Saviour; seeing no man can call Him Lord but by the Holy Spirit; and those who are turning their back upon the convictions of the Holy Spirit, cannot experience it to give them faith in the Son of God. Very unlooked for, the spring of the ministry was opened for the benefit of some present."

"Of latter time this spring, in our meeting, as regards myself at least, has been much shut up; so that I have mourned over myself, and had fears whether a worldly spirit, or a stupefying lethargy, was not spreading over us. It seems, at times, almost impossible to get under a proper travail of spirit, in which Divine life is felt to arise and quicken the soul; qualifying it to bow in reverence before the Father of mercies, and to put up prayer to Him, in the Spirit that helpeth the infirmities of those who devotedly wait upon Him. May we be enabled to keep hold of the shield of faith, and to press onward through the difficulties that are to be contended with; looking for the renewed manifestations of the light of the Lord, and keeping the faith, that He will again visit his people, and lift up their heads above the afflictions of this day of secret and sore conflict.

"Tenth Month 8th. This morning I had an intimation to go to Newton Meeting, which I have had no concern to visit for a long time. It appeared to me while sitting with them, that all the inventions of man, out of the Truth, would fail to produce solid happiness, and a holy serenity to the soul. Nothing could give this state of mind to any, but obedience to the will of God, made known by the clear insinuating of the Light of Christ. I felt a strong and affectionate solicitude for all, that they might entirely yield to his convictions, and be thereby brought out of darkness and cruel bondage into the liberty of the children of God. A fresh qualification was administered to set before them, many of the truths of salvation, and to labor fervently with them, in the language of persuasion, to give up to the Lord's manifested will. I came home peaceful, poor and empty."

"I received a letter from a Friend in Great Britain, giving a view of the state of the ministry among Friends there, and the great defection from the life and power of religion among many. It is mournful to reflect upon the state of things in this country and in England, among the members of our religious Society. How the will and contrivance of man, are at work, to manage its concerns, and to govern, instead of the Head of the church. Those who cannot act without the renewed putting forth of the Divine hand, are borne down in some places, and obliged to submit to silent, secret suffering, because they see no way to obtain relief. But surely as they keep a single eye to the Lord, in the faith and patience of the saints, He will hear their cry, sustain them under deep affliction, for his name and cause's sake, and in his time, grant deliverance; when the horse and his rider will be thrown into the sea. And it will be found, sooner or later, a fearful thing to have been withstanding the Lord's suffering children, turning judgment backward, and exalting that which He has not ordained to be set up."

"In some of our meetings for worship, of latter time, the world seemed to absorb the minds of very many, so that we are in danger of being left by the Head of the church; and without his life-giving presence, what will all our assemblies together avail us? A few years ago, we had many exercised, experienced Friends, who were thoroughly acquainted with the nature of true, spiritual worship, and the labor that is indispensable in our meetings, that the spirit and things of the world may be kept out, and the bubblings up of the well of Divine life may be known in every heart. Figuratively speaking, they dug as with their staves in their hands, while the secret breathing of their souls was, 'Spring up, oh well, sing ye unto it.' We, who were then much their juniors, did not so much feel the weight of the exercise, while we were favored by the Lord, and partook of the help and travail of their spirits. I have felt engaged to invite the attention of the people to the nature of the worship which our Lord opened to the woman of Samaria, which is to be performed in spirit and in truth; and which must consequently be between God, who is a Spirit, and the soul of man. And if we are a worshipping assembly, every one must be engaged for himself in this worship. It does not consist in meeting together, and sitting in silence, though these are necessary preparatives to public, spiritual worship; but every one must wait upon the Lord, to experience Him to come into the heart, and give ability to ask aright for living bread, and for those things we need, in the way of Divine instruction and help; and thereby be prepared to return thanksgiving and praise, for his condescension and goodness. A word of warning was also given to the young people, to keep the watch wherever they go, that they may not lose the little strength they have gained by faithfulness; for Satan is constantly seeking to destroy the good work. It is a source of grief to the laborers, to behold plants dwindling, and not bearing fruit, over whom they had watched; and whom they had secretly desired, might become fellow-workers in the Lord."

"I have passed through a state of great strip-pedness for several weeks past. Such dispensations are truly humiliating; and though a great trial to endure, bring those who dare not look for relief from any source than the Lord alone, to bow very low, and endeavor to draw near to Him, with their hearts panting after the living God, as the hart panteth after the water-brook. How evident to them is it at such seasons, that they are nothing; that there is no good but what comes from Christ; no power to do good but what He inspires the soul with, and that it is not at our will to command the seasons when they shall be dispensed. This must be waited for in abasement and abhorrence of self; by which we are taught that Christ alone can carry on the work in us and for us, and qualify us when He pleases, to hand the bread that He gives, to others."

"At the evening meeting, my mind was introduced to much feeling with the young people, on account of the many and various temptations to which they are exposed; and the sad consequences of quenching the Spirit and its convictions in their hearts. I was led to remind them that there was no stopping-point in the two ways; in one or other of which they must be walking; the broad road that leads to destruction, or the narrow way that leads to everlasting life. If we keep in the latter, it will, as the just man's path, shine more and more unto the perfect day; but in the former, we shall wander further and further from the Heavenly Father's house, and grow darker and more hardened in transgression and sin. They were warned of the inevitable danger, in this way, of finally slighting and despising religion and serious persons, and of falling into practices which they had never intended to adopt. They could not decide beforehand how far they would go; but might become familiarized with things, which at one time they would have abhorred. After having come under Satan's influence, they have no power to release themselves from his grasp: nothing but the almighty arm of the Saviour can deliver them; and should they continue to deny and reject Him, they would have no ground to hope for his help. Parents were also reminded that the deviations of the children were, at times, in part to be attributed to their want of firmness and faithfulness. That, like Eli, they might warn, but they had not sufficiently restrained them. The young people were tenderly expostulated with, and affectionately entreated, that when favored with the visitations of Divine light, showing them where they are, and to what they are hastening, to make a stand, turn their back on the tempter, and follow Christ: who would take them out of the broad road, and introduce them through the strait gate into the narrow way; where they would enjoy peace and substantial happiness; grow in grace; and in their language and conduct, invite others to follow them as they followed Christ."

"To two young Friends who called at our house, I felt drawn, in tender affection, to hold up the great importance of being brought into and walking in that path, which the vulture's eye hath not seen, nor the lion's whelp trodden therein; neither shall any ravenous beast go up thereon, it shall be called a way—a way of holiness, and the ransomed and redeemed shall walk therein; and as they are faithful to Him, who casts up and leads into this way, they shall come to Zion, with songs, and everlasting joy shall be upon their heads. They were invited to be obedient to Him who anoints the spiritual eye to see this path, that they might experience Him to take up his abode with them, and to join himself to them in a perpetual covenant that would never be broken on his part, while they kept faithful to their Lord and Master. May they be brought into this covenant, and be made preachers of righteousness, in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation."

"This has been a day of deep, inward conflict, without being able to attain much, to comfort the tossed mind. If in our religious meetings we are not unitedly engaged to labor for the meat that endureth unto everlasting life, the spirit of anti-christ will have the ascendancy in many, who will be far from performing that worship which is in spirit and in truth. Individual travail of soul is indispensable to the life of a meeting, and to the preservation of the members as branches of the true Vine. Although man, by his own efforts merely, cannot keep himself under this exercise, yet he is bound to seek for Divine help, to enable him to wait upon the Lord for the appearance of his life-giving presence, and to believe that it is indispensable to his life and growth in the Truth. When we are permitted to toil all night, and to feel, at last, as if we had taken nothing, and fears assail us, whether we shall not be altogether left by the Master, it is a favor to remember that there is a portion of suffering to be filled up for the body's sake; and if in this way, we are participating in it, to a small degree, it is enough; that in this travail of spirit, we may be made ministers of life to other seeking ones."

"At Arch Street Meeting, I was led to speak of the doctrine and duty of inward, reverent, silent waiting before the Lord, as of essential importance to the growth of the true believer. That no man can be a true follower of Christ without it; for if he be one of his disciples, he will feel bound, day by day, and oftener, to wait upon the Lord for the renewal of his strength.

It was practised by the holy ancients; who sat upon their watch-tower, and waited to see what the Lord would say unto them, and what they should answer when they were reproved. In this humble, reverent frame, He often condescends to show us our weakness, or something wherein we are not coming up to the pattern of perfection, which our Lord set before us."

If you would be healthy, be good; and if you would be good, be wise; and if you would be wise, be devout and reverent; for the fear of God is the beginning of wisdom.

Music and Singing.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

[Some months ago, we received from a Friend in Illinois, a pamphlet in manuscript, written by a member of Western Yearly Meeting (Progressive), detailing in an interesting manner, the gradual development of ritualism in the Society of Friends. From this manuscript we insert the following remarks on Music and Singing—believing they will be found instructive.—Ed.]

Vocal and instrumental music, with all its fascinating temptations, was the first subtle influence used by Satan in starting the entering wedge of ritualism in our Society.

I believe most in our Society are agreed, that during the last generation, and perhaps some time before, our Society was at a very low ebb, spiritually. The consciences of many of our members, having lost in a measure the restraining and preserving power of the holy Spirit, relaxed into a very loose and easy-going state.

Many who are yet living, of my own age, and older, can go back in memory and pick out many just such Friends, who first gave way to this temptation, and then to that—until finally we found them so far along, as to have their children taught to sing; and finally became so bold and reckless as to procure pianos and set them up in their parlors.

Others seeing that these bold ones were left unmolested by the Society in their wanderings from the fold, soon followed their example, and pianos became quite common in Friends' families who were able to own them.

These Friends seeing their numbers largely increased, became still more bold, and then for the first time did they proclaim or make known what their (real) intentions were. This was nothing less than to transfer this "child of lust" from the world and the domain of Satan where it belonged, into the church, and (by some magic manoeuvre) set it up as a concern of the Society, directed by the Holy Spirit.

The Friends of that day having this "revolution" in charge were able, shrewd men, as are those holding the same relative position to-day. If this movement had really emanated from the Lord, and was a religious concern, we should expect to have seen some of these Friends arise in Indiana Yearly Meeting at Richmond, Ind., where this "child of lust" was born, and frankly bring this concern before the meeting, by stating that they believed the time had come, and our Heavenly Father was calling upon them to introduce vocal and instrumental music as a part of our worship to Him. But history shows us there was no such procedure as that in the Yearly Meeting; the managers were too shrewd for that; but the tactics were exactly the same as those being used to-day by the managers of the "progressive" movement in relation to the ordinances. The question of music was continually pressed upon individual Friends—its use socially, defended and extolled by men high up in the Society, until finally they concluded the poison was sufficiently diffused through the arteries of the Church body, to make it safe for them to make a slight move upon the Church organization. This was done in the form of a proposition before the Freedmen's Committee (a body of Friends appointed by the Yearly Meeting), to use singing as an aid to their work among the colored people in the South. This proposition took most members of the committee by surprise, and after being discussed a little while, a Friend who has since gone to his long home, arose and solemnly said: "This is the first attempt of Satan to get an entrance of the wedge of ritualism in our Society, and I solemnly believe if you allow this entrance to-day, the time will come, and not many years hence, when Friends will attempt to worship God by steam." These were thought by some, at the time, to be very rash and idle words. But I have no doubt at all, that they were genuine words of prophecy, and think many will agree with me, that in the light of the history of our Society since then, the prospect is favorable to its complete fulfillment.

The Eastern Shore of Chesapeake Bay.

The Epistle from Maryland in 1765 mentions that they had appointed some Friends to attend Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, in reference to the proposal of uniting the two meetings.

The reply states that Friends of Philadelphia approved of the proposal of Maryland Friends annually to send persons to represent them, so that when needful, advice and help might be rendered. It also speaks of the labor extended by Philadelphia Monthly Meeting to those of its members who had taken up arms.

In 1766 Maryland Friends inform that "our testimony against enslaving our fellow-creatures so far prevails, that Friends are generally clear of importing, buying or selling any of those people."

In 1767 they say, of the slaves, "There is a hope that justice and equity will be more and more extended to that injured and oppressed people; and we believe no acknowledgments will for the future be received from those who purchase, short of the freedom of the slave so bought."

In 1768 they give the pleasing information that during the preceding year their members had liberated 23 of their slaves.

The Epistle of 1769 states that the work of emancipating their slaves is progressing.

In 1771 Friends of Maryland make a pathetic acknowledgment, "that notwithstanding we have had line upon line and precept upon precept, with faithful laborers sent amongst us, time after time for our good, yet too many in profession with us continue to trample on the testimony of truth in various respects, which is cause of real sorrow to the few who are conscientiously concerned and enabled to walk in the narrow path of self-denial, which is the alone way to peace."

The reply to this epistle expresses the desire that the concerned remnant "may be enabled to bear a faithful testimony to the cause of Truth. And we earnestly beseech that we all may keep a watchful eye over our own spirits."

The Epistle from Maryland in 1772 is rather more hopeful in its tone. It states that they are clear of importing, buying or selling negroes, and earnestly desire that way be opened in the hearts of the people more generally for the release of those unhappy captives. It also says there is a growth of our Christian testimony against paying the demands of hiring priests.

The Epistle to Maryland of the same year suggests the propriety of endeavoring to promote the cause of Truth by the distribution of religious books.

In 1774 the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia addressed a general epistle to Friends of the other provinces, evidently called forth by the increasing troubles with the English Government, which eventually led to the war of the revolution. This paper refers to the manner in which their predecessors in religious profession had with Christian boldness, but peaceably, protested with the rulers under whom they lived against oppressive laws and unjust treatment; and extends this caution: "If we should be restrained or deprived of some of our rights and privileges, let us carefully guard against being drawn into the vindication of them, or seeking redress by any measures which are not consistent with our religious profession and principles, nor with the Christian patience manifested by our ancestors in such times of trial."

Friends in Maryland in 1775 say, that divers of their members had been nominated on committees designed to draw them into a participation in the conflict between the colonies and the parent country, but that they had declined acting therein.

In 1776 they "have with sorrow to observe that some under our name in divers places have joined in the present prevailing commotions," against some of whom Friends had been under a necessity publicly to testify. Divers of their members had manumitted their slaves during the past year.

In 1778 Friends in Maryland report considerable progress in the manumission of the slaves; and that there are considerable sufferings for the testimony against war.

The Epistles of 1779 refer to the heavy sufferings in loss of property endured by Friends on account of their testimony against war.

Frequent allusions are made to this subject in succeeding years; but it is comforting to find that Maryland Friends in 1783 are able to say that their members "have generally endeavored to maintain our Christian testimony against wars and bloodshed, by refusing a compliance with requisitions for the support thereof;" and that divers had joined them by conviction during the past year.

In 1787 a proposition was sent to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, that Deer Creek and Pike Creek Monthly Meetings should be transferred to Maryland Yearly Meeting. This was referred to a committee, who proposed that it be left a year for further consideration.

In 1788 a number of Friends were sent from Maryland to Philadelphia, who united with a committee of the latter Yearly Meeting in deliberating on the proposed change in some of the meetings. After a careful consideration of the subject, this joint committee proposed, that the two Quarterly Meetings of Warrington and Fairfax and the Monthly Meeting of Deer Creek be annexed to Maryland Yearly Meeting; and that the Monthly Meetings of Duck Creek and Mother Kiln, in Delaware, be joined to the Quarterly Meeting on the Eastern Shore of Maryland, and that said Quarterly Meeting become a branch of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

This was agreed to by the parties interested and the arrangement consummated in the following year.

In 1790 and subsequent years, the Friends residing on the Eastern Shore of the Chesapeake no longer were included in the Yearly Meeting of Maryland; but they sent their reports direct to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, under the title of the Southern Quarter. From these reports we can glean an occasional item of information.

Thus we learn, in 1795, that a new meeting-house had been built at Greensborough, in Caroline County, in place of one at Nine Bridges; one at Duck Creek Cross Roads in place of that at Duck Creek town; and one at Milford, in place of that at Three Runs.

In 1798 notice is sent of the establishment of two or three meetings among those newly convinced (the Nicholites, who have already been spoken of).

In 1801 we are told, that North-West Fork Monthly Meeting had been established.

In an adjustment of the quotas, made in 1804, the proportion assigned to Southern Quarter was but 4 per cent, indicating that it was then the smallest of the Quarterly Meetings. It is probable that succeeding years did not witness much increase, for in 1824 report was made, that during the year, ten meetings had been dropped at some of their smaller branches. There is, however, an evidence of religious life in the proposal sent up the same year from the Southern Quarter, that members who hire slaves should be treated as offenders.

The Minutes of the Yearly Meeting in 1827 furnish evidences of the unsettlement in the Society occasioned by, or connected with the preaching of Elias Hicks. His views appear to have been accepted by many of the leading members in the Southern Quarter; and as several of those who represented that Body in the Meeting for Sufferings were decided opponents of his doctrines, it concluded in 1826 to make a change in its representation, and sent to that Body the names of some members to be substituted for others, who had previously acted. The Meeting for Sufferings declined to receive the newly nominated persons as among their members, taking the ground that the discipline and practice of the Society authorized Quarterly Meetings to make new appointments, only when vacancies occurred by death, resignation or neglect of duty. The Southern Quarter complained to the Yearly Meeting of this refusal; but no action in the matter was taken by the Superior Meeting, when the differences that existed were about culminating in a separation, which took place before another year rolled around.

So general was the defection in the Peninsula, that no reports were received from the Southern Quarter in 1828. And the Yearly Meeting decided to lay down that Quarter and attach its members to Concord Quarterly Meeting.

In 1829, the few remaining members who did not go with the current, were gathered into a single Monthly Meeting, to be held alternately at Thridhaven and Motherkiln. And in 1831 it was stated that Motherkiln Preparative Meeting, and the meetings for worship of Duck Creek, Little Creek, Camden, Milford, Marshy Creek, Choptank, Bayside, Tuckahoe, Tuckahoe Neck, Chester Neck, Cecil, and Head of Chester, had all been laid down—so far as their official connection with our organization was concerned. Meetings were no doubt continued for a time at several of these places, and indeed are to this day, but in subordination to the Yearly Meeting which separated from ours in 1827.

In 1832 report was made that Motherkiln Monthly Meeting had been laid down and its members joined to Wilmington Monthly Meeting, and that the meetings for worship at Motherkiln, Centre and North-West Fork had also been laid down.

Other meetings were dropped in succeeding years—until now we have no meetings sustained south of Wilmington.

The testimony of Gwynedd Monthly Meeting concerning Ann Roberts, says, "Such was the Divine savor which usually accompanied her discourse and conversation, one could rarely be an hour with her, without sensible edification."

A Source of Evil to our Farmers Families.

From the free association with strange hired men into which farmers almost without exception force their children, springs a greater crop of insidiously noxious and corrupting influences than from almost all other sources put together.

The situation was very different when, as in former times, the farmer's assistants were his neighbors or the sons of his neighbors. The character and antecedents of these helpers were known. They were the companions of the children in the school or of the parents in the affairs of the church and town, and association upon the farm between employer and employed was as free as it naturally would be between neighbors of common pursuits, duties and ends. But these were very different conditions from those which exist to-day.

No change has come over the social construction of New England more discouraging than this. There are fewer spare sons coming of age on the farms, and hiring out to the neighbors for a beginning, as very likely their fathers did—because the average family is not as large as it used to be. And where there are such sons they almost invariably leave the farm at the first opportunity and seek a start in other pursuits. The farmer is now forced to draw his help from wholly different sources. His choice is confined to strangers of whose character and life he can know nothing. More often they are stragglers from the cities or wandering immigrants of other language, customs and habits. Nor can he, here be too discriminating in his selection, if he would obtain help. The farmers of the Connecticut valley hereabouts have not been employing the poor, degraded immigrants offered by contractors because they prefer such labor or because it is cheap, for it is the dearest labor in the market for them; but because they can get no other. The factories and cities have bid against them so effectually that even such miserable help is hard to get at wages the farmers can afford to pay, as was shown by a recent bulletin of the State Board of Agriculture.

But if the farmer cannot choose the men he must have about him on the farm, he need not bring them to his daily board and set them up in the midst of the family circle as the daily associates of his wife and children. The tragedies of blood which have sprung from this thoughtless custom are very numerous, but as nothing to the unseen and unknown soul-murder and spoliation suffered by the children at the hands of depraved men into whose association they have so often been forced. It is true that to provide separately for the hired help of a farm must entail extra cost and household labor of which there is already too little to spare. But the farmer cannot afford to do otherwise. He need not necessarily build another house for the quartering of employes. Some part of his own house can ordinarily be set apart for this use, a separate entrance be constructed, and the provision of separate meals should not be a great burden. There is of course, nothing in the mere relation of employer to employed to dictate such a course, but so long as the farmer is obliged to have upon his place men of unknown character and antecedents, whose qualities have not been proved to him by long acquaintance, he owes it to his family that they be not admitted to fall standing in the household.—Springfield Republican.

I LONG to be more freed from everything that sets the reasoning part at work; prayer, watching and contemplation, could I reach it, seems the most earnest longing of my mind.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

EXHORTATION.

Hast thou found, oh soul immortal,
Found thy destiny?
As thou enters life's stern portal
It will welcome thee.

Good and ill the paths before thee,
And the years shall tell,
Through results that surely follow,
If thou choosest well.

Mar not with thy careless trifling
The eternal years;
Thou can not erase the record
Even with thy tears.

Let no greed of gain e'er tempt thee,
Or the thirst for power
Draw thee from the work God wills thee,
In temptation's hour.

Many an influence set in motion
Thoughtlessly by thee,
Are like circles ever widening
To eternity.

As thy sowing so thy reaping,
But 'tis not alone;
Other souls must glean with weeping
What is headless sown.

Thou art only safe when trusting
In a power Divine,
That with infinite adjusting
Cares for thee and thine.

For the mysteries of thy being
If thou solve them well,
Are beyond thy mortal seeing:
Only faith can tell.

Then doubt not but what his wisdom
Daily plans for thee
Just the work and just the duty
That will safest be.

Though the way seem low and humble,
Follow at his call;
True obedience cannot stumble
Trusting God for all.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

TRADITIONAL VIRTUE WILL NOT ANSWER FOR US.

BY C. S. COPE.

We have heard of rest in Jesus,
We have heard of peace with God,
The tranquillity that eseth
The burden of life's road.

We hear of ancient martyrs,
At the stake and on the tree;
The humble faith of holy lives
With longing eyes we see.

We read the abtest writings,
The experience of men,
Who in the ways of wisdom
Have wielded well the pen.

Our companions we select
From the holy, just and pure,
Who for virtue claim respect,
Whether rich or whether poor.

We bow when holy messengers
Proclaim the Word of God;
Rejoice to hear the sacred truths,
The Gospel spread abroad.

We love to linger by the couch
Where Christians meet their doom,
And hear them speak about the land
That lies beyond the gloom.

To hear them with their latest breath
Begin the eternal song,
Triumphant pass the gates of death
The heavenly host among.

All of these things are excellent
And all of needs should be;
But they cannot sustain thy soul,
Or give thee life to me.

The rays of sunshine they receive
Can never warm thy heart;
The food and nourishment they have,
To me their strength impart.

My friend enjoys the luscious fruit
And tells me it is so;
But I must taste it for myself
Before I truly know.

No outward sense can reach it
Though an angel from on high,
Should write for us in golden lines
The glories of the sky.

As she that touched the garments hem—
Bartimeus by the way,
By faith and works alone we find
The healing power like they.

The life that died through Adam's fall
Must be reviv'd again;
And that which lived through Adam's fall
In us again be slain.

The key of David must unlock;
That Lydia's heart unlocked,
And to the holy man all
Their sacred truths revealed.

That voice must speak again that spoke
When Samuel heard the call;
That Moses, Jacob, Abraham heard
And persecuting Saul.

That hand must lead that led the three
Where seven-fold vengeance flamed;
Changed victims for the gallows-tree,
And Chaldean lions tamed.

The light that lit Arabia's sands
Must designate the road;
To guide the Christian caravan,
The saving grace of God.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

OPTIMISM.

BY L. C. RAY.

You told me life was a lyran't stern
Who would steal the gold of my dreams away,
Dim my visions of Truth and burn
My idols till nothing was left but clay;
That he'd take my dead and bury them deep—
Cover their graves with the cloas of doubt,
Till pain and sorrow and clouds of fear
Shut forever the sunlight out.

It is false! I can laugh the lie to scorn.
I have read the mystery through and through.
For Life is Love—or we were not born,
And love gives life to our dead anew.

You said the world was dark and cold,
And that nowhere at all was a God to hear
When the voice of our prayer or praise arose,
Throughout the length of the weary year.
But how can I count your story true,
While I stand on a warm and golden strand,
And note how the dark of a long night through
I was led by the touch of a guiding Hand.

And now, should you grant me my child's belief
In a God who hears e'en the raven's cry—
Who comforts his children in pain and grief,
In joy and gladness alike is nigh;
How can your heart be taught to pray
Out of its unbelief to Him,
When blind and dumb in its house of clay
Your soul sits ever in shadows dim?

I am all unlearned in the lore you prize,
And cannot argue the doubtful way;
But I hold my flowers are sweet and wise
When they trust for the warmth and light of day.
Trust and grow till the sod is burst
And they bud and bloom in the golden light;
Filling with rain and dew their thirst,
Never dreaming of death or night.

How can I think the day would burst
In a thousand brilliant, opaline dyes,
If, in the plan of the Infinite First,
For you and me there had been no eyes?
And if we should borrow the wise counsel
Of things that feel and climb to the light,
I think our hearts would be taught to pray:
"Lord! that we may receive our sight."

FROM THE "SUNDAY-SCHOOL TIMES."

A young girl who had for years looked out with interest on the heaven and the earth, with the thought, in her mind and in the mind of her parents, that she saw there all that any human eye could see, was found, by an incidental disclosure, to be near-sighted in a degree before unsuspected. Being taken to an oculist, she was fitted with glasses; and as she looked upward and outward with these new aids to vision, she saw before her "a new heaven and a new earth."
The myriad stars by night, and the limitless profound of the blue sky by day, were all new to her; and so was the far reach of the landscape perspective toward the distant horizon on every side. Where had been only a dim haze before, there was now distinctness of form and color in a beauty hitherto undreamed of.

So it is with many a soul that has had dimness of vision concerning earth and heaven in all the years of life, until brought to look out upon the universe with new eyes of faith. A new heaven and a new earth is before that soul, and the first heaven and the first earth are passed away.
There is no longer a confusing haze over the face of earth's landscape, or over the face of the heaven above the earth. The clear blue of the sky is seen, back of the passing clouds by day;
and the light of the countless stars shines down, when the night has come. And on every side, by night and by day, there are signs of order and of beauty, that were unperceived before this transforming vision was granted to the out-looker.

A traveller in a new country was threading his way through a tangled wood, in doubt as to his bearings, and seemingly shut in on every side by barriers to free progress. As he looked up, he saw only a small patch of distant sky, and even that was often hidden by a passing cloud. As he looked forward or backward, or on either hand, he saw no sign of road or path, of open country or of human occupancy. It was a dreary life he was leading in that lonely forest, and no other life seemed possible to him.
But as he pressed on he saw signs of a rising ground, and he went upward as he went forward.
Soon he was above the forest, and at last he stood on a mountain peak, with a wonderful outlook before him. He saw a new heaven and a new earth; a new sky, with only here and there a fleeting cloud; a new outreach of country, with meadow and field and village near and far;
while the wood in which he had been bewildered was but a limited vestige of the earlier time.
Paths and roadways threaded the landscape hither and thither, and there were signs of busy life and beckonings to human fellowship on every side.

How many times this experience has been verified in the spiritual sphere of the children of God! A new stand-point of outlook, on some newly attained peak of opportunity and privilege and responsibility, has disclosed a new heaven and a new earth to him who but just before was struggling hopelessly in a tangled wood of difficulty. Where all was bewilderment, all is now openness and certainty. Let him who would despair if nothing better than the present heaven and the present earth were before him, take heart in the sure promise of a new heaven and a new earth to him who loves and trusts!

Indian Question—As It Was.

To an old man revisiting after many years' absence the country of his youth, the scenes of former days will come back with all the vividness of well drawn pictures. So as I sit in the room of a Chattanooga hotel, in sight of the world-famous Lookout Mountain, on the slopes of which blue and gray contended for the mastery; in sight of Mission Ridge, where a conflict still bloodier raged; almost in sight of the Chickamauga battle ground, my mind goes back far beyond the war-like scenes which dwell with painful persistence in the minds of men still young, to events enacted over half a century ago; to the time when most of the great cities and flourishing towns of this State were yet in the future; when Nashville, Chattanooga, Atlanta and Knoxville were groups of houses scarcely deserving the name of hamlets.

When the writer first "rode circuit" in that country, it was in possession of that once powerful tribe, the Cherokees. Braver men never lived; truer men never drew the bow. Their courage, fortitude and sagacity were astonishing. They shrank from no dangers; they feared no hardships. They had the vices, but they also had the virtues of savage life. They were true to their country, their friends and their homes. If they forgave no injury, never did they forget kindness. Their vengeance was terrible, but their fidelity was unconquerable. Their love, like their hate, stopped not on this side the tomb. But where are they? They have passed away from the graves of their fathers and the homes of their hearts. I saw them as they passed. It was in 1838. The last remnant of that once powerful tribe was driven from their mountain homes in North Carolina to seek a temporary resting place beyond the Mississippi. There was that in their hearts which defied the power of speech. There was something in their looks that spoke not of vengeance, nor submission, but of hard necessity which defied both; which choked all utterance; which had no aim nor method. It was courage absorbed in despair. They lingered but for a moment; their look and step were onward, and soon they passed the "father of waters" to return to the homes of their childhood and the graves of their fathers no more for ever. A minority of the nation removed willingly but a large majority were forced by armed troops; hunted by one by one, dragged into camp and thence far away. Some years before their removal, characters had been invented, their language written and a portion of the Holy Scriptures, with many excellent hymns, and a few other books translated for their use. How fondly they clung to these when stripped of almost everything else, I had many opportunities to witness. The Indians were collected by the United States troops, carried to camp and kept under guard preparatory to their removal in the midst of summer. It was my fate to pass their country again and again during the process of removal, and never can I forget the sight or the feelings it produced. They took with them what few clothes they had, but scarce anything else; and the sight of their deserted cabins, their flourishing corn and fruitful beans, the howling of the dogs and piteous lowing of the cattle, produced a melancholy feeling that haunts me to this hour. Rather than leave their country, scores of them fled to the mountains, where many, alas, many, perished with hunger and left their unburied bones to bleach in the sun. Weeks after the main body had been removed, one after another of those who had fled to the mountains would straggle into the settlements, weak, emaciated almost to a skeleton and piteously asking for bread. "Where is your wife?" "Dead." "Where are your children?" "Dead, too; all die." It was enough to melt a heart of stone! Such was the suffering, such the distress consequent upon the order for their removal, that officers and soldiers while executing that order were often seen to weep like children. Yes, hardy soldiers who, perhaps, had not wept for years, would go to the cabin, seize the father and mother and, perhaps, some of the older children, while the younger and more timid would flee to the fields or thickets to hide themselves, and on witnessing the deep, unaffected distress of the now ruined family, would sit down and weep as though their hearts would break. I said that many of the smaller children fled and hid themselves on the approach of the soldiers, and so it was. Many of them were found and dragged from their hiding places to accompany their parents, but many of them were never found. Many a hearty, sprightly Indian child whose father, mother, brothers, sisters, were all gone, never to return, was left to perish and die alone!

Of the many affecting scenes which came to my knowledge during the forcible removal of these hopeless people I select one. I knew the man well. He and most of his family were worthy members of the Methodist Church and for several years under my charge. He lived in a secluded part of the nation, among the mountains of North Carolina, and seemed to have formed his opinions of the white man from his knowledge of the missionary of the cross who had brought him the Gospel of Christ, baptized him into the Christian faith, and had so often afforded him the consolation of the blessed Word. He was slow to believe he would ever be forced from his humble but quiet home, and some months elapsed ere he was molested. His was among the last families in all that region visited by the soldiers. But they came at last. An officer, with a guard and an interpreter presented himself at the cabin door, and the old man was told that he and his family must go into camp immediately. As if doubting their sincerity he hesitated and offered several common place excuses, such as his cattle and hogs were in the woods; he would lose his crop; his wife was making cloth, none of which could be left. But finding these of no avail, with a heavy heart and sad countenance he made one request, just one, which he hoped would be granted. What was it? That he might be allowed to pray in his cabin once more with his wife and children ere he left it forever! It was granted. The old man took from a rude shelf a portion of the Scriptures and some hymns that had been translated into his native tongue; he read, he sang, and knelt to pray. He knelt near the middle of the cabin floor, while his wife and children (eight in number) huddled closely around him. He stood upright on his knees; they bowed their heads to the floor. With a tremulous voice he began. First, he thanked God for his life, health and preservation; for the gospel; for the privilege of reading his Word and calling on his name. Next, he prayed for the white man, all white men, especially those who persecuted the Indian and took his home; begged that God would pity and forgive them. He particularly mentioned those at the door; excused them in his prayer because they had been commanded to do as they did. Then he prayed for the Indian, the poor Indian as he called him, once strong and powerful, now few and weak; his property was gone; his land was gone; his home was gone; all was gone! "O, good Spirit," he cried, "O blessed Jesus, help poor Indian he can't help himself any more!"

The prayer was frequently interrupted by the groans and sobs of his family, and such was the earnestness, unaffected simplicity and pathos that the interpreter, though a wicked man, found it impossible to restrain his feelings, and cried aloud. The officer and soldiers, without understanding a word that was said, were overcome by the scene and mingled their tears and sobs with those of the afflicted family. At the close of the prayer the officer bade the interpreter tell the Indian he might come into camp whenever he chose, and, turning away, declared he might be punished for disobedience, or even broke of his commission, but he could not, and would not lay hands on such a man or such a family as that.

An occasional arrow-head of stone, a flint hatchet, a bit of pottery are found here and there, indicating the presence of a former race, by most residents of this country in the present day, the Cherokees are as completely forgotten, even unknown, as are the mound-builders or the Aztecs. The writer gave their sad history to the world more than fifty years ago, and in magazine and newspaper pleaded their cause. They have become a memory, but it is profitable sometimes to recall even a painful recollection, and this is the apology for telling once more the story of the Cherokees. D. R. M.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"Out of the fullness of the heart the mouth speaketh." Oh, that the Lord would check the eager haste after the fame and honor of this world, and put it into the hearts of the sons and daughters of men to seek after that honor that is lasting as eternity; that there may be a growth in that spiritual life that will bring us all as a Society nearer together in the Father's love; that our example may live in the memory of those that come after us. Let us be encouraged by looking at the example of the prophets of former days, how their works follow them, and are handed down from generation to generation. With what interest are they read even in this our day, what comfort do they bring to the contemplative mind, those parts especially that foretell the coming of our blessed Saviour, and his holy appearing within our hearts by and through the spirit of Truth.

Where is the sacrifice that should be offered up daily as sweet incense before the Lord, from contrite and broken spirits?

Let us examine our own hearts with the eye of faith, and with that discerning wisdom that God giveth, that we may turn from the perishing things of time here, and seek more earnestly after the hidden treasure of eternal life, that the dear Son of God is waiting to give to all that come humbly to Him.

A warning voice has gone forth, with a cloud of witnesses, Prepare, prepare to meet your God in peace. Let these words be engraven upon our hearts. Do we not see and feel his great power? Let us as a Society and a nation mind our steps and flee quickly to that sure rock, Christ Jesus, that is a foundation that cannot be moved by the storms and disasters of time here.

When I look at our once favored Society and feel the burden thereof, and the work that thou my Heavenly Father hast called me to, sorrow fills my heart, accompanied with many tears.

Oh, be pleased to grant Heavenly Father, that we may as a Society give heed to the Word of God as revealed within our hearts. Thus, as we yield true obedience with humble and contrite hearts, we may be accepted by Him who is our all in all. Oh give us faith that we may be assured that we are cleansed from all impurity, that we may stand firm to the principles that we profess without wavering, following thy guiding hand. Here we shall find safety and be encouraged, a remnant though we are, to endeavor to fulfil the whole law of our God.

Although there may be way-marks set up on every side of our pathway by the enemy, turn not aside to any of these nor let your eyes rest upon them, for they lead down to darkness and untold sorrow. Let us keep our eye singly fixed upon that heavenly light that flows from the dear Son of God, the Captain of our salvation, who will lead all his faithful followers safely through the gates into the holy City of our God, where unspeakable joy will be ours for evermore. Oh, it is this that is worth making a sacrifice for, during the short time that we have to remain here on earth.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Mites in Raw Sugar.—What is known as raw sugar, that is sugar as it comes from the plantations without refining, contains numerous minute insects, belonging to the Acarus, or mite family, scarcely visible to the naked eye, and somewhat akin to another Acarus, which by burrowing beneath the skin produces the irritation and disease known as the itch. An irritation of the hands and forearm to which grocers' assistants are liable, is believed to be caused by the sugar mite boring into the skin. Some specimens of raw sugar so abound in these mites, that it has been estimated that a single pound of such sugar contains 100,000 insects. Refined sugars are entirely free from them, as they are destroyed by the process of refining.

Mistaken Identity.—George Brown, chief engineer of the Havemeyer Sugar Refining Company, left his place of business on Seventh-day afternoon at half-past four. Three hours later a man fell from a tug-boat. The Newtown bridge-keeper went to his rescue; he was a particular friend of George Brown. The man was drawn out of the water; M'Clay identified him as Brown, and sent word to his wife. The drowning man showed signs of life. Mrs. Brown arrived, recognized her husband; three other friends of Brown arrived, and did their best to revive the dying man. In a few moments he was dead. The friends of the Brown family assembled at the house, a message was sent to Brown's son-in-law announcing that he was dead; but at that very time Brown and his son were dining together with the son-in-law. The drowned man has since been identified. He was a musician of this city. The resemblance between them, though both are men of pronounced peculiarities, is so great as to astonish every one. Similar eyes, thin gray hair, Napoleonic nose, and thick gray moustaches, the only difference being that the dead man was a little taller and broader.

From time to time we have called attention to these cases of mistaken identity. They are very common. Considering how few the features that form the human countenance and the limitations of the size of human beings, it is not wonderful. It is very important to recognize the possibility. Many of the best authenticated ghost stories have proved to be cases of mistaken identity. Crimes have been alleged against innocent men, and actions, which, if not crimes, were inconsistent with their professions.

A delegate to the late Ecumenical Conference so greatly resembled the Editor of this paper that Dr. Hoss, Editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate, accosted him, then told the writer of it, and subsequently mistook the man again. We trust that that delegate will conduct himself with great propriety, and for his sake we shall try to do the same.—Christian Advocate.

Australian Honey.—Alfred Wright, during a recent religious visit in Australia, visited the apiary of Frederick Coleman at Mt. Barker. He says: The honey is chiefly gathered here from the gum trees, and as these flower only alternate years, they have a good season and a poor one. The season lasts two months, and when the weather is hot the quantity of honey gathered in one day is enormous, for the flowers are so full of it that it may be shaken out. Our Friend had one hive from which he took 450 lbs. in one season, which said hive when weighed two days in succession had increased in weight 11 lbs. in the 24 hours. The frames are taken out twice a week in the busiest part of the season, put into a centrifugal machine, emptied of their contents and the comb returned to the hive to be refilled, and this goes on all through the summer. The honey thus obtained is very pure and good, and fetches on an average in London 3d. a lb. It is sent to England in tins containing 56 lbs. each. One season recently our friend obtained 20 tons from 200 hives, which at £28 a ton was not such a bad result. At any rate it seems better than farming here. I understand that since eucalyptus oil has been thought so much of as a medicine, honey made from the gum tree is supposed to have some special virtue in cases of sore throat, etc., and is being used largely for that purpose. A chemist in London is a large customer for our Friend's honey for this object.—The British Friend.

A Poisonous Thimble.—Among the numberless causes of food poisoning through the skin one which was lately recorded is worth noting on account of its evident simplicity and the ease of its prevention. In the case referred to the sufferer was a seamstress, and the mischief resulted from her using a dirty metal thimble marked with verdigris, a little of which appears to have entered a scratch on the thimble finger. We can well believe that this accident was not the first of its kind. Verdigris, it is true, is a mere metallic irritant, and not comparable in virulence to most living germs of disease. It is quite enough, notwithstanding, to excite local inflammation, which friction, contact with dyed cloth material, or the entrance of dirt in any form would quickly convert into a dangerous and general disorder. There is really no excuse for women who trust their fingers in these cheap and worse than useless articles. Steel thimbles are much safer and cost very little. Another variety also in common use is enamelled within, and is, if possible, even freer from objection. Let us not forget to add a caution that cuts or scratches on the hand should never be neglected by sewing women so long as they continue to be used in cloth manufacture.—Lancet.

THE Apostle's declaration is as positive as it ought to be alarming to those rich who are taking too much their consolation in and from their abundance: "If ye live after the flesh ye shall die; but if ye, through the Spirit, mortify the deeds of the flesh, ye shall live."

A. BENNETT.

Calling the Ferryman.

They reached the river, the father and his little daughter, late in the evening. The woods through which they had passed reached to the very brink; and as the night was cloudy and very dark, the woods seemed to render the gloom profoundly deep. Far away on the opposite shore was here and there a twinkling light in the small, scattered houses; while farther off still were the bright lamps of the great city whither they were going. The little child was weary and sleepy, and chilled by the evening air. Nothing but urgency would have induced the father to be out with her thus. As they came to the ferry they found the boat over the other side, where the ferryman layed. So the father shouted and called, but no voice answered; then he would walk to and fro, and speak to his child, and try to comfort her; then he would call again and again. At length they saw a little light move and heard the moving of the boat. Nearer and nearer the noise came; but it was too dark to see the boat. But it came across, and the travellers entered it.

"Father!"

"Well, my child!"

"It's very dark, and I can't see the shore where we are going!"

"No, little one; but the ferryman knows the way, and we will soon be over, and then soon at home, where will be light and a good fire."

"Oh, I wish we were there, father!"

Slowly and gently the boat swung off in the stream; and, though it was dark, and the river seemed to run fast, they were carried safely over, and the child soon forgot her great fear. In a short time after they landed she reached her home, where loving arms received her; where the room was warm with fire, and was flooded with light. On the bosom of love she rested, and her chills and terror passed away.

Some months after this the same little child had come to another river, darker, deeper, and more fearful still. It was the River of Death. When she first came near it, the air seemed cold and darkness covered it, and all seemed like night. The same loving father stood near her, distressed that his child must cross this river, and he not be able to go with her. For days and nights he had been with her mother, watching over her, and leaving her bedside only long enough to take his meals and pray for the life of his precious child.

For hours she had been slumbering very comfortably, and it seemed as if her spirit was to pass away without her waking again; but just before the morning watch she suddenly awoke with the eye bright, the reason unclouded, and every faculty alive. A sweet smile was playing on the face.

"Father, I have come again to the river-side, and am again waiting for the ferryman to come and carry me over."

"Does it seem dark and cold as it did when we crossed the river?"

"Oh, no! There are no dark, gloomy trees here. The river is not black, but covered with floating silver. The boat coming toward me seems to be made of solid light, and though the ferryman looks dark I am not afraid of him!"

"Can my child see across the river?"

"Oh, yes; but instead of the little twinkling light here and there, as before, I can see a great beautiful city, flooded with light and glory. I see no sun and no lamp, no moon nor stars; but it's full of light. Ah! I hear music, too, coming softly over the river, sweet as the angels could make!"

"Can you see any one on the other bank of the river?"

"Why, yes, why! I see One, the most beautiful form I ever saw; and what a face! what a smile! And now He beckons me to come. Oh, Ferryman, make haste! I know who it is! It is Jesus; my own blessed Jesus! I shall be received into his arms; I shall rest in his bosom."

"Is my little daughter afraid?"

"Afraid, dear mother? not a bit. I think of my Psalm. 'Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for Thou art with me; Thy rod and Thy staff they shall comfort me.'

And thus she crossed the dark river, made like a silver stream by the presence of the blessed Redeemer. The father and mother wept, but joy and sorrow mingled in their tears. They could almost see the golden gates open to receive their loved one; and they then understood the words of the prophet, "The child shall die an hundred years old."

Reader, could your children die like that? Is your example an example of trust in Christ and preparation for eternity? There is no heritage to be compared to that, nor can any other advantage make up for the want of it. Better far than thousands of gold and silver is the memory of a godly parent's example.

Opening the Columbian Exposition on First-day.—The Christian Statesman says that a paper was presented at the late (Presbyterian) Synod, urging Christian people not to commit themselves in any way to the Exposition, until the managers decide that it shall be closed on the First-day of the week. That paper says, "If it were thoroughly understood, that Christian people would not, by contribution, by making exhibits, by their attendance, or in any other way, approve and support the Exhibition, if it should be opened on that day, the question would be settled."

Suicides in European Armies.—Dr. Longuet has prepared a paper, read at one of the recent Health Congresses, upon the proportionate number of suicides in the principal armies of Europe, and, according to these statistics, the Austrian Army stands the last five years, with an average of 131 suicides per 100,000 for first, with an average of 131 suicides per 100,000 for first, with an average of 131 suicides per 100,000 for first, with an average of 131 suicides per 100,000 for first, with an average of 67 per 100,000, the Italian Army, with 49, and the French Army with 47, it being a noteworthy fact that the suicides in the French Army are nearly double that of any other army. The Prussian, the Belgian, English, Russian, and Spanish armies are respectively 24, 23, 20, and 14, while in all the armies there are proportionately more deaths among the non-commissioned officers than among the men, and less suicide among the engineers than the cavalry. Suicide is very rare among the men who have been sentenced to different terms of imprisonment, but is frequent among the men awaiting trial by court-martial.

The Johnston Disaster.—The final report of the Treasurer of the Citizens' Committee for the relief of the Johnston sufferers, filed in Pittsburgh, Pa., a few days since, shows that the total amount of cash received was $832,343.06. The entire expense, including the preparation of the report of the Committee was only $631, and even this was paid privately so that every cent that was contributed for the relief fund went to the sufferers.

Established Churches.—A new Parish church has been erected near Fraserburgh, Scotland, and as all the rate-payers had to pay their share of the cost, they naturally opposed the project. The most of them have not paid the assessment, while a few did not do so up to time, and summonses were served upon the latter while the fishermen were out at sea. But a crowd of three hundred women and children gathered and pelted the sheriff's officers with mud and stale fish. By the time the police arrived the fishermen returned and a free fight took place. Bells were rung, fog-horns blown for help, and the police were chased. The women used pails, pokers, toms, brooms, stools, and other things, and the fishermen were paid for the building of a kirk to which the people did not belong.

Dr. Benjamin Richardson.—This distinguished physician was a drinker of intoxicating liquors when the task was assigned to him of investigating the action of alcohol on living tissues. He took a year for his experiments, and came out a total abstainer.

Decisions in the Society of Friends.—In the Society of Friends, nothing is decided by a majority of voices. No vote is taken in any meeting. The clerk, at the close of an assembly, watches with attention to what is said. He pronounces as to where "the weight of concern" lies—the preponderance of genuine emphasis. That is the decision of the meeting, although it be of one or two against a multitude. The method is not the ordinary one; but it is the way the world is governed. It is the emphatic minority which rules—the people who care, and have power in proportion to their caring; their "weight of concern," not their numbers. "One and God make a majority." Their joint emphasis is selected. The rest count, but they do not weigh.—Selected.

Liquor-selling Device.—There is no end to the tricks to which liquor-dealers will resort to evade the laws by which men have sought to overcome the evils resulting from this vile traffic. Whisky has been sold in Prohibition towns by putting it into flasks in the shape of books and selling them as Bibles. The latest device of this sort came to light a short time ago in Hamburg, Conn., on the occasion of the death of a man named Hilder Huff, who was supposed to be deaf and dumb and badly deformed by a large hump on his back. After his death it was discovered that his supposed deformity was caused by a padded sack containing bottles of various kinds of liquors. He had been a walking bar in a No-license town. The ingenuity which has been shown in the evil display in their efforts to promote his desires is worthy of a better cause.—Christian Advocate.

The Presbyterian Synod of New Jersey.—Resolved, That the Synod of New Jersey enters its solemn protest against the enactment of any law that would permit the selling or disposing of spirituous, vinous, malt or brewed liquors on the Lord's day, or during any portion thereof, and it exhorts the members of its churches to oppose, by voice and vote, all candidates for office who favor this desecration of the First-day, or favor the repeal or modifying of the existing Disorderly House act.

Resolved, That the Synod of New Jersey most respectfully memorializes and petitions the Senate of the United States to ratify the treaty made at Brussels in 1890 for the prohibition of the liquor traffic in the Free Congo State, in Africa, believing that the continued exportation of alcoholic liquors must well bring to these uncivilized nations, and seriously hinder all missionary labors among them.

Resolved, That we express our abhorrence and utter condemnation of the liquor traffic, and will hail with joy the day when this terrible curse shall be forever driven from our land, as we believe that it is "evil, only evil, and that continually."

CONGREGATION.—A public assemblage in a spiritual theatre, where all the performers are professors, but where very few of the professors are performers. "Taking them one with another," said the Rev. S. S.—"I believe my congregation to be the most exemplary observers of the religious ordinances; for the poor keep all the fasts, and the rich all the feasts."

—Selected.

SILENT MEETINGS.—The following paragraph from the Glasgow News is worthy of note:

"A minister in one of our suburban churches has hit upon a brilliant idea, which should commend itself to all who despair of the pompous rhetoric of the pulpit. It suggests a 'Silent Sunday' in all the churches, when people might meet and give themselves up to quiet meditation without being distracted by the voice of the preacher. I am of the opinion that this would find favor with many people, even if practiced every Sunday. At the same time the churches—especially the Presbyterian—should really adapt their services to the needs of the people by making them more congregational and less ministerial."

The above is taken from the British Friend of Ninth Month.

DR. DESAGULIERS being invited to make one of an illustrious company, an officer present who was addicted to swearing, at the end of every oath would ask the doctor's pardon. The doctor bore this for some time with patience, but at length rebuked the swearer as follows: "You have taken some pains to render me ridiculous (if possible) by your pointed apologies; now, sir, I am to tell you, if God Almighty does not hear you, I assure you I will never tell Him."

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 19, 1891.

The writer of this was one of a company of six or eight Friends who recently were conversing about things concerning our beloved Society, and about matters pertaining to the kingdom of our blessed Redeemer. It was felt to be a privilege thus to commune together, and to compare our views on religious subjects.

After some time had been thus spent, the remark was made, that our young people had not now as frequent opportunities of being thus instructed and edified, as would be for their good; and reference was made to the circumstances in which some of us had been placed in our early years, when it had been our privilege to sit and listen, with deep interest, to the comparison of their views and experiences by the worthies of a generation who have passed away—such as Christopher Healy, William and Thomas Evans, Thomas Kite, Sarah Enlen, Ezra Comfort, and many others.

The subject is now alluded to, with the desire that our elderly Friends may bear in mind the important educational influence which such opportunities for religious instruction may have on those who are younger; and may, as way rightly opens, be diligent to watch over and help those, who naturally look up to them for example and advice. Our thoughts in connection with this subject, revert especially to Christopher Healy, whose conversation often was tendering to the spirits of his listeners, and under the same holy anointing of the Lord's power and presence, as his ministerial communications.

While we would gladly bestow on the young every help which one person can give to another to assist them in their progress Zionward, it is important that these should remember that they have in our blessed Saviour, a friend who sticketh closer than a brother; and that by the in-shining of his Divine light—the visitations of his Holy Spirit—He can lead them in the way to heaven and happiness, even when their outward surroundings may seem unfavorable. He does not leave them in ignorance of his will concerning them—for, as the Apostle testifies, "The grace of God, which bringeth salvation, hath appeared unto all men, teaching them, that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, they should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Message of President Harrison was read in each of the Houses of Congress on the 9th inst. Our foreign relations are tranquil excepting our feeling in regard to the New Orleans affair, the correspondence with Italy has been relieved by the temporary absence of the Italian Minister, but "it is not doubted a friendly conclusion is attainable." The defective condition of the Federal law governing the treaty rights of domesticated foreigners is mentioned in relation to the Valparaiso riot, and killing of two United States sailors, the President expects full reparation.

Our Government has found occasion to express in a friendly spirit, but with much earnestness, to the Government of the Czar its serious concern because of the harsh measures now being enforced against the Hebrews in Russia.

The McKinley Tariff is strongly commended in the following language: "Rarely, if ever, before in the history of the country has there been a time when the proceeds of one day's labor, or the product of one fenced acre, would purchase as large an amount of those things that enter into the living of the masses of the people."

In regard to the silver free coinage controversy the President is "still of the opinion that the free [and unlimited] coinage of silver under existing conditions would disastrously affect our business interests at home and abroad."

The President suggests a constitutional amendment making the present general ticket system obligatory and uniform throughout all the States—and also a Commission to consider the whole subject of the evils of our system of Federal elections.

The total value, ever since the breakdown from the United States during Eleventh Month, was $24,588,979, as against $7,082,004 in Eleventh Month, 1890; while for the eleven months ending Eleventh Month 30th, the total was $194,077,007, as against $126,719,160 in 1890.

The Senate on the 14th inst., Senator Washburn introduced a bill defining "future" and "options," and imposing special taxes on dealers therein. The articles included in the bill in the two terms are wheat, corn, oats, rye, barley, cotton and all other farm products; also pork, lard and all other hog products. The bill provides that dealers in futures and options therein shall pay annually a tax of $1,000, and a further sum of five cents a bushel on cotton and hog products, and twenty cents a bushel on any of the other articles mentioned.

A telegram received at Washington announces the death of Pahlequah, Indian Territory, of Mayes, the chief of the Cherokee Nation, on the morning of the 14th inst.

The Kansas City Star says: The wheat crop of Kansas would supply a population of 13,000,000, or one-fifth of the population of the country. It would take 145,000 cars of 400 bushels each to haul the wheat crop in Kansas this year. No other State in the Union has ever produced so much surplus wheat.

The South Carolina House of Representatives has passed the Childs' bill to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, by a vote of 41 to 22. About fifty members were absent, it is thought by a large number of persons.

The New York Voice says: "The statement that Governor Tillman has come out squarely against Prohibition is only a half truth. South Carolina has had State Prohibition outside the corporations for years. It has given the towns a monopoly of the whiskey traffic and many of them have benefited on big license fees until the tax-payers are bribed and blinded." In his message Governor Tillman urges that towns be forbidden to charge any license fees whatever, but that all receipts go into the county treasuries, urging as a reason for this change that the present system gives the towns the profits from the business and leaves the counties to pay all extra cost of the business and the like produced by the traffic. As few towns in the State embrace whiskey for its own sake, but rather for the money in it, Governor Tillman's policy would be an immense stride toward Prohibition, as it would not restitute the business in the country.

Markets.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 101; 4's, reg., 116½ a 117½; coupon, 117 a 118½; currency 6's, 108½ a 117½. COTTON was quiet and unchanged. Sales on a basis of 8½c, per pound for middling uplands.

FEED.—Winter bran, in bulk, $19.50 a $20.50 per ton; spring bran, in bulk, $19.50 a $19.50 per ton. Flour—Western and Pennsylvania super, $3.00 a $3.85; do. do., extras, $3.90 a $4.25; No. 2 winter flour, $4.25 a $4.50; Pennsylvania, roller, straight, $4.50 a $4.75; Western winter, clear, $4.50 a $4.75; do. do., straight, $4.75 a $4.95; winter patent, new, $5.00 a $5.25; Minnesota, clear, $4.65 a $4.90; do., do., $4.40 a $5.10; do., do., $5.10 a $5.40; do. do. do., favorite brands, $5.50. Rye flour was dull and unchanged, viz: $5.00 a $5.15 per barrel, as to quality. Buckwheat flour sold in small way, at $2.10 a $2.20 per barrel, as to quality.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, $1.03 a $1.03½.

—No. 2 mixed corn, 50 a 50½ cts.

—No. 2 white oats, 41 a 42 cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, none here; good, 4¼ a 5 cts.; medium, 4¼ a 4½ cts.; fair, 4 a 4½ cts.; common, 3½ a 3½ cts.; culls, 3 a 3½ cts.; fat cows, 2 a 3 cts.; thin cows, $15.00 a $20.00; milch cows, $20.00 a $30.00.

SHEEP.—Western, $3.50 a 3½ cts.; good, 4¼ a 5 cts.; medium, 4¼ a 4½ cts.; common, 3½ a 4 cts.; culls, 1½ a 3 cts.; lambs, 3½ a 6½ cts.

HOGS.—Good Westerns, 5½ a 5½ cts.; other Western, 5 a 5½ cts.

FOREIGN.—The epidemic of influenza is spreading throughout Europe. In Hamburg, 111 cases are reported the past week and the death roll has not diminished. The epidemic is spreading rapidly in Jutland, Holland and Denmark. In famine stricken Russia the disease is in places supplemented by typhus fever; while small pox is carrying off large numbers of the impoverished people.

In some districts the priests refuse to perform masses who have no means of subsistence. Thousands have taken to mendicancy and robbery. Hundreds of children are dying of starvation on the highways.

It has been the custom of the Knights of the Order of St. George, ever since the founding of the Order in 1749 by Empress Catherine II, to give a banquet on the feast day of their patron saint. This year, however, the Czar, who is at the head of the Order, requested that the banquet be not given, and that the money which it was intended should be devoted to some purpose should be given to the sufferers from the famine.

The Czar's request was willingly acceded to, and the result will be a large subscription to the famine fund. It is noteworthy that many of the grand dinners given by the officers of various regiments, societies, etc., have been abandoned, and the funds usually spent in these festivities have been given over to aid the famine sufferers.

Dr. Weiti, President of Switzerland, has resigned, owing to the plebiscite taken a few days previously, which resulted in a majority of the electors voting against the Government's purchase of the Swiss Central railway, and resigning as a member of the Railway Department. Dr. Weiti has also resigned his membership in the Federal Council, of which body he was the President. The President of the Federal Council in Switzerland is the first Magistrate of the Republic. His first resignation was of the Presidency of the Council, and as a matter of course, of the Presidency of the Republic. Strong efforts have been made to induce him to reconsider his action, but he declines to do so, and it is the belief that his resignation is final.

A dispatch from Pekin states that the recent victorious Chinese troops sent against the rebels in Mongolia have brought the rebellion to an end. All the disturbances in the country appear to have terminated, and affairs are resuming their normal condition. By order of Li Hung Chang, the Chinese Viceroy, summary punishment is inflicted on the captured rebels convicted of having taken part in the massacres of Christians.

The principal source of revenue in Corea is a land tax, as in China, paid in produce and fixed annually according to the condition of crops. The grain (mostly rice), thus collected in Government granaries in different provincial towns and at Soul, is used in the payment of salaries to the government officials.

Disagreements have arisen between the Government and Portella, Governor of the State of Rio Janeiro. The differences are so radical that the Government has requested Governor Portella to resign his position. This request the Governor has concluded to accede to.

A dispatch from the City of Mexico says that the Mexican Congress is about to confer on the Federal Executive, power to admit all kinds of foreign cereals and live stock, either duty free or at reduced rates, in such quantities and on such occasions as he may consider necessary in order to relieve the sufferings of the needy. The State of Chihuahua has exempted from State and municipal taxes for the remainder of the fiscal year, corn, wheat, beans, flour and meat brought into the State for consumption.

The volcano of Colima, in Mexico, is now emitting great quantities of ash, ashes and smoke, and at night showers for many miles around, is illuminated by the glare. Strong winds have carried the ashes a distance of 400 miles. The villagers living near the volcano have been ordered by the Government to quit their homes and seek places of safety.

DIED, at her residence, Eleventh Month 19, 1891, after a lingering illness, which she bore with much patience and resignation, DEBORAH STOKES, wife of Levi B. Stokes, aged eighty-three years, one month and ten days. A member of Germantown Particular, and Frankford Monthly Meeting of Friends. For several years she was prevented from attending with her friends for the purpose of Divine worship, which was a great privation to her. At times she suffered much, and a few days before the close, said, "If it were not for the all-supporting arm of my Heavenly Father, I could have fallen." The day before her death she said, "I feel my sins are forgiven, and there is a mansion prepared for me; all is bright, I see nothing in my way." After this she said but little, and soon passed quietly away. Her family and friends feel that through Divine love and mercy she has been safely gathered into everlasting rest.

BREAUH W. NEWBOLD, at her residence in this city, in the eighty-second year of her age. A member of Frankford Monthly and Particular Meetings.

At her home, Barnesville, O., Tenth Month 23, 1891, REBECCA E. GIBBONS, wife of Joseph B. Gibbons, and daughter of James and Mary Ann Edgerston; in the thirty-sixth year of her age. A member of Somerset Monthly Meeting of Friends. She had been in poor health for a number of years, and in the latter part of last winter had an attack of the prevailing influenza, which seemed to leave her system in a shattered condition, and she never recovered from its effects. In speaking of her prospects a few weeks prior to her decease she said, it was very uncertain, but it was evident she was losing, and wished her sister to remain with her. About a week before her close, her parents going into their room, she embraced them separately, saying, "The Lord is my shepherd, I feel him to be with me." She then calmly recounted her accumulated sufferings, often expressing her readiness to give up whenever her Master's time came, and very calmly disposed of many articles to her relatives and friends, frequently saying, "I love everybody." A very short time before the close, after taking leave of all her family and friends, she said, "I feel that I am being told he was not present, she said, "Oh, I am not going with me," but added, "I am not afraid," and thus stepped over the dark river, leaving her relatives the assurance that her Heavenly Father had through adorable mercy condescended to be near her and pilot her safely to the desired haven of rest and peace.

At her residence, in Harrisville, on the 19th of Ninth Month, 1891, PENINA HALL, daughter of the late William and Hannah Hall, in the fifty-second year of her age. A member of Short Creek Monthly and Harrisville Particular Meetings. Her family and friends believe she endeavored to live in a watchful state, and she was suddenly called at a time very unlooked for by those about her, and mentally incapacitated during her sickness; we believe, from arrangements previously made, that the premonitory voice had been known and heeded by her: "So like thee we, what we shall have done by all those things which we can do, that we may not be unprofitable servants, we have done that which was our duty to do."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Selections from the Journal of William Evans.

1849.—Fourth Month 14th. "Our Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders was held this morning. After the answers to the Queries on the ministry were read, it came weightily and very unexpectedly upon me, that the ministry of the Gospel of Jesus Christ was one of the most important services we could be engaged in: that one of his ancient apostles speaking of his ministry, said, 'I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ;' and that this remained to be the only source and authority of all true Gospel ministry, down to this day. However unlooked for the motion was, I felt constrained to rise, and as I might be enabled, to speak upon this weighty subject. It came before me, also, that nothing in the form of a religious duty, could be of much more prejudice to the church, than a ministry of mere words, without the putting forth of the Head of the church. That persons who had once received the gift from Him who ascended up on high; and in the beginning, had exercised it in the life and power of Christ, might gradually fall into a habit of uttering words, that were not a savor of life to the living; and some who never had been entrusted with a gift, might undertake to officiate in this way. Such a ministry seems as if it would strike down to the ground the living members, and clothe them with mourning; instead of comforting and strengthening them. Some of us had lived long enough, to remember many living and deeply baptized ministers, who knew what it was to go down into suffering with their Lord, and to remain there his appointed time; until they knew Him, who is the resurrection and the life, to quicken and enable them to bring up stones of memorial. These were a comfort to the church, and the living gathered as round about them in spirit, supporting their hands in the work; and thus all were strengthened together. But what a change has taken place amongst this people. The importance of having discerning elders, who can distinguish between the true and the false; and under the influence and authority of the spirit of sound judgment, are led to give the living child to the right mother, was also spoken to. Where such go to a brother, in the meekness of wisdom, and the gentleness of Christ, and under a right exercise for his preservation, unburthen their minds, when they feel that a minister is losing in life and power, it is a great favor to such; for which, if they are in a proper spirit, they will feel thankful. It is also important that true elders be faithful in opening to those who, having received no gift in the ministry, mistake their services in the church, and burthen Friends with their communications; not only that such may be prevented from bringing the ministry into disrepute, but that they may be turned into the channel of service which the Lord designs them for. Our friend Samuel Bettle, Sr., said, that the care of elders and the proper hearing of them by ministers, was a practice that the Society had always observed; and that it was in this way the different members of the church edified one another."

"Nothing authorizes a man to speak to the weighty matters of the church, but the putting forth of the blessed Head of the church. There must be a proper exercise to prepare to speak in the humble spirit and authority of Truth. If this ground is not kept, our religious meetings will become mere debating associations; and learning, wit and worldly influence will finally govern and decide; and thus the character of a church of Christ will be lost. We shall not be of his sheep, who know his voice, and follow Him, and who refuse to follow the voice of a stranger, because they know not the voice of strangers."

"Fifth Month 6th. May the Lord never forsake us as a people, but if needful, by the revelation of his righteous judgments, bring us down, make us and keep us his humble, devoted followers; that we may be under his government, and made use of by Him, to spread his blessed and glorious kingdom in the earth."

"Sixth Month 10th. I read several letters contained in a collection of Sarah Lynes Grubb's, lately published in England. They show the workings of a spirit that is drawing Friends from the inward, spiritual experience of the religion of the Lord Jesus, and transferring the thoughts to that which He did for us, without us, and to a literal study and knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. We have always believed in the truth and Divine authority of the Scriptures, and that no doctrine or practice, which is incompatible with them, is to be received; that it is through the sacrifice of Christ on Calvary, pardon and reconciliation are obtained, and the gift of the Holy Spirit procured; yet all will avail comparatively little, unless we co-operate with His Spirit in our hearts; experiencing Him to prepare them by his baptism of the Holy Ghost and fire, to be tabernacles, sanctified for Him to dwell in. Thus only can we know Him to be in us, 'The hope of glory,' the Author and finisher of our faith, and of every good thought, word and work, that is brought forth in us."

"My brother Thomas having gone to Cape Island, on account of his infirm health, and it being necessary that one of his brothers should be with him, I came down this morning."

"Living with a class of people, whose habits and opinions are very different from those of Friends, is trying. There being nothing like seriousness among some of them, we seem to be in each other's way. Unless Friends keep steadily upon their watch in such places, they are in danger of being leavened with the spirit such persons live in, and gradually falling into their manners, and imitating their changeable fashions in dress. The amusements which are prepared for the light spirits here, are a strong temptation to young people; especially, when they are not watched over by consistent parents, under a proper religious concern themselves, and who would restrain them from resorting to such entertainments. It seems as if some felt themselves freed from proper restraint, and at liberty to indulge in frivolity. In this way they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put Him to open shame. Such are evil examples to others."

"The kingdom of Satan is gaining ground in this land, and if those who consider themselves lovers of religion, slacken their watchfulness, and their resistance to wrong things, the tide of corruption must gain a powerful ascendancy over the morals of the people at large."

"I consider it dangerous for religious people, to be long mingled with irreligious, or light persons, on terms of courtesy and familiarity. They are in danger of being leavened with their spirit, of losing their strength, and then falling in with something that will grieve the Holy Spirit, and wound their own souls; and when once wounded, they may never recover, but go halting all their days. Very many are ashamed of the simplicity of the cross. Some who may be pretty staid among their friends at home, and yet not very firm against the current of fashion, and libertinism, may be thus drawn into it; and at such places, lay aside the Quaker character and manners, almost altogether; thereby bringing reproach upon the name and cause of Christ."

"Those who are enemies to religion, and ready to disseminate their poisonous opinions, are often found in these places of public resort; where they put on great politeness, and blandness of manner, to insinuate themselves more effectually into the esteem of strangers. They often carry an exterior of great kindness, and interest in the accommodation of others; by which, unwary young people may be attracted to them, and led to think, that where such apparently disinterested good-will exists, the principle cannot be dangerous. To send young people where they will mingle with such, exposes them to receive a hurtful bias, which it may be extremely difficult to eradicate, and which may be used by Satan to destroy their faith in the Christian religion, or hinder them from giving up to walk in the path of self-denial. We cannot expect, while in this world, to avoid all intercourse with men who have little or no religious scruples; but the less of it, the better."

"Many parents who have permitted their children to associate with the gay and the frivolous, have finally found their sons and daughters had a total disregard for plain and unfashionable company. The gay world, which lies in wickedness, has stolen away their hearts from their Saviour; they become dissatisfied with that which is serious, and restrictive, and are soon prepared to leave the Society, of which they were birth-right members, to become votaries of the world."

"Went with my dear wife to Salem Select Quarterly Meeting, held at Woodbury; which is in a very reduced state. After a time of waiting, I was constrained to arise with the Query, 'When the Son of man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?' When He cometh into the hearts of many who profess his holy religion, will He find that living faith, which is the saints' victory over the world, the flesh and the devil? A mere belief in the doctrines of the New Testament, without obedience to the inwardly revealed will of God, will avail but little. There is a faith that overcomes the world, and there is a faith that is overcome by the world. Many who have a plain outside, are seeking to become rich, and straining all their powers to accumulate wealth, that they may be great in the world, and receive honor from men; but these are stumbling-blocks in the way of serious enquirers after the Truth; and they are burthens to the living members of the Church of Christ. Even worldly people can often discover where the substance and life are wanting; and such bring our religious profession into disrepute. They were solemnly called upon to renounce the world, and make ready for the period when the cry will be sounded in their ear, 'Behold the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet Him.' The Gospel was preached to the poor, and the dear young people called upon to yield to the visitations of Divine love, and give up their hearts wholly to the government of their Saviour."

"Went to the Arch Street Meeting under an apprehension of religious duty. I felt constrained to speak of the continued preservation from the power of the tempter to lead into sin, which is extended, in great mercy, to those who mind the Light of Christ, in his convictions and leadings in the heart. Those who are the Lord's workmanship, created anew in Christ Jesus, He will not desert nor overlook, but they will be kept by Him from youth to old age; and being faithful, will become pillars in his house that shall go no more out. To those who are slighting the pleadings of his Spirit, and joining the friendships and maxims of the world, a pressing invitation was given to examine their condition in that light which cannot deceive. For what will all the gold they can accumulate, avail in that day when they are summoned to appear before the judgment seat of Christ? It cannot procure Divine approbation, or an entrance into heaven. While such are disregarding the repeated calls to holiness, and seeking their satisfaction elsewhere, they will become darkened, and be deceived with false pretensions to peace."

SUSPICIONS.

BY CHARLOTTE FISKE BATES.

Of these that make our honey it is known
That, feared and beaten back, they turn and sting,
While, fearlessly, if they are let alone,
In time they fly away on harmless wing.
And so suspicions buzz like angry bees;
Do they torment you with their threatened stings?
Oh! let them buzz as near you as they please;
Keep quiet—they, as well as bees, have wings.

For "THE FRIEND."

DEAR FRIEND,
WILSON HALL:

It was a recommendation of the Apostle to the believers, to be diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord. And we are glad to find you are thus engaged and desire you may be encouraged to hold on your way; believing as we do, that it is good to be zealously affected in a good cause, in this time as it was in former times. There is a testimony which cannot be destroyed, that is example. Our blessed Lord and Saviour told his disciples, let your light so shine before men, that they seeing your good works may glorify your Father which is in Heaven; this we understand to be their example. This light shone remarkably in the Apostles and primitive Christians, and also in our early Friends. So that, notwithstanding all the persecutions and hardships that were imposed upon them, this light, their example, did so shine before men that others seeing their good works were convinced that they were the people of God. And is it not the same that must convince the people at this day, is it not example? It seems to us this is the only way our Society can arise out of its present state of degradation, weakness, and division which are now very manifest.

If all who profess to hold to the ancient doctrines of our religious Society were in a right spirit, their light, we believe, would so shine before men that others seeing their good works would be convinced of the excellency of the spirit they were governed by. So it is an individual work now to raise the standard of Truth above that of error and confusion, believing as we do that the same power that brought us to be a religious Society in the midst of persecution, can sustain us at this day though we be reduced to a very small number, as Gideon's army was formerly, yet was successful in overthrowing Midian's party.

We hope there are many honest Friends in Indiana and other Yearly Meetings (who like thy brother, have no unity with Gurneyism) where the Gurneyites bear rule; and we much desire the encouragement of these under all their trials and difficulties; that they may be enabled to keep in a Christian spirit; that their light may so shine as to convince others, so that in the Lord's time those altars which have been perverted may be restored again to their former dignity.

SAMUEL COPE.

EAST BRADFORD, Chester Co., Pa.
First Mo. 21, 1860.

RESTRAINT from wrong-doing is not the most efficient way of cultivating the spirit of righteousness. But it is one of the agencies by which no person is too good to be benefited. It is not easy to teach any one to be reverent who does not spontaneously and naturally revere. But it is not so difficult to restrain the outward show of irreverence in the presence of things to be revered. And this spirit of reverence is one to be cultivated by every means of greater or less efficacy. "In reverence," says Ruskin, "is the chief joy and power of life,—reverence for what is pure and bright in your own youth; for what is true and tried in the age of others; for all that is gracious among the living, great among the dead, and marvellous in the powers that cannot die." There are things to be revered that seem to escape those who count themselves most reverential. The school of reverence is one from which no pupil should ever go out.

Prohibition.

[Under the heading, The Maine Law in Maine, Neal Dow contributes an article to the Independent; which, in a very clear and conclusive manner, refutes the pro-liquor cry, that prohibition does not accomplish any good result. We transfer it to our columns.—Ed.]

It is a long time since I have troubled you with any communication; but it just now occurs to me that there must be many of your readers who would be glad to know what the present condition of Maine is as to prohibition. The general press contains no information whatever on that subject, except occasional paragraphs which go the rounds, affirming that "Prohibition is a failure, and has been so from the day of its enactment." Very respectable newspapers hasten to give currency to these items, which many intelligent men accept and repeat as true.

I met in the street, some time ago, one of our most respectable citizens, a temperance man personally, a friend of everything good, an unfriend of everything bad, for many years a member in good standing of Dr. Payson's church. He said, brusquely:

"Mr. Dow, I do not see that you have done a bit of good. There's just as much liquor sold and just as much drunkenness as ever; all your labor and trouble have been lost."

"I do not think so, Mr. Fickett; it seems to me very much otherwise. Why do you suppose that no good has been done?"

"That's the common talk, and the newspapers say so; that's the general drift of the press."

"You and I are old citizens of Portland. We know well about the grogshops in the old time, and about the liquor trade now. You remember when there was a saloon at almost every street corner, with gandy signs advertising all sorts of liquors, and a great many other like them scattered up and down, whichever way we walked. They had also many barrels of liquor ranged on the sidewalks each side of their doors, fresh stocks just received, waiting to be taken in."

"Yes; I remember all that, and even remember the names of many of the men who dealt in liquors in those days, some of them among our most respectable people, some of them church members, some of them deacons of our churches, as one of them, an honored citizen, was deacon of Dr. Payson's church."

"Well, Mr. Fickett, do you know of a street corner now in Portland where there is a grogshop? Do you know of a grogshop of any kind anywhere?"

"No. I do not. They say there are places about town where liquor can be had, but I do not know any of them."

"Then there are no church members and deacons in the rum trade now?"

"No; that's all changed; there is no church now of any denomination that would tolerate a member who is in any way connected with the liquor traffic."

"Mr. Fickett, in the old rum time there were many distilleries in Maine making rum from molasses, whisky from potatoes, and brandy (apple jack) from cider. Seven of these were in Portland. I suppose you knew all those in Portland personally, as I did; how many are there now?"

"Not one; they are all gone long ago, the places where they were are occupied by other industries now, and the two breweries are also gone; not a distillery or brewery remains now in Maine. My business was always about the wharves connected with shipping; the distilleries and breweries were also in that region, and I knew them well."

"You must remember also, Mr. Fickett, that at the same time large quantities of West India rum were imported. It came to us by the cargo, many cargoes every year, spread out upon the wharves, making a great display of casks, two or three hundred of them in a large cargo, like that of the famous ship 'Margaret?'"

"Yes; I remember all that very well. The 'Margaret' was the largest ship of her time; and I remember the immense quantity of Santa Croix rum which she discharged upon Union Wharf."

"Well, Mr. Fickett, how many cargoes of rum come into Portland now? If no cargoes, how many puncheons?"

"No West India rum has been brought here in many years, not even one puncheon; all that was stopped long ago."

"You must remember, also, Mr. Fickett, that there were many wholesale liquor dealers carrying on that business upon a large scale. Their names are familiar to you to-day, as they are to me. Now, is there one such establishment in Maine?"

"No; I do not believe there is."

"Then it comes to this, Mr. Fickett; in the old rum time a great many open grogshops, all up and down our streets—now not one. Seven distilleries and two breweries running night and day—now not one. Many wholesale liquor dealers on a large scale—now not one. Great quantities of West India rum imported every year, many cargoes—now not even a single puncheon imported in many years. Then, how do you make it out, Mr. Fickett, that not a bit of good has been done? that all our labor has been lost, that there is as much liquor selling and drunkenness as ever?"

"I have never thought of it in the light in which you present it. I have been always hearing the talk that Prohibition is a failure, and constantly seeing such statements in the papers, and accepted them as true."

"There are a great many intelligent men who are now as ignorant of the true condition of things in Maine on this subject as Mr. Fickett, a citizen of Portland, as he always was; and this marvellous change in the status of the liquor traffic going on under his eyes without making any impression upon him."

It is far within the truth to say that in Portland the volume of the liquor traffic is not one-hundredth part so large as it was at the time of the enactment of Prohibition, the city being now twice larger than at that time. It is far within the truth to say that in the State at large the quantity of liquor sold is not one-twentieth part so large as it was in the old rum time. In more than three-fourths of our territory containing more than three-fourths of our population, the grogshop is practically unknown. An entire generation has grown up there never having seen a saloon or any of the effects of such an establishment. In the old time there was no part of Maine where the liquor traffic was not an established institution. There was no hamlet so small or remote that the liquor dealer did not find it and establish a rum-shop there. Now all that is changed; there is an open rum-shop nowhere except in Bangor and in two or three other places where the law is not enforced.

Maine has now become, like Switzerland, a place of very large summer resort. The numerous islands along its extensive coast, and the coast itself, are dotted with excellent hotels and innumerable summer cottages whither people come from all parts of the country for the comfort and health of sea breezes and for the pleasure of catching fish abundantly of almost every kind known in our markets, from the eel to the cunner and the smelt, including salmon. All about our numerous rivers and lakes are also charming villages, hotels and cottages crowded in the summer season with pleasure and health-seekers from almost every State in the Union. The keepers of these places of summer resort were terrified, or pretended to be so, at the policy of sweeping the State clean of intoxicants, because it was sure, they said, at a convention called by them to consider the matter, to leave them with empty houses and unoccupied cottages. The lake and river steamers were to rot along the shores; the railroads were to run empty cars; the shipmen were to weep over their large stocks of goods, becoming dusty, shop-worn and out of fashion, because the Maine laws would drive all customers away to other States where intoxicants were as abundant as water.

Well, the season came, and with it tourists in such crowds that Maine had never seen the like before. Steamboats and railroads, cottages and hotels were driven to despair almost for lack of ability properly to receive and accommodate the multitudes who came; and everywhere those means of transportation and entertainment are to be increased in numbers and dimensions before the coming of another summer. It is demonstrated now as never before, that summer tourists, seekers of health, pleasure and recreation do not include intoxicants in their list of wants. If there are any who do, they are not wanted in Maine; and their absence will add greatly to the comfort and enjoyment of all others.

The benefits of this state of things are seen and felt in many ways. A shoemaker, whose shop is near a railway station and whose customers are mostly the working-men in that neighborhood, said to me that under the former system his sales weekly were so much—naming the amount; now, he said, they are so much, more than twice as much. The wages went to the grog-shops; now they go for shoes for wife and children. A grocer in the same locality told me that his sales are more than twice as much as they were before the grog-shops were suppressed. We formerly had a great many children, ragged and barefoot, going about regularly from house to house, each having a regular beat, begging for "cold victuals." Now there is none of that, absolutely none. A friend stopped me in the street and said he had just met a little girl who had been a daily visitor at his house for cold victuals; he had not seen her for some days. He said: "Sally, how do you do? Why do you not come and see us now?"

"Oh, sir, we have warm victuals at home now!" Father no longer wasting his wages at the grogshop, but devoting them to the comfort of the home.

In one of the foremost papers of New York, a correspondent recently said:

"The argument against Prohibition is that its advantages are more than counterbalanced by secret drinking; that home drinking, club drinking and drug-store drinking are enormously increased."

The remark was general in its application to Prohibition localities everywhere, not intended specially for Maine. To this State it has no application whatever; there is no suspicion of such a state of things here, though our people are not all teetotalers yet. I was in a barber's shop and said to him: "Dry times now."

"Yes," he said, "and I am glad of it; at first I did not like it and was uncomfortable under it. My allowance was six glasses a day; I thought I could not get on without it; but now I do not even think of it; I feel myself better without it, and a Saturday night I find my pockets the heavier for it, by four or five dollars which for many years I spent in drink. I shall now have at least two hundred and fifty dollars a year saved or spent for useful purposes; I like it better."

I was driving in the street some weeks ago, and saw coming a gentleman of fortune, whom I knew well as a jolly good fellow and a free and easy drinker. He drew up his horse as he approached and in a loud voice said:

"Do you know where I can get a drink?"

"No; I do not know of any such place in town."

"Neither do I; this is the first time in my life that I couldn't get a drink when I wanted it."

"Well, how do you like it?"

"I like it now; at first I did not; I was uneasy and missed my smile when the regular time came; but now I do not think of it and feel myself the better, though I used to think it a necessary life."

These are fair samples of the working of the law.

The moral effects of prohibition are rarely spoken of except by the friends of drink, who say that it leads directly to hypocrisy. It may in some cases bring out the hypocrisy and other bad traits in the drinker's character which is sure to be honeycombed by many evil tendencies. In Maine we find the moral effect of it every way good. It tends to render the drink habit disreputable; it injures the credit and standing of business men who have it; public dinners and picnics, where the drink was always present in the old time, now have none. The Board of Trade of Portland has an annual dinner at which intoxicants are never present. There was recently a grand meeting and dinner at Bangor of all the Boards of Trade of Maine; no intoxicants were there; the matter was not even thought of. In some private circles alcohol is yet present, but generally it is excluded by common consent, as it was not in the old rum time.

It is computed that the annual saving to Maine, direct and indirect, from prohibition, is twenty-four million dollars, which under any form of license would be spent, lost and wasted in drink, as in the old rum time.

The result of this has been a great increase in the wealth of the State. In the old time it was the poorest in the Union, now it is one of the most prosperous. Its industries are largely multiplied and extended with abundant capital to conduct them, and a large surplus annually seeking outside investments. In the old rum time, we had not capital enough to carry on our few and restricted business enterprises; we were borrowers in those days; now we borrow of nobody, but our surplus capital goes to almost every part of the country seeking safe and profitable investment.

In every part of the State are abundant evidences of industry, enterprise and thrift among the people, while with a candle and diligent searching, no saloon can be found except in a very few localities.

PORTLAND, MAINE.

FOR "THE FRIEND."
WILLIAM COWPER.

Reflections after reading his poems and viewing his portra.

BY C. S. COPE.

"Oh poets! from a maniac's tongue
Was poured the deathless singing!
Oh Christians! at the cross of hope
A hopeless hand was clinging!
Oh men! this man, in brotherhood,
Your weary paths beguiling,
Gleamed inly while he taught you peace
And died while ye were smiling!"

BROWNING.

The lips that first sang thee are silent forever;
The hand that first penned thee has gone to decay;
The life-giving spirit returns to them never;
The soul and the body have parted for aye.

How oft has this form bowed in solemn devotion
"Neath heaven's high arch in its glory arrayed;
How oft have these eyes told the heart-felt emotion,
As abroad o'er the beauties of nature they strayed.

How supremely sublime are the works of creation
In the force of thy soul-stirring numbers displayed,
As by thee in the words of profound veneration,
Their features and beauties to me are portrayed.

As a mother prepareth the food for her offspring
Thy genius digests a repast for my mind,
From the fruits or the flowers that the season may Bring.

On the rich festal-board of their Author I find.

How oft thy sweet song with the larks' has ascended,
As high o'er the meads in the morning they soar;
But now thy melodious numbers are blended
With the voice of the songsters of summer no more.

Still here I can view thee thou prince of the number,
Whose features and words grace these pages along;
For here thy bright eyes speaking lustre shall linger,
And here shall thy soul live immortal in song.

What happy reflections' thy time was devoted
To the cause of religion and virtue what here;
That the holy Apostles by thee could be quoted,
The memorial he left of his earthly career.

But, alas, what dark nights of despair were thy portion!
Yet still through those nights of the darkest of fear,
Thy peaceful submission and humble devotion,
Seemed meekness and virtue personified here.

Thy dread was that thou by fixed fate wast predestined
In the region of torment forever to be;
Yet through all thy desponding, thy soul was resigned,
Not a finger would raise 'gainst the awful decree.

But time brought relief from thy fearful foreboding
And broke the strong links of the adamant chain,
That anguish and sorrow had long been corroding,
And released thy tried soul from its thralldom again.

How glorious that conceiving no mortal can tell me,
No mind can conceive and no eye can behold,
From the dark depths of horror that often befall thee
To the joys that eternal fruition unfold.

From the bondage of error, despondency's chain,
To join with the host of the host on high;
With thy God, and thy Saviour triumphant to reign
As eternity's infinite ages roll by.

Oh say! can I ever be one of the number,
Through the days of unchanging duration enrolled
With the bards of the past! to awake from my slumber
And mingle my song with the psalmists of old?

TWO VICTORIES.

SELECTED.

A hero came from battle, where the slain
Lay piled in bloody heaps upon the plain;
And all the people sung the hero's praise,
And crowned him with the victor's honored bays.

A simple child fought hard against a sin,
And won a mighty victory within;
No one rehearsed his praise, or sung his fame,
But heaven's recording angel wrote his name.

Where e'er our wandering feet do stray,
Our Master's near to call away.
He calleth long;
He striveth e'er our steps to stay,
His power is strong.

Although our hearts seem hard and cold,
In love He's drawing toward his fold;
Which we may share,
Our hands so tenderly He'll hold
Until we're there.

He's near unto the broken heart,
And pleads to give a better part.
The contrite one
He shieldeth from the keenest dart
Till life is done.

Then may our hearts though hard and cold,
Come out from nature's sinful hold,
No longer wait,
But follow on into his fold
Ere 'tis too late.

Thou! life within my life, than self more near!
Thou! veiled presence infinitely dear!
From all my nameless weariness I flee

Take part with me against these doubts that rise
And seek to throne thee far in distant skies!
Take part with me against this self that dares
Assume the burden of these sins and cares!
How shall I call thee who art always here,—
How shall I praise thee who art still most dear,
What may I give thee save what thou hast given
And whom but thee have I in earth or heaven.

The annual Thanksgiving Day of '91 is gone—not the yesterdays that are past—gone by—not to return, except in memory. The question of to-day is—What impression has been made by the events which are of daily occurrence?
"Known only to God, are all his works." "God is a God of knowledge and by Him actions are weighed." In the world of observation there are lookers-on not a few. With a clear-sighted vision discovery is made that inconsistencies abound to an alarming extent. The heart-felt homage that is due to the Creator is strangely perverted, and to some extent applied to the creatively appetite. Many thousands of the lives of God's little creatures are sacrificed to pamper to the wants of appetite. Is this justifiable for the purpose of satisfying the unrestrained cravings of mortals? This is a question that may not harm even such Christians as consider that "whether they eat, or whether they drink, or whatsoever they take in hand to do—that all should be done to the glory of God."
A word to the wise is sufficient. And is it not wise to profit when reminded that "not even pleasure to excess is good."

What most elates thin sinks the soul as low,
"Happy is the man that findeth wisdom and the man that getteth understanding." A proper medium between right and left, when observed leads to a right understanding of the value of things. "A just weight and balance are the Lord's." Actions weighed by Him receive their reward, whether good or evil. The Divine sentence—"Mene, mene, Tekel U pharsin," is only seen written on the wall for those who do evil.

Early Marriage Certificates.

It is not generally known, that in the early days of our religious Society there was considerable variety in the wording of marriage certificates. This, of course, arose from an unorganized condition, and was especially noticeable in places which had been newly settled. The writer has recently had the opportunity of examining a partial record of marriage certificates belonging to Perquimans Monthly Meeting, North Carolina, and the following specimens transcribed from it present some characteristics which are not commonly met with even in those early days. The spelling of the words of these certificates as well as the phraseology has been carefully copied, believing that both features will add to the interest of the documents. G. V.

The Eastern Shore of Chesapeake Bay.

Although the members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting now remaining in the Peninsula are reduced to a few scattered individuals; yet it is not surprising that much interest should still be felt in a section of country where so many living Gospel ministers had labored in former days; and where the doctrines and testimonies of Truth as held by the Society of Friends had found many faithful supporters. It is still more natural that such an interest should be felt by members of a Yearly Meeting which for nearly 200 years had watched over the spiritual interests of its inhabitants, and labored for their preservation from evil, and their growth in righteousness.

An evidence of this interest was given in the present year by a religious concern which had long rested on the minds of two of our ministers, and which led them to obtain liberty from their respective Monthly Meetings to pay a visit in Gospel love to those parts. Their concern embraced the most of the places where Friends had formerly resided, and where their descendants could still be met with. In the prosecution of this visit about thirty-five public meetings were held in Delaware and the parts of Maryland east of the Chesapeake, besides going to prisons and almshouses in several of the counties.

It was the privilege of the writer to accompany them during a small part of this visit. Some extracts from the notes preserved may be of interest to the reader.

I joined them on the evening of Sixth Month 25th, at Cambridge, in Dorchester County, on the south bank of the Choptank River, and by rail about 143 miles from Philadelphia. On my arrival my friends had already gone to the place where a religious meeting had been appointed. Owing probably to some miscarriage in the spreading of the notice, the meeting was not very large—but yet it was a satisfactory one in other respects. Attention was called to the lesson taught to the Apostle Peter, not to call anything common or unclean which the Lord had cleansed. An exhortation was delivered to those who might be tempted to doubt the existence of God, or the divinity of Christ; and a testimony was borne to the necessity of experiencing the new birth, of walking in the narrow path of self-denial, and of passing through the baptism of the Holy Ghost and of fire. The second coming of Christ, which it is important for every one of us to know, was declared to be his coming into our hearts by his Spirit.

We took the steamboat from Baltimore on the morning of the 26th, and had a lovely ride up the Choptank River to Denton, in Caroline County. The cool, fresh breeze was quite invigorating; and our journey was abundantly more agreeable than the hot, dusty ride in the cars the preceding day. On the boat I met with an agreeable young man returning home from the Maryland Agricultural College. He was clothed in uniform. I was sorry to learn from him that the students were trained in military drill. Whatever disciplinary advantages may result from this, it can scarcely fail to familiarize them with military ideas, and pave the way for some of them enlisting in the army. He seemed quite open to hear what was said to him and promised to read Dymond's Essay on War and another religious book, which it was concluded to send to him.

Our friends had already held a public meeting at Denton, in which the father of this young man had been very helpful; and the object in returning there was to find a conveyance to Hillsborough, a few miles distant, where a meeting had been appointed in the house of the Southern Methodists. In the afternoon we called on two elderly women, the only surviving members of the meeting on Tuckahoe Neck, across the Choptank. The lot on which the house is situated was purchased from the Nicholites in 1804.

After supper a brother of the student from the Agricultural College, kindly drove us to Hillsborough. The night was dark, but about sixty persons gathered at the place appointed, and we had a solid, good meeting. In the first communication the thought was unfolded, that all true personal religion comes from the Divine Power operating on the mind. The sermon which followed this was somewhat in the same line. The text was quoted—"Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his ways: by taking heed thereto according to thy word." To guide us safely through life, we need a rule much closer to us than any outward rules—closer than the Scriptures, the laws of the land, or the precepts of our teachers. Such a rule is furnished by the Spirit of Christ, which He promised to send to his disciples. If we obey his teachings—if we walk in the Light—we will know the blood of Christ to cleanse us from sin; but if we reject it, we will come under condemnation. The doctrine was close, and was closely pressed upon the audience.

A fervent supplication closed the vocal services.

We were kindly entertained for the night by Francis Tatam Barton, a cousin of our friend Huldah Bonwill and a member of the congregation we had met with in the evening.

The next morning (Sixth Month 27th) two of our number took the early train to Greensborough (formerly Choptank Bridge) to arrange for a meeting there. The Methodist minister, Robert W. Todd, kindly offered us the use of his place of worship for a meeting on Second-day evening (Sixth Month 29th). He received us with much openness. Having at one time been located in Wilmington, he knew something about Friends.

The meeting-house belonging to Friends at this place had disappeared many years ago, but the graveyard was still remaining. It seemed to be a neglected spot, with no one to care for it. We completed arrangements in time to take the morning train southward to Easton, where my companions stopped, and I went on some miles further, and thence by a mail hack, to Trappe. Here, through the kind assistance of Edward Powell, formerly a Westtown scholar, I was able to make arrangements for a meeting at 4 p. m. the next day, the use of their house having been promised us by the Methodist Episcopal minister. So promptly was all this done, that I returned on the hack in time to return to Easton in the afternoon, where I rejoined my two friends, who were being kindly entertained by J. Wilson Tyler.

We walked out a short distance to see the old meeting-house of Third Haven or Tred-Aven—one of the first built in this section of country, and more than 200 years old. A new brick house had been erected near by, but the old one is still kept in repair. There are some very fine old white oaks on the ground; one in particular was a magnificent specimen.

In the evening we were taken a short ride out of Easton to call on one of the members of this meeting, Robert W. Dixon, also a former Westtown scholar. He lives in a beautiful spot on a bluff overlooking Miles or St. Michael's River. A cove runs up each side of his farm. At the head of one of these, called Betty's Cove, the first meeting-house in this part of the country is said to have been located—one that was visited by George Fox. It has now disappeared, and the only traces of it are occasional bricks met with. We were very kindly and hospitably received, and had an agreeable visit. Some of his trees were so loaded down with peaches that the branches almost reached the ground.

On First-day morning (Sixth Month 28th), about eighty people assembled in the Third Haven Meeting-house.

One of my friends spoke on the nature of spiritual worship, and on the Divine Grace or Spirit of Christ, through which man is enabled to perform it. Reference was made to the testimony of Martha at the grave of Lazarus, and to that of Peter, that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of the living God.

This was followed by another communication in harmony therewith dwelling on the doctrine of the atonement, and the necessity of knowing also the inward work of Christ. The meeting was closed with a supplication, asking for the pouring out of the Spirit on that community, so that those might be raised up who would promote the righteousness of the people.

Our kind friend, Robert W. Dixon, sent a carriage and pair of horses, with one of his sons as a driver, to assist in conveying us to Trappe, where a meeting had been appointed at 4 o'clock. A large company assembled there, whose attention was called to several practical points, such as the avoidance of insincerity, frivolity, &c., which tend to divert the mind from a strict adherence to the Divine will. The speaker enforced the need of obedience to the Light of Christ, and of being delivered from sin in this life; and also bore testimony to the atoning sacrifice of Christ. It was a good meeting, and at its close expressions of satisfaction were received from several of those who were present.

Our driver told us that formerly there were many slaves in these parts, and on the opposite side of Miles River from his father's farm, there dwelt a Colonel Lloyd, who owned a large plantation of 3,000 acres, and had 999 slaves. He never succeeded in making the number 1,000, for if he bought a new one, death or some accident would always prevent the filling up of the round number.

A Truthful Inscription.—The London Sunday School Chronicle tells this story:—Dr. Stellweg, the famous Austrian oculist, during the course of a lecture at Vienna related the following story of Dom Pedro, of Brazil: He said that one of the ex-emperors' dearest wishes had been to have a big hospital at Rio, but that he lacked the money wherewith to build it, and the wealthy people could not be induced to subscribe. Then an idea came to him, as it had to the German Emperor Joseph a century ago. He began to grant life peerages to all persons who were willing to subscribe good round sums toward the hospital. The patents of count, viscount, and baron, were not hereditary; and, if the children wished to inherit their father's title, they had to pay for it afresh. Brazil was thereby peopled with nobles, and the hospital was built on a grand scale. When it was finished, Dom Pedro had the following inscription placed on its gates: "Vanitas Humanae Misericordia Humanae!" ("Human Vanity to Human Misery.")

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"The Master is Come, and Calleth for Thee."

Are there not those amongst us who can understand this language? Who have felt themselves called from time to time, to take up the cross and follow their Lord and Master in the way that He requirith? And who have felt the restraining and constraining hand upon them, and who at such times have been almost persuaded to turn their steps Zionwards. But the accuser of the brethren whispers there is time enough, and so there is a halting as between two opinions, scarcely knowing whether to turn and serve the living God, and enter that path which leads to everlasting happiness; or to follow on in the ways and pleasures of the things of this world, which perish with the using.

Well, let me say to such, there is no time for loitering, seeing we have no lease for our lives; the present time only is ours; this is worthy of a thought, and as death leaves us judgment will find us; when there will be no coming back to make amends, or to rectify mistakes. But, dear friends, whoever you may be, the dear Master has waited long to be gracious to some of us, and will not be wanting on his part, but when this inward call is hearkened to and obeyed, light will be given, not the outward light, but that inward spiritual light which will lighten your pathway, and lead you into paths you have not known. And when enlisted under his banner, you will be taught from time to time what to do and what to leave undone, and peace will be the reward. But faithfulness to these gentle calls must be maintained, and as you patiently abide the refining and purifying process; not making shipwreck of faith when the Master hides his face, but moving on in that obedience that keeps pace with knowledge, in his own time He will return with healing power. And, as there is an adhering to this way, you will find new pleasures in following the blessed Saviour, He whom the Father hath sent to save poor fallen mankind—who died, and rose again, and now sitteth at the right hand of the Father, interceding for poor sinners. But don't stumble at the cross, but be willing to bear it for his sake—who "endured the cross, despising the shame." There will not be more put on you to do than there will be strength given to bear; and as there is a single eye kept towards the dear Master, seeking for guidance to direct, He will lend a helping hand—for He is the helper of the helpless. And while about your daily business, whatever it may be, your minds can be employed about those things that pertain unto holiness. So, dear Friends, those of the class that I am speaking to, think on these things; ere it be too late, while time and opportunity are given, and there will be no cause to regret the chosen path, but on the other hand cause of rejoicing. The willing and obedient will find a place of retreat, a safe hiding place in every time of need. Then be persuaded to take up the cross, and show more fully to the world on whose side you are. I fear there are some amongst us whose talents are buried in the earth as it were—for want of a willingness to be faithful to known duties, but they are to be cultivated, by the aid of the Holy Spirit, and made fit for the Master's use. It is the design of our Heavenly Father to raise up in every generation those that will serve Him. But let none plead excuse, and say I will live as I list, thinking that there are others that can take up the cross and live aloof from the things of the world. This will not do.

We must all work out our own soul's salvation, one cannot do the work for another; but it must be done by and through the blessed Saviour, who stands as a mediator between God and man, and will help all those that come to Him with full purpose of heart; for He hath said, "Him that cometh to me I will in nowise cast out." Then let none be discouraged. There must be a willingness to labor "for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life." When this comes to be the case, the pleasures of this world will become more stained to the outward eye, and there will be a looking within—where the Comforter may be found, and that peace at times given, which the world can neither give nor take away. Blessed peace, blessed assurance, to be able to attain to this, through the goodness and mercy of the Most High, who is worthy of all praise now and forever. Thus, when those of the class I am addressing, come to know these things for yourselves, you may be able to say, "Now we believe, not because of thy saying; for we have heard Him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world."

And thus you will become prepared to bear the trials that come across your pathway, even the little daily worries which are often small in themselves, but require patience to bear them. Then enlist under his banner and, finally, be prepared when the summons comes for one of those mansions which the Saviour has gone before to prepare, for the obedient and faithful of all generations.

"Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The following letter contains some instructive hints which I thought might afford comfort and be strengthening to some of the readers of "THE FRIEND." William Ellis, to whom the letter was addressed, was an English Friend who had then lately travelled in this country on religious service:

DEAR FRIEND,

WILLIAM ELLIS:

Not having the opportunity to be more in thy company when thou wast here amongst us, I could not well omit to signify my true love to thee, and unity with that measure of the blessed, holy power which I have had a sense of, as attending thy ministry; and thy plain doctrine; and of thy promoting true spiritual and inward worship to God.

Thou hast been instrumental to help forward our retired meetings here, which I hope will be of good service. This, many of us, I believe, have long desired; being duly sensible that the perfection of Divine worship and prayer to God, as to our own particulars, is performed mostly in true silence and inward retiresness before our great Creator; and this indeed is much the end of outward testimony, and is that into which my soul desires to be gathered more and more. So with true and unfeigned love to thee—desiring the Lord may prosper thee in his service,

I remain thy friend,

WILLIAM SOUTHERS.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Poisonous Umbelliferae.—The family of plants having their flowers arranged in umbels as in the Wild Carrot, are difficult to distinguish from each other, except by careful examination of the seed vessels. A cross section of these shows the ribs and oil tubes which are characteristic of different genera.

All the plants appear to form three different principles: the first a watery, acid matter. Where this predominates they are poisonous. Second, a gum-resinous, milky substance, which acts as a stimulant. Third, an aromatic, oily secretion, which causes some of them to be pleasant to the palate.

The Poison Hemlock (Conium) of Europe has a peculiar mousy odor, and is a powerful poison used by the ancient Greeks for the removal of objectionable politicians. The Water Hemlock of America, a common plant in our swamps, is equally poisonous and has been the cause of many sad accidents. Among useful vegetables belonging to this order, are parsnips, peas, carrots, anise, caraway, and celery. This last in its wild state is said to be hurtful, but the process of blanching renders it harmless. Occasionally a slight taste, suggestive of its originally poisonous qualities, may be detected in the cultivated plant.

Economic Botany.—G. S. Goodale, in his address before the American Association of Science, gives the number of flowering plants which have been described as about 107,000. There are probably 3,000 species yet to be discovered or distinguished from others with which they have been confounded. If we should make a list of all the flowering plants which are cultivated on what we may call a fairly large scale at the present day, placing therein all food and forage plants, all those which are grown for timber and cabinet woods, for fibres and cordage, for tanning materials, dyes, resins, gum, rubber, oils, perfumes and medicines, we could bring together barely 300 species.

The Mantis Feeding.—The Mantis is a green insect, about two inches long, which feeds on smaller insects. Its manner of catching these is thus described: A Mantis had been put under a glass shade, and some flies were placed in it. "They flew about and walked round the Mantis, which, standing up at its full height, poised on the four hinder legs, held the two in front (which we may call arms, and which are adorned with a shaded spot of vivid blue on the second joint) closely folded together in the supposed devotional attitude which has won for it the name of Praying Mantis (and which would well describe it if for a while e-praying).

"Fixing its eyes on the nearest fly, the Mantis watched eagerly, turning its head this way and that, following the movements of the fly with an eager, intelligent expression of face, as a man or sagacious animal might do, but not otherwise changing its position. The fly, after creeping and flying round and round, lit on the paper just in front of the Mantis, which, with one rapid dart of an arm, like a clever conjurer's ledger-main, almost too quick for detection, snatched it up, and, holding it firmly impaled between the double row of sharp spines with which the points of the arm are provided, lifting it up to its mouth, and began quietly to eat it alive, first biting off and rejecting the head. Ere it had taken more than one or two bites, a second fly walked across within range, and was seized by the disengaged arm of the Mantis, which then like a greedy child with a cake in each hand bit sometimes a morsel out of one, sometimes out of the other, until the bodies of both flies were devoured, and the heads, legs and wings lay discarded on the paper."—Tasmanian Friends and Foes.

PRECIOUS SAVIOUR.

He is a happy man, who is able to set his Saviour above all. The One "altogether lovely." But there is a proneness to place the affections too much on earthly objects, and thus forget Jesus and the supreme love with which we ought to regard Him. Thus dishonoring Him and robbing ourselves. What interest hath this empty world in us, or what is there to entice from the Saviour and hold the affections from things above. With the "wise man," I can say it is a howling wilderness apart from the Grace of God in the heart, and all its pleasures are vanity, and bring vexation of spirit sooner or later.

A few bright jewels are often found in the darkest places.

In spiritual things it is found, that the best plants often grow in the most barren soil, never was a place so depraved as not to yield some converts, or any class of persons so fallen as not to become believers, through mercy, as past sins are repented of and an amendment of life experienced. Our Heavenly Father has children everywhere, even in this prison, though it be under a curse, you may discover some elect ones ordained to be as jewels for the Redeemer's crown. The Lord is ever waiting to welcome the returning prodigal from the field of sin to the Father's house, there to abide.

PRaise UNTO GOD.

"Bless the Lord, Oh! my soul and all that s within me, bless his holy name." Wake up, my memories, and tell what the Lord has done for me in days gone by; fly back, ye thoughts, o my childhood; review my youth and its early avors, consider the long-suffering grace which followed my wanderings, and bore with my rebellion; review before my eyes that happy hour when first I knew the Lord, and tell over again the matchless story of his mercy. Awake up, my judgment, and come forth my understanding, and weigh his loving kindness in the balance; ee if thou canst count the small dust of his mercies; see if thou canst estimate the unsearchable riches which God hath given thee, in his unspeakable gift of Christ Jesus; reckon up the reasons of that everlasting covenant which He made on thy behalf; and praise that love which planned, and that grace which carried out the scheme of thy redemption.

"When all thy mercies, Oh! my God,
My rising soul surveys,
Transported with the view, I'm lost
In wonder, love and praise."

Arbitration.—The Public Ledger of Philadelphia, in commenting on a statement, that the British and American Governments had agreed to refer to arbitration the dispute respecting the seal-fishery in Behring Sea, says: "Every such agreement is a distinct victory for civilization, and an argument against the sullen arbitrament of the sword, which should go far toward keeping the latter resting in its scabbard."

The editor of the Christian Advocate tells the following incident: A foreign delegate to the late Methodist Conference made a frank, aggressive speech. Passing along in the aisle we heard one of those of his way of thinking say to him: "You never did so well in your life. It was a great occasion, you rose to it. It was worth counting thousands of miles to say what you did. I tell you, you honored us." Before the smile of satisfaction which such words enkindled had died away, another representative from abroad approached him abruptly. Said he: "What is the matter with you? You were almost incoherent. We all felt ashamed that any body from our side should get off such rot. You had better prepare your speech when you go to represent us. There was not a man among us who agreed with you." This is instructive.

We listened to both with amusement, as the speech was upon a question that derived its meaning from the other side of the Atlantic; but human nature is the same here. Partisans civil and ecclesiastical pour out praise and blame without regard to real merits.

The feelings of sensible men and women speaking their convictions should be equally independent of the exaggerations of praise and the exacerbatons of censure. If not, they are "poor weak worms," whether they crawl or turn under trampling heels or lift up their heads with courage fed by the honey of flattery.

Gambling.—There are many cases of morals, no doubt, where the division between right and wrong lies somewhere along a line of degree—for example, in the use of the appetite. But this is always where the sensitive function has itself a blameless beginning and defined function beyond which excess sets in and runs into ever deeper quag. In gambling, the initial principle—gain by another's loss—is vicious and vitiating.

Even in the cases where the entrance upon wrong is at a point of degree, as in eating and drinking, it may become a duty to refrain from an innocent measure of indulgence, if by doing so companions infirm of will are likely to be saved from excess. I am not bound to use all my permissible liberty; I am bound to forego any portion of it which may be hurtful to others. Gambling deals principally with cases not of competitive skill, but of incalculable contingency where the composition of determining agencies defies all foresight. To fasten one's interest and curiosity upon this order of events is to school on a self in all that is weak and contemptible in character, and to live by guess-work.—James Martineau in the Christian World.

The Bible in Italy.—The effort of Senor Sonzogno, of Milan, editor of the Secolo newspaper, to give the Italians a cheap edition of the Bible, has proved a financial success apart from its blessed moral results. His venture has led him to attempt another issue of the Scriptures under different circumstances. The previous edition was published with notes from the Roman Catholic standpoint; but this time he purposes issuing the Bible without note or comment, and let it speak for itself. He will, no doubt, encounter on this account greater opposition from the ecclesiastics of Italy in his new undertaking, but the former enterprise will prepare the way for the more successful accomplishment of the latter. He is doing more for his native land than he realizes. God is using him for the scriptural enlightenment of his countrymen. The demand for the Bible is growing. Alexander Robertson, of Venice, says, "Last year in Italy the Bible had a sale greater than that of any other book." This edition of Signor Sonzogno was pictorial, and preached to the eye as well as to the ear. Issued in half-penny parts, it also came within the pecuniary ability of the masses.—Selected.

Do you remember that poet David Wasson, a man of such rarely individualized mental power that no popular success could come to him, and one at whose life a distressing spinal disease dragged until it smote him with blindness, do you remember how he, who had sorely tasted some of life's disappointments and hardships, wrote for us?

"Ask and receive—"tis sweetly said;
Yet what to plead for know I not;
For Wish is worsted, Hope o'ersped,
And aye to thanks returns my thought.
If I would pray, I've naught to say
But this, that God may be God still,
For Him to live is still to give,
And sweeter than my wish his will.
O wealth of life beyond all bound,
Eternity each moment given!
What plummet may the Present sound?
Who promises a future heaven?
Or glad or grieved, O'pressed, relieved,
In blackest night or brightest day,
Still pours the flood of golden good
And more than harmful fills me aye."

The Golden Center.—If at a given time in the year the gate of a certain palace was opened to all comers, that every one might there present a request to the king, with the certainty of a hearing and an answer, how many petitioners would appear, how many would seek the presence-chamber before the doors were closed! How eagerly should we see the crowd pressing towards the place of grace, resolute to reach it at any cost! Anxious hearts would be counting the hours until they could spread their case before the mighty monarch.

Now behold a door always open, a hand powerful to aid, a heart full of love and sympathy to feel, and power to do more than you can ask or think. O sorrowful soul, why stand afar off? The door is not shut day nor night, and every encouragement is sent to you from the loving invitation of the king to enter: "Come unto Me, all ye that labor, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest!" "Enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly" (Matt. vi, 6).

Shall we never be perplexed, never be sorrowful, if we can pray? Oh, yes. It is our perplexity too often that alone sends us to the mercenary; it is our grief that keeps us there. But fear not: "He discovereth deep things out of darkness" (Job xii, 22-24); and to understand his will we must dwell in the sanctuary. The profoundest mysteries would not satisfy the soul. It is the sanctifying and satisfying influence of the Holy Spirit which alone teaches us the practical necessity of resting on Him every hour; and proportionately as we have sought and found the light, and we seek to follow it, shall we delight in his way.

*From "Asked of God," by Anna Shipton.

A TESTIMONY of Norwich Monthly Meeting, England, respecting the services of Peter Andrews of America, speaks of his travels in Yorkshire, and says, "Friends were greatly refreshed and edified by his Christian visit, though not always attended by public declarations, in their religious meetings appointed on his account; and which were mostly very large and expectations high; yet his eye being single to his great Master's putting forth, he was often led to finish that too eager desire after words; and in several public meetings he had nothing to say amongst them, which though a great disappointment to many for the present, yet there afterwards appeared a signal service in."

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 26, 1891.

Having recently had the opportunity of examining some letters written by Anthony Benezet to his friend George Dillwyn, we have been impressed with the evidence they furnished of a mind much devoted to the promotion of the welfare of his fellow-men, and yet preserved in an humble consciousness that without the Divine aid and blessing it is out of the power of man to do anything that is spiritually good, or that will promote the cause of Christ.

In one of these letters, he says: "Let us, dear George, in all our conduct, but more particularly in our religious approaches, and on all occasions when we lay the least hand or finger, as we may think to steady the ark, move only in the Divine direction: but this I find to be hard work, particularly to one of my active disposition."

Of similar import is a letter written in 1780, which contains the following paragraph:

"I am more and more made deeply sensible, and much desire to abide in that sense, that as water cannot rise above its spring, nothing can lead to God, but what comes from Him; therefore I am earnestly desirous not to move, but as I am at least persuaded something more than reason puts forth."

We are far from wishing to discourage any of our members in their efforts to do good—for it must ever be a cause of rejoicing to the living members of the Church to see their fellow-members "abounding in the work of the Lord;" but in order that their labors may not be in vain, but be fruitful of good, it is wise to keep in remembrance the caution expressed by A. Benezet, that "nothing can lead to God but what comes from Him."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 15th inst. Senator Sherman, of Ohio, presented in the United States Senate, remonstrances of several Yearly Meetings of Friends in Indiana against the traffic in intoxicating liquors and the President in Ohio.

A Senator Preston B. Plumb, of Kansas, died suddenly of apoplexy in Washington at noon on the 20th inst., aged fifty-four years. He began to fail a year ago, and would not heed the advice of his physician to give up work and take a rest.

The President has sent to the Senate the nomination of Stephen B. Elkins, of West Virginia, to be Secretary of War. The nomination was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

News was received in Muskegoe, Indian Territory, on the 19th inst., that the Cherokee Council and the United States Commission had agreed upon the sale and purchase of the Cherokee strip for the consideration of nearly $9,000,000.

The Russian Chargé d'Affaires at Washington has written to a correspondent in Ohio that the population of twelve provinces in Russia, representing over 20,000,000 people, is actually starving. While not instructed to open subscriptions nor appeal for help, Alexander Greger wrote that "every cent sacrificed for the relief of our sufferers will help, and will bring everlasting gratitude from Russians."

The Brazilian Minister has formally notified the Secretary of State of the desire of his Government for an extension of the time for the exchange of ratifications of the Arbitration Treaty formulated by the International American Conference. This treaty has lapsed by reason of the failure to fully exchange ratifications within the specified limit of time. Other South American countries have also expressed a desire for an extension of the period of ratification. The extension of time can be secured only by the concurrence of all the countries concerned, and the diplomatic agents of our Government are now striving for that object.

On the 16th inst. the Democratic State Nominating Convention of Louisiana was called to meet at Baton Rouge to discuss the question of the lottery. The meeting failed to agree on the organization, and accordingly two conventions were organized. The anti-lottery delegates were in the minority. On the 19th, the Lottery branch nominated a State ticket, adopted a platform and adjourned.

A dispatch from Des Moines, Iowa, says that Chairman Clarkson, of the Republican National Committee, urges the Republicans of that State to "drop prohibition," declaring that there was "no hope of winning so long as they clung to the unpopular issue of prohibition."

At Tulare, a large body of water in California, is said to be disappearing through the streams which supply it being used for irrigation purposes.

A vein of coal four feet thick, 400 feet from the surface, has been discovered near Brush Creek, two miles from Kansas City.

Of 1000 deaths reported in this city last week we were 625; being 27 more than the previous week, and 246 more than the number reported one year ago. Of the whole number, 302 were males and 323 females; 106 died of pneumonia; 63 of consumption; 61 of influenza; 43 of diseases of the heart; 40 of diphtheria; 29 of bronchitis; 27 of old age; 20 of crop; 17 of apoplexy; 16 of scarlet fever; 15 of cholera; 15 of convulsions; 14 of scarlet fever and 12 of congestion of the lungs.

FOREIGN.—The Duke of Devonshire, who has for a long time been lying ill and near to death's door, at his residence, Holke Hall, Milnthorpe, died on the evening of the 21st inst. By his death his eldest son, the Marquis of Hartington, succeeds to the peerage, thus leaving a vacancy in the House of Commons for the Duke of Devonshire.

The deceased, William Cavendish, was the seventh Duke of Devonshire. He was born Fourth Month 27, 1808, succeeded his grandfather as Earl of Burlington on Fifth Month 9, 1834, and succeeded his cousin as Duke of Devonshire on First Month 18, 1858.

Influenza, raging in many parts in the United Kingdom and is increasing in severity. Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria, is said to be seriously sick with the disease.

France has recalled her agents and representatives to Bulgaria, on account of the expulsion of a newspaper correspondent, who claimed to be a Frenchman. This man sent out numerous newspaper stories reflecting on the Government and finances of Bulgaria, and he was forcibly expelled. He then appealed to France, which demanded an apology and the release of the exile. Bulgaria refused to do this, and hence this action of France, which is a step less peculiarly situated the incident would have little chance of success, if followed up, might readily lead to a general war. It is not believed that this will result, but the danger is sufficient to excite all Europe.

The old boundaries of the city of Vienna were abolished at midnight on the 21st inst. The city now includes numerous suburbs. Happening conjointly with the formation of the Zollverein, many necessities of life will be cheapened. Duties will be levied on only nine articles, instead of on fifty-two as formerly. The consolidation is the cause of a great popular rejoicing. There were hundreds of carriages promening the boundaries of the city in honor of the occasion.

At a meeting of the African Society held at Cologne on the 16th inst., Canon Kespes read extracts from diaries of African missionaries, which told of revolting cruelty in connection with slave hunting in the neighborhood of Lake Tanganyika.

A violent earthquake, followed by a general undulating earthquake, occurred on the 18th inst., at Corleone, a town of Sicily, twenty-one miles south of Palermo.

It is stated that in 1890 the number of persons killed in India by snakes was 21,412, while the number of snakes slaughtered was 510,655.

The Brazilian Congress, which was dissolved by Fonseca when he declared himself Dictator, has reassembled in pursuance of the call issued by President Peixotto on Eleventh Month 25th.

In his message to Congress President Peixotto states that the Brazilian people during the events of Eleventh Month 25th, 1889, and the accession of President Peixotto's accession to the Presidency showed their virility and their jealous regard for the national liberties which were threatened by Fonseca. It is now the duty of Congress, the President declares, to deal with the existing commercial crisis by perfecting a reorganization of the banking system.

The Governor of Pernambuco states that a popular uprising occurred in that city on the 19th inst., against the Governor of the province. The officers in command of the soldiers, seeing that no other means would avail, gave the order to fire upon the mob and sharp firing followed. Sixty persons were wounded. The Governor of the province is resigning, when quiet was almost immediately restored.

News was received in Rio de Janeiro, on the 19th, that a revolution had broken out in Espirito Santo, one of the maritime provinces of Brazil, and that the insurgents had succeeded in deposing the Vice Governor. The Brazilian Government, which has its headquarters in Espirito on the north, is also critical. The government of that province has been frequently transferred from one military officer to another, and this has had the effect of alienating the civil officials. Bahia is the province lying between Espirito Santo and Pernambuco.

An army of locusts which crossed the mountains from the Argentine Republic into Chili, is increasing rapidly in volume and has made its way into the province of Valdivia. The Government is adopting measures to kill the pest. Feared are entertained that the locusts will ruin the wheat and other crops.

DIED, on Eleventh Month 16, 1891, at his residence in Philadelphia, EDWARD MARSHALL, aged seventy-seven years. A member and minister of the Monthly Meeting of Friends at Philadelphia, in the Western District. He removed from Sheffield, England, in 1840, and continued in business in New York till 1868, when he retired, and selected Philadelphia as the place of his residence for the winter season. He took much interest in young business men, suggesting to them the propriety of their entering into business speculations, but to watch well over their affairs and regularly pay their debts before incurring others—this he thought, would preserve them from extravagance and perplexity of mind, which often follows an opposite course. His health had been declining for several years, during which he manifested much resignation and fortitude in his illness. He was a devoted man. Lord would forgive his sins, and accept him into his kingdom. Humility as to Christian attainments was very manifest in his character. He kept a close watch over himself, that he should not depart from what was right, either in word or deed. Peace and love were the covering of his mind. He had a sweet hope of salvation in the mercy of God, through Christ Jesus our Lord and Saviour, who died on the Cross that we might live. "Mark the perfect man, and behold his upright life. Of the end that man is peace." "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

EDWARD MARSHALL, born 18th, 1814, was the son of CHARLES and Mary Ann Marshall, of the Monthly Meeting of Friends, Cedar County, Iowa. Her end was peaceful and her friends have abundant evidence for the belief that a mansion was prepared for her in Heaven.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Selections from the Journal of William Evans.

1850.—Second Month. "Our Quarterly Meeting, held on the 4th, was one of the largest I have seen in that house, or anywhere else, and was covered with much solemnity; a qualification being received to search into some of the departures from our testimonies, and to stand firmly for their importance and right support.

"Went down to Woodbury, on the 13th, and attended the Select Quarterly Meeting. Our aged, exemplary and experienced friend Hinchman Haines, was also there, and was engaged in testimony, to the tendering and comfort of my spirit. He recited part of the conversation between our Lord and Philip, when the latter said, 'Show us the Father and it sufficeth us.' Christ replied, 'Have I been so long time with you, and hast thou not known me, Philip?' H. H. went on to speak of his own infirmities, and he concern he often felt, to enquire whether he was in the right path, under which faith was proved when light was withheld; but he believed that though the Lord hid his face from us, and He might not see fit to appear as soon as we desired, yet as we maintained the watch and the struggle, He would manifest himself, to our consolation. This, he said, was his belief; and his frequent desire was to know whether he was in the right path, though he was a poor creature.

"It was a comfort to hear doctrine so applicable to my condition, and the frequent exercise of my mind, from an old disciple, now more than four score years of age. I hoped it was an evidence the Lord had turned my feet to this place, to be thus ministered unto. I was broken down into tears under it, in such manner, as is not very common for me, and I desired to return thanks to the Lord for his mercy.*

"Next day we were at the meeting for busi-

* Truly noteworthy is it, that one so eminently gifted, by nature and by grace, as was William Evans, should be thus contrited, instructed, and helped on his way, by the preaching of a fellow-minister so devoid of human or school learning as Hinchman Haines;—at the same time an experienced, anointed, and well taught scholar in the school of Christ. From another pen, we have the testimony concerning H. H., at a previous Quarterly Meeting at the same place: "Dear old Hinchman labored with great acceptance, and for the time it seemed a little like raising the dead." How true that the gifts and callings of God "mock all ness. Though unworthy, it appeared to be my duty to bend the knee in vocal supplication to the Father of mercies, that He who knew all our weaknesses and infirmities, would look down upon us in tender compassion, and renew that blessed faith which He gave us in the beginning of our heavenly journey; and by his Spirit and power, strengthen us to keep the watch and maintain the holy warfare; so that nothing might be permitted to cause us to slide from the true foundation, and thereby bring any reproach upon the profession we have made before many witnesses. Also that He would lay his hand upon the children, and draw them to take the yoke of his well-beloved Son upon them, and follow Him in the way of his leading. That thus a multitude might be brought to support the doctrines and testimonies which He gave our forefathers to bear before the world; be made instrumental in spreading his kingdom; and ascribe thanksgiving and praise, might, majesty and dominion, to Him, the Lord God and the Lamb; to whom alone it belongs, now and forevermore.

"Having for some time felt a concern to pay a religious visit to the meetings of Friends in New Jersey, I spread the subject before the Monthly Meeting which was held this day; a minute was granted me expressive of its unity, and encouraging me to pursue the prospect as Truth may direct."

"At Burlington Quarterly Meeting, after a season of inward retirement before the Lord, my mind became impressed with the importance of keeping to the original ground of our profession, and of all vital religion; a reliance on the immediate teaching of Christ Jesus in the heart, by his Spirit. A living Gospel ministry has often been a great blessing; but the design of it is to bring people to Him, who alone can open to them their conditions, and give dominion over sin, and prepare for the reception of those gifts which are to be occupied in his church. Many eminent men and women [of this place] have been gathered to their everlasting reward, and the gifts which they occupied here, have been withdrawn from the militant church. Only as we are prepared by the cleansing power of Divine grace, which made them what they were, will the present members of the Society be brought into a situation to be intrusted with spiritual gifts. Under a view of the great falling away from the travail of soul, and the lively zeal which have heretofore characterized faithful servants, and qualified them to stand for the good cause, the Lord enabled me to lay open the state of the church, and to labor with those present, for a restoration of primitive zeal for the support of the great cause, that He raised human foresight, in his mysterious providence and wondrous round of mercy; who chooses whom He will to be messengers of his Gospel and grace. Reminding of the New Testament record, that though Peter and John "were unlearned and ignorant men," they were nevertheless enabled, from being filled with the Holy Ghost or power from on high, to perform a miracle of mercy, in administering to one in need, healing virtue "in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth."

up our Society to uphold, and to spread in the earth. I was humbly thankful for the Divine aid and authority vouchsafed; and that peace and satisfaction clothed my spirit in the work. The glory belongs to the Lord alone, who condescended to our low, unworthy state."

"Third Month 6th. Attended their Weekly Meeting at Rancocas. Soon after sitting down with them, some expressions of the evangelical prophet, which prefigure the great change wrought in the temper, and appetites of the natural man, as he comes under the renovating power of Divine Grace, came before me, together with some of the expressions of James Nayler, when near the close of his life. 'There is a spirit that I feel, which delights to do no evil, nor to revenge any wrong; but delights to endure all things, in hope to enjoy its own in the end. In God alone it can rejoice, though none else regard it. It never rejoiceth but through suffering, for with the world's joys it is murdered. It takes its kingdom by entreaty, and not with contention, and keeps it by lowliness of mind.' The prophet says, 'The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf, and the young lion, and the fating together; and a little child shall lead them.' Again, 'Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low; and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain.' I felt raised up in the Lord's power, to show that the humbling operation of his Spirit, as submitted to, brings down the lofty spirit and the strong passions, and softens the rough nature of man, so that he is brought into the Lamb-like nature; and a little child, regenerated by the same grace, shall lead him. Here there is a harmonious walking together in the heavenly fellowship of the Gospel; and the happiness of families, and of religious society, is truly promoted, where this blessed change is witnessed. Help was mercifully granted through the fresh openings of the Holy Spirit, to preach the Gospel in its authority; to my own relief, and I hope, to the comfort, and the conviction of some, of the truth of what was delivered."

"Went to Evesham Monthly Meeting; in which I was again favored, through the unmerited condescension of the Shepherd of Israel, to such a poor, weak creature, to hold forth the spiritual nature, and inward efficacy of the Gospel. 'The king's daughter is all glorious within; her clothing is of wrought gold.' This is figurative of the robes of righteousness, with which the members of the body and church of Christ are clothed by Him, as He is known to cleanse the heart, and divest us of the filthy garments of sin. There was a word of encouragement to those who had long known this work, and who, through the Lord's mercy, were built upon the Rock, and were as pillars; or if they persevered in well-doing, would be made pillars, that should go no more out of his house. I had cause, gratefully to return thanks for the free supply of things, new and old, which the Master granted me this day."

"Attended Haddonfield Monthly Meeting in silence, during the first sitting. There is need of more religious depth and feeling in many, to qualify them for service in the church. There appear to be few, comparatively, who live in that daily exercise, and walk in the Spirit, which would fit them to judge a right judgment. The present state of the Society, calls for a more fervent travail, on the part of those who are sensible of it, and a more united application to the Great Head of the church, for wisdom and strength to labor for a reformation among us. But the humbling effect of the love of this world on some, seems to render such reformation, in their cases, almost hopeless. I was very low in spirit throughout the day; no doubt needful to renew a fresh sense of the nothingness of man, however he may have been divinely favored."

"The Quarterly Meeting was held at Moorestown. In the first meeting, it opened before me, that to be a watchman on the walls of Zion, had a double meaning. First, to have our loins girded and light burning, watching over ourselves; waiting for the coming of our Lord to show us his will, and to give strength to perform it. Secondly, being thus disciplined in the school of Christ, so as to distinguish his voice from that of the stranger, we are prepared to watch over others, and to receive the command to warn the flock of surrounding dangers. Many things, in reference to a growth in Divine Grace, were handed to the people; and backsliders were persuaded to forsake their evil ways, and turn to the Lord; and old and young were encouraged to keep to the guidance of the Captain of salvation. If obedience is yielded to his blessed will, by the younger members of our Society, we may safely hope that gifts will be dispensed to them; that the waste places will be restored, and the revival of that Divine life and power, experienced amongst us, which has been the strength, the dignity and authority of the living members, and which rendered the Society a bright example of the Christian virtues to other professors."

"Fifth Month 23d. Crossed the river and went to Haddonfield, and attended their Week-day Meeting, which was small. It came before me pretty soon, that there were many up and down, who, though they made little noise in the religious world, are sincere seekers of the truth; sitting often at the feet of Jesus, and craving for themselves heavenly bread and preservation, from Him. I believed that his gracious eye regarded these in their solitary dwellings, and He answered their sincere petitions; and that of this description, there were those present, whose encouragement and strength in the way of their duty, I desired. Although the support of their religious meetings may often be felt to be laborious, and they are sometimes disappointed in receiving the spiritual comfort they desire, yet as they keep faithful, the Lord would send them help from his sanctuary."

SIMPLICITY OF DRESS.—In a copy of the Maryland Journal for 1773, occurs a paragraph on simplicity of dress: "That a plain dress is the best ornament of a beautiful person, I had lately a most convincing proof. The neatness of a daughter of that religious sect called Quakers, in one of the public walks, caught my eye. Never was innocence and elegance more sweetly portrayed. But when I had an opportunity of beholding her face, my astonishment and delight were inexhaustible. I contemplated her person with a pleasure till then unknown, and should have pronounced her the most finished work of heaven, but that it occurred to me that many of my fair countrywomen appeared inferior to her, from not only not being satisfied with what heaven had made them—tortured hair, a superfluity of ribbons, idle gems, &c., &c., were though meant for so many additions, only so many disadvantages to them, by preventing the eye from judging rightly of their charms, or indeed beholding them through the happiest of all mediums—the medium of simplicity."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Preaching.

"I preach the Scriptures," said a modern speaker to the congregation; Paul said he preached Christ and Him crucified, to the Jews, (that very people to whom He had been for centuries promised, and who were looking for his coming) a stumbling-block, to the Greeks, (letter learned and idolatrous) foolishness; but to them that are called, both Jews and Greeks, the power of God and the wisdom of God. Our Redeemer, when in the body, told the people of that day, they searched the Scriptures, for in them they thought they had eternal life, and they were they that testified of Him. But, said He, "Ye will not come unto me, that ye might have life." As then, so it is now.

There is now great searching the Scriptures, and many vain attempts to fathom them in our natural wisdom, guessing or querying one of another, What does this or that mean? One deems it thus, and another thinks its interpretation quite counter. "Shall man by wisdom find out God?" Aye, but not by his own. There is a Spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding. No Scripture is of private interpretation, and no man, whatever his natural abilities or capacity, his human learning or skill, can unfold them aright. God is his own interpreter, and it is only as He is pleased to make plain to the understanding, and enlarge that to receive the meaning of what was written aforetime, that we can derive from it the instruction it is designed to convey. He has the key of David, and it is only as He is pleased to unlock and give his Light to shine within us that we can see aright. It is only as He is pleased to make known unto the children of men by inward, immediate, Divine revelation to the soul, that they can come to any true knowledge of Him.

No man can call God "Father," or Jesus "Lord," but by the Spirit. No man can possess as his own any promise contained in Scripture, but by the same power giving and sealing. He may take the words of holy men and plume himself therewith; he may apply their possessions to himself, but he will only be climbing into the kingdom by some other way than Christ, and thus lay himself open to the charge of thief and robber.

As when the Anointed said "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life," so it is now; people will not come unto Him. "I will not have this man to rule over them," and they will not have his Spirit to reign in their hearts now.

"The cross is heavy in their human measure, The way too narrow for their inward guide, They will not lay their intellectual treasure At the low foot-stool of the Crucified."

"Christ's cross is the way," says Penn, "to Christ's crown." His crown will never be obtained by any other road. Self in all its rani-fications must be crucified and slain. The way is narrow that leadeth to eternal life, too narrow to walk in and carry self along, but it must be walked in if we are followers of Him who "trod the wine-press alone." The pride of intellect must be abased. It cannot translate us from earth to heaven, cannot make us conquerors over one evil passion, one secret sin. Nay, rather will it, if depended upon, hinder the progress Zionward.

The spirits were to be tried. "Everyone that confesseth that Jesus Christ had come in the flesh is of God." How confess? By merely acknowledging a belief in the record of Scripture? Why the very devils believed and trembled, and remained devils still. There must be something deeper and far beyond this, to confess Him availingly. There must be a new birth—must be a knowledge of Him indwelling in our own hearts before we can in unity, savingly testify that He has come in the flesh. We must know Him to be living in our hearts. We must know Him as the Seed of the woman that bruised the head of the serpent dwelling in us, purifying us and cleansing us from all sin, ere we can in unity confess that He has come in the flesh.

Our blessed Redeemer, when in that prepared body begotten by the Holy Spirit and born of the virgin Mary, said, "Whosoever doeth the will of my Father, the same is my mother." "Whosoever;" then each one of the human family who renders implicit obedience to the ordering of the Lord has Christ within him, the very hope of glory. Everyone thus redeemed can testify, "Jesus Christ has come in the flesh." "This is life eternal to know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." Sent into our fleshly hearts to reprove for sin, redeem from evil, purify, purge and entirely cleanse from all sin, and to become the Comforter, sent by the Father in the name (power) of the Son—that abideth always.

This is the gospel Paul preached. "Know ye not that Jesus Christ is in you (except ye be reprobates)." "I in them, thou in me," said our Lord "that all may be perfect in one."

"He that hath an ear to hear, let him hear."

Sentiment on Wheels.—A Pretty and Peculiar Name for a New York Truck.—"My Darling."

These endearing words, in bright golden letters, stood out in bold relief on the dashboard of a huge four horse truck in a Broadway blockade of vehicles. They aroused tender memories. The driver looked as un sentimental as possible in his coarse raiment and with his rough manners, but he was not profane or brutal toward his horses. Patiently he awaited the loosening of the jam, while his neighbors filled the air with curses. Finally, his horses becoming restive, he climbed down from his box and soothed them with gentle words and caresses. Then a bystander asked why he called his truck "My Darling."

"Why," he said, "because it keeps green the memory of my daughter, little Nellie. She's dead now, but before she joined the angels she clasped her hands around my neck and said:—'Papa, I'm going to die, and I want you to promise me one thing, because it will make me so happy. Will you promise?'"

"Yes, I said, 'I'll promise anything; what is it?'"

"Then, fixing her eyes upon mine, she said, 'Oh papa, don't be angry, but promise me you'll never swear any more nor whip your horses hard, and be kind to mamma.'

"That's all there is about it, mister, for I promised my little girl I'd grant her last request, and, sir, I've kept my word."

Then the blockade was lifted, the big truckman resumed his seat, dashed a tear from his eye and was soon lost in the muddy tide of travel.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Eastern Shore of Chesapeake Bay.

Second-day morning, Sixth Month 29th. In order to make arrangements for meetings on Third and Fourth-day evenings, I left Easton on the early morning train to Queen Ann, the station near Hillsboro; and called on our kind friend F. Tatum Barton, to ask his advice as to the best means of accomplishing my purpose. He kindly offered to take me himself—which was very relieving, as I knew neither the country nor the people. We had a drive of about twenty-six miles—under a very hot sun, and succeeded in arranging for a meeting at Wye Mills, on Fourth-day evening, in a Methodist house situated in the most magnificent grove of old white oaks that I ever beheld, although in the yard of the public school-house at that place was a prodigious specimen of the same tree that surpassed any one in the grove. Leaving there we went on to Centreville, obtained a place to meet in and gave notice for a meeting on Third-day evening. We were favored to get back to Queen Ann in time for the afternoon train northward, on which I found my two friends, on their way to Greensborough, to fill the appointment made a few days before.

The meeting was well attended. After a time of silence, one of the friends said that since coming into the house, a passage of Isaiah had presented itself to his mind—"Incline your ears and come unto me, hearken diligently and your soul shall live: and I will make a covenant with you, even the sure mercies of David." The first message of the Apostles of Christ is to repent. The Spirit of Christ visits the hearts of people, and we must yield obedience to its requirements, deny ourselves, and take up the cross. "Strive to enter in at the straight gate." The awful condition of those who continue to rebel against the Light was pointed out.

The service was close, but very lively and clear. Afterwards a supplication was offered for the preservation of those whose hearts had been touched by Divine love.

Before the meeting closed a caution was extended to those young people who had felt at that time the convicting power of grace, not to listen to the suggestion of the Father of lies, that if they gave themselves up into the Lord's hands, they must bid farewell to all their joys and pleasures. If they believed that the Lord was good, they might safely trust themselves to Him, believing that he is his dealings with them would promote their happiness.

At the close the stated minister of the congregation endorsed what had been uttered among them; and desired that the Lord's blessing might go with their visitors. Before leaving the place we made an arrangement with him to distribute among the people a number of religious books, which it was believed right to send there, to confirm, if it might be so, the good impression that had been made.

Sixth Month 30th, Third-day evening. At the meeting held at Centreville this evening, a few words of explanation were given, stating that the ministers present had for some years felt their minds impressed with a religious concern for the inhabitants of the Peninsula, and had believed it a duty required of them to pay a visit in Gospel love, desiring that the Lord might touch the hearts of some by his Divine power, strengthen their desires for good, and make them more willing submissively to follow Him, &c.

The way of salvation was pointed out through Christ and the manifestation of his Spirit; accompanied with an earnest exhortation not to neglect their highest interests.

The desire was also expressed that Christian believers might be careful to live consistently with their profession, so that they might be as a city set upon a hill. The second coming of Christ was declared to be his appearing in the hearts of those who are willing to receive Him.

It was a good meeting, although it did not seem quite so fully favored as that at Greensborough on the preceding evening.

Seventh Month 1st, Fourth-day. We spent the day at Centreville, visited the prison, and called on several of the ministers. Rather accidentally we got into the house of the Episcopalian preacher, with whom we had agreeable conversation on the points of difference between us—Friends dwelling more upon the internal work of Christ, and less upon outward rites and ceremonies—which our host spoke of as husks designed to preserve and protect the inside grain of spiritual truth. He united with our remarks on the importance of not trusting for salvation on the ordinances, or on anything short of the regenerating power of the grace of God; and said he had constantly to teach this doctrine to his people.

A Methodist minister on whom we called, thought there was a defect in their manner of holding meetings, in that they so fully occupied the time with vocal services, that there was not sufficient opportunity given to the people for performing individual worship.

In the evening rode down to Wye Mills. The night was cloudy and dark, with threatening of rain. The company that convened was not very large, but we were told that under more favorable circumstances the house would have been filled. This I can readily suppose would have been the case, for the people in those parts seem well disposed to attend religious meetings. The general drift of the vocal testimonies was similar to that expressed in most of the other meetings we have held in the peninsula—embracing a full acknowledgment of the atoning sacrifice of our Redeemer as the means appointed of God for our justification from past sins; and the necessity in order to salvation that we should submit to the work of his Spirit in the heart, redeeming from the power of sin, and bringing into a state of purity, so as to be fitted for admittance into that heavenly home, where nothing impure or unholy can ever enter.

At the close of the meeting the pastor of the congregation that usually met there arose and endorsed the doctrine that had been preached, commending it to the attention of the people.

Seventh Month 4th, Seventh-day. We were met at Still Pond Station on the Baltimore and Delaware Bay Road, by the carriage of Richard T. Turner, which conveyed us to his hospitable home near Chesapeake Bay, below the entrance of Sassafras River.

In the morning of First-day (Seventh Month 5th) we attended Cecil Meeting, the usual attenders of which number about ten, but on this occasion about thirty convened.

After getting dinner in the neighborhood of our kind friend R. T. Turner conveyed us to Chestertown, where a hall had been convened and notice spread of a meeting at 4 o'clock. About 200 persons gathered, who were earnestly addressed, commencing with the Apostle's declaration—"God hath made that same Jesus whom ye crucified, both Lord and Christ." Jesus suffered for us, was crucified for our sake, and through Him we have forgiveness of our sins. But we must experience the new birth, and through the power and operations of the grace of God—the Spirit of Christ—be purified and made fit for Heaven.

Christ is a perfect Saviour, who redeems us from all iniquity, as well as procures forgiveness for past sins. This is the one true and saving baptism—and in this experience we come to partake of the true communion with Him. Some may say, I believe Christ died for my sins, and therefore I am saved, but it is essential that we should submit to the visitations of grace, and be made practically righteous.

The meeting was a good one, and after it was over several persons spoke kindly to us. The Methodist minister, who was present, invited us to visit his congregation in the evening—but the way did not open to accept his invitation.

The next morning we turned our faces homeward.

In this little journey, the openness with which we were received and the disinterested kindness with which strangers to us exerted themselves to forward our concern, was very noticeable, and it tended to deepen the interest felt in the Peninsula and its inhabitants. J. W.

FROM THE "BRITISH FRIEND."

It is not by disciplinary rules, however good, that we can hope for preservation, but by attention to the light, grace, or Spirit of God which begets in all who give place to it, a holy fear of offending Him. The Grace of God cleanses the mind and makes it very sensitive to Godward, and keeps from those engagements and amusements in which music has often so large a share, which tend to drown the gentle and heavenly voice in its whispers in the soul.

Can we be less careful and not fall into the hurtful snares of the enemy? Nay, have we not as a people been largely caught thereby and drawn aside already, and many even hopelessly so? And have we not in this matter for want of watchfulness and prayer cast evil in the path of the youth among us, and are at ease in the midst thereof? Has not the love of gay apparel grown side by side with the love of music, and the language of simple truth been largely, and with many wholly, cast aside? We plead for liberty: liberty to do as we list. But are we Christ-like? or are we known, as formerly, as the self-denying followers of Him?

To silently wait upon God is now in the eyes of the many a foolish thing and unnecessary. The cultured minds among us, stored with Scripture truth and Biblical research, are able to entertain and instruct, and this is thought to be more profitable. Thus we are hewing out to ourselves cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water. Educational and scholastic knowledge is good as a servant, but is a bad master. When knowledge is held as the gift of God, it begets humility in the possessor, but where pride of possession gets into the mind it leads astray from the fountain of all good and brings deadness over those unto whom they minister, no matter how eloquent and free in expression as preachers they may be.—C. W. Thomson.

TWOULD MAKE A BETTER WORLD.

If men cared less for wealth and fame,
And less for battlefields and glory;
If writ in human hearts a name
Seemed better than in song or story;
If men instead of nursing pride
Would learn to hate it and abhor it;
If more were railed
On love to guide,
The world would be the better for it.

If men dealt less in stocks and lands,
And more in bonds and deeds fraternal;
If love's work had more willing hands;
To link this world with the supernal;
If men stored up love's oil and wine
And on bruised human hearts would pour it;
If "crayons" and "mine"
Would once combine,
The world would be the better for it.

If more would act the play of life,
And fewer spoil it in rehearsal;
If history would sheath its knife
Till good became more universal;
If custom, gray with ages grown,
Had fewer blind men to adore it—
If love instead
In truth alone,
The world would be the better for it.

If men were wise in little things—
Affecting less in all their dealings;
If hearts had fewer rusted strings
To isolate their kindred feelings;
If men, when wrong beats down the right
Would strike together to restore it—
If right made might
In every fight,
The world would be the better for it.

ACROSS THE WHEAT.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

You ask me for the sweetest sound mine ears have ever heard?

A sweeter than the ripples' splash or trilling of a bird,
Than tapping of the rain-drops upon the roof at night,
Than the sighing of the pine trees on yonder mountain height;

And I tell you these are tender, yet never quite so sweet
As the murmur and the cadence of the wind across the wheat.

Have you watched the golden billows in a sunlit sea of grain,
Ere yet the reaper bound the sheaves to fill the creaking wain?

Have you thought how snow and tempest and the bitter wintry cold
Were but the guardian angels, the next year's bread to hold,

A precious thing, unharmed by the turmoil of the sky,
Just waiting, growing, silently, until the storm went by?

O! have you lifted up your heart to Him who loves us all,
And listens, through the angel-songs, if but a sparrow fall,

And then, thus thinking of His hand, what symphony so sweet
As the music in the long refrain, the wind across the wheat?

It hath its dulcet echoes, from many a lullaby,
Where the cradle's babe is hushed beneath the mother's loving eye;

It hath its Heaven-promise, as sure as Heaven's throne,
That He who sent the manna will ever feed his own;
And, though an atom only, 'mid the countless hosts who share
The Maker's never-ceasing watch, the Father's deathless care,

That atom is as dear to Him as my dear child to me—
He cannot lose me from my place, through all eternity;
You wonder when it sings me this, there's nothing half so sweet

Beneath the circling planets, as the wind across the wheat?

EAST BRADFORD, Third Mo. 11th, 1853.

Dear Friend, Wilson Hall.—We received thy acceptable letter of the 20th of last month in due time, and were surprised to find the time had passed with such rapidity; and it has since thine came to hand, passed with equal speed; and time once passed or gone will never return, whether it has been well spent or otherwise. Our fields of labor may be different from each other, yet all responsible to the Giver of all the blessings we receive, both temporal and spiritual, and at the end of time must individually account for what we have received; with this belief it becomes a matter of the greatest importance, that our time and talents should be rightly employed; and the promise is now as it was formerly—they that are faithful in a little shall be made rulers over more—as described in the parable of the talents; when by attention five became ten, &c., there was nothing required of those who received the talents but faithfulness; and the answer annexed shows that faithfulness will bring the answer of "Well done;" and this is just what we all desire may be our portion at the end of time; so that there is no cause for discouragement to those who are willing to occupy the talents they have received of our divine Master and Lord according to his will, and in this way we desire that our young friends may be not only the called but the chosen; yea, the willing and the obedient, and then no doubt they will eat the spiritual good of the land, and draw others to partake with them in the fellowship of the gospel. But unhappily, too many who are members of our Society, seem to soar above the witness of truth, in their appearance, at least, and some in their conduct, too, and thereby hinder or greatly retard their spiritual growth in grace, and cause sorrow to their religiously concerned friends, who are very desirous of their restoration; those foolish people who have associated with the rappers or knockers, the cause of their being thus entangled with that folly, we have no doubt was want of attention and obedience to the grace of God; and a trusting to their fallen corrupt wisdom, which the apostle describes as earthly, sensual and devilish. For Satan was he from whom our first parents got that wisdom; which brought them under condemnation. If we were asked what our people should do in the present unsettled state of society, we would say build upon the Rock, which our Saviour told Peter He would build his church upon, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it; and it seems to us truly comforting that there is such a foundation which may be built upon; which cannot be overthrown by the winds of seduction, nor the mighty waves of temptation. If all the members of our Society would rally to this safe foundation we might hope to see harmony and unity restored, and at least some of the backsliders returning; and the altars of Baal should be broken down and the truth raised into dominion. Well, if the truth is in dominion in us, we are doing our part in repairing the breaches in the walls of our Zion.

* * * Our stay here, both old and young, is marked with great uncertainty; we should therefore endeavor to be always in readiness, that we may not be alarmed, however suddenly the messenger of death may come; but through faith be enabled to say as the apostle did, when he was about to be made a martyr by his testimony to the truth: "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." All who love his spiritual appearing in them are included.

Our family in general, excepting —, in usual health, which we esteem a great blessing; for without health we cannot well enjoy the good things of this life, which our country is abundantly blessed with. And may we render unto Him that which is his due, whose goodness is wonderfully displayed to the children of men. And while we are enjoying his outward or temporal comforts, life, liberty and happiness, let us think of our ungrateful country, who withholds from thousands the precious liberty and happiness we so much boast of. Will a day come by and by, when our beloved country may have to partake of the fruits of her own doings, and she that refuses to be entreated by suffering humanity, may receive a recompense for her cruel oppression? Do we not see Popery raising her persecuting head, by imprisoning for speaking against that monster popery? And if other countries fall into this wicked system, may not our own ungrateful country tremble with fear; for she does neither do justly, nor love mercy, nor walk humbly with God; and if the cup of her iniquity should shortly be filled up, would it be marvellous? for it is righteousness that exalteth a nation; but sin is a shame or reproach to any people. Could we with faith ask a blessing upon such a system of oppression as North America exhibits? but it seems there is not righteousness enough in the people to stop this torrent of wickedness, which as it goes on increases its force; so that the more the poor oppressed children of Africa complain, the more severe the laws are made to afflict them; so that they seem cut off from help from man; but all true bearded Christians lament because violence and oppression prevail.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Teacher and His Teaching Within.

It is affecting to me to observe the situation of some of our youth as regards their training in best things. It seems enough with some parents and guardians of the young, to direct their moral conduct, and give them now and then some precepts as regards religious things; while that reference to it as a work in the heart, and something which is to be realized in their own experience, apart from outward instruction primarily either from books or the teachings of men, is almost lost sight of or totally disregarded; and these objects of our care are left to grow up in darkness as respects the most important business of their lives, and that to which their first attention should be given. Now, I by no means wish to convey the impression, that I think a great deal is to be done by way of instruction; but rather that their minds should be directed to a something within themselves that will teach them, if they do not turn away from it; and that it is this teaching they are particularly to regard. But if the spirit of the parent is not influenced by it, him or her self, they are not likely to make much impression upon the mind of the child; because mere words will not go very far, however good they may be in themselves; while a hint, a caution, or a warning proceeding from a really concerned and exercised spirit, will be like leaven transmuting its properties into the material it works upon, and bringing it into the same character. Here is the first necessary thing in this great work; that instructors of the young season with the spice of religious example, the truths they would inculcate.

FROM "WEST CHESTER LOCAL NEWS."

A Brief Inquiry Into the Beginnings of Gambling.

A correspondent of the New York World had an interview with Chauncey Depew a few days ago for the purpose of obtaining his views upon the business prospects of the country. That veteran railroad manager and man of affairs, thought, upon the whole, that the trade outlook was bright, and moreover, that the people were averaging up to a higher standard of morals than before. Nevertheless, he made one emphatic and important exception to this flattering estimate. There was one vice, he declared, that was increasing, and that one contaminated the whole. "This vice," he affirmed, "is growing with tremendous rapidity all over the earth, and especially among civilized nations. This vice is gambling." Asked as to his definition of that word, he continued:

I mean by gambling the betting on results which no knowledge nor reason can force. We now bet on everything. We put up our money on stocks, on food products, and upon everything that enters into our markets. We create artificial conditions and bet upon them. We do the same with real estate, and we now bet in a different way upon our amusements. Our base ball system has become a lottery, and betting grows in these respects, and on races, and at cards all over the world. The telegraph enables us to carry the betting stands of the Jerome Park track to San Francisco, and there is a crowd around the blackboards in every city, betting on the races. In clubs and private houses, more in the Old World than here, games of chance of every kind, with wagers upon results, are becoming as common as the daily dinner; and you will find a Monte Carlo going privately on at every one of the great watering-places of Europe."

It will be observed that Chauncey Depew is very far from limiting his arraignment of the great and spreading evil to the betting tables and the roulette boards of the Monte Carlo, the fashionable watering-places, and the club rooms. He indicates those many popular schemes, which, we may no longer doubt, mark the beginnings of the vice with many. Indeed, prize "guessing games," whether it be guessing the number of shellbarks on the table of a church fair, or guessing the number of grains on an ear of corn at a supper given by a secret society lodge, are of the very essence of gambling. They were authoritatively so declared to be, a little more than a year ago, in the city of Philadelphia, when the writer of this, having laid the matter before an able attorney, Geo. S. Graham, received in writing the following reply:

"Your communication of even date received. Section 52 of the criminal code provides that 'all lotteries, whether public or private, for moneys, goods, wares or merchandise, chattels, lands, tenements, hereditaments, or other matters or things whatsoever, are hereby declared to be common nuisances.' Do the facts stated by you come within this prohibition? Judge Paxson said, in Commonwealth vs. Manderfield, that 'the term lottery must be understood to be used in 'the act in its general and known signification.' Webster defines it to be 'a scheme for the distribution of prizes by chance or the distribution thereof. Johnson speaks of a lottery as 'a distribution of prizes by chance.' * * The drawing of prizes by chance is the very life and soul of a lottery.

"Also, in Commonwealth vs. Flint, Peaslee, the same Judge said: 'Briefly stated, it may be said to be the distribution of prizes by chance. Whatever amounts to this, no matter how ingeniously the object of it may be concealed, is a lottery.' In this case the sale of candy which contained prizes in some of the packages was held to be a lottery. You can thus see how broad this definition is, and how comprehensive. The facts which you state, in my opinion, come within this definition. You are at liberty to use this opinion as you please."

Unless the law-abiding and religiously-concerned people of the borough of West Chester are in favor of making gambling popular and general in the community, unless they are desirous of inviting (after the "fun" is all over) its legitimate outgrowth of financial corruption and disaster, with no end of trouble in families, churches, secular and religious associations, business houses and monied corporations, they will exert themselves to discourage and condemn all methods and enterprises whereby the element of chance may be invoked to favor the participants with a large return upon a small investment. For a striking illustration, the account in last week's papers of the trusted clerk M C—and his chum, with its humiliating record of duplicity, forgery, embezzlement, gross immorality, flight and arrest, ought to open the eyes of a good many to the fact that gambling, by whatever term it may be labelled, is never a safe recreation, and that it is, moreover, a matter of more than individual concern. Society at large and the State have an interest in the account. The widespread prevalence of the evil should bid us take heed lest we unduly withhold the expression of our solicitude in regard to it.

JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

RÖUNCEY, Eleventh Mo. 3rd, 1891.

CONVERSATION.—How inconceivably would the tone of conversation be improved, if it offered no exceptions to the example of Bishop Beveridge: "I resolve never to speak of a man's virtues to his face, nor of his faults behind his back." A golden rule! the observation of which would at once banish flattery and defamation from the earth. Conversation stock being a joint and common property, every one should take a share in it; and yet there may be societies in which silence will be our best contribution. When Isocrates, dining with the King of Cyprus, was asked why he did not mix in the discourse of the company, he replied, "What is reasonable I do not know, and what I know is not reasonable."—The Tin Trumpet.

PAULINUS, bishop of Nola, in the fifth century, is said to have expended his immense estate in redeeming from captivity his countrymen who had been enslaved by the Goths when they overran the empire. After his resources had been exhausted, a poor widow came to him with the sad story that her only son, upon whom she depended in her old age, had been carried captive to Africa. Paulinus at once left his home, and having found the young man, entered into an agreement with his master, that he would take his place and become a slave, in order to secure the return of the son to his mother. He undertook to meet the obligations of the captive, and actually obeyed and suffered for him and in his room, for the purpose of redeeming him from servitude.

FROM "THE EPISCOPAL RECORDER."

Tendency and Result

Like two ships that meet and salute each other on the great, wide ocean, interchange greetings and then pass on their diverging paths, each to pursue its own commission, we sometimes encounter in our summer wanderings, companions for a day who leave an impression on our lives long after.

Of such was a young man of dignified bearing who was presented to our group at a summer resort, and added much to the interest of the few days spent in his neighborhood by his fine intellectual conversation, pervaded by indications of a warm, true heart. On one occasion he led to give a touching sketch of his younger brother to a sympathizing friend.

He was a boy of brilliant promise, a favorite at home and away from it, chosen to take a prominent part in all the Sunday school entertainments of his church, and always acquitting himself to admiration in the acting and recitals on such occasions. Soon the direction of what was placed in his hands, and he made them pre-eminently a success. The strong impulses had been given. Church rehearsals and exhibitions led to a fascinated study of the best methods of the stage at the theatre, and when he reached his majority his taste and decision were formed for an actor's life. His admirable education and equipment for large usefulness, with talents that might have secured him a footing in the foremost rank, were all turned into the channel of simulation for the entertainment of crowds, to the deep sorrow of those who loved him best.

The sure tendency and the result may warn some mothers to arrest a like course in their children before it shall be too late.

The following testimony to the effects of the stage, by some of the best specimens of those who know it by experience, is earnestly submitted:

The London Quarterly Review, in a critique on "Jenny Lind's Life," devotes some space to the wider question of the moral atmosphere of the stage. The reviewer says:

Jenny Lind's generous hope and aim was "to elevate the whole tone and character of her profession." And if any one person could attain that aim, surely it was this high-souled and royally-gifted being. But the enfranchisement of the operatic stage from its baseness is unaccomplished yet; not even Jenny Lind sufficed for such a deliverance.

"Macready's Reminiscences" testifies as strongly to the writer's aversion for his own profession, and the almost morbid dread he felt lest any of his own children should be drawn to embrace it—a dread which made him deprecate for them such shadows of acting as charades and tableaux vivants. This curious loathing for an occupation that brought both fame and profit, and social success, is even more vividly expressed in Fanny Kemble's "Record of a Girlhood," where that brilliant popular favorite, whose dramatic genius was a direct heritage from player parents of stainless character, and who herself was sedulously guarded from the common perils of actress-life, bears, notwithstanding, her strong testimony against the calling in which she and her family had earned distinction and esteem.

CHURCH-GOING is commendable when it is commendable, and so is staying away from church. After striving for years to secure the legal abolition of the "suttee," or custom of widow-burning, in India, William Carey, the pioneer in modern missions to the heathen, was rejoiced by the knowledge that his desire was finally compassed.

The proclamation of the British government, declaring the "suttee" to be punishable as murder, reached the veteran missionary just as he was going out to preach the gospel on a Sunday. "If I delay an hour to translate and publish this," he said, "many a widow's life may be sacrificed;" so he sent some one else to do the preaching for that day, while he stayed at home and translated the proclamation into Bengalee, having it finished before sunset. Neither churchoing nor home-staying is in itself meritorious. It is only as the one or the other is a duty and a privilege that it should receive attention rejoicingly.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Destruction of Mosquitoes.—Among the suggestions offered to check the increase of mosquitoes, one is, to pour a little coal oil on the pools in which they breed. The oil diffuses itself over the surface of the water, and when the larvae of the mosquito come to the surface to breathe, it clogs the apertures of their breathing tubes, and so destroys them. Theoretically this process may be effective; but any one who has visited the wide expanse of marsh in southern New Jersey, or the seaboard States further south, will need no argument to convince him that it is practically worthless.

The Japanese Lacquer Tree.—About sixteen years ago, some specimens of this tree (Rhus vernicifera) were brought from Japan and planted at Frankfort, in Germany. They have lived and grown well. If the juice from them makes as effective a varnish as that produced in their native country, this planting may be the means of introducing a new industry into Europe.

Botanical Progress.—Prof. J. M. Coulter has been studying during the past summer the species of Cactus found on the borders of the United States and Mexico, under the direction of the Department of Agriculture at Washington. The Olive Tree has been introduced into Australia, and thrives well in that country.

Malta Honey.—The honey collected by the bees of Malta is famous for its purity and delicious flavor. This is said to be due to the extensive crops of clover annually raised in the island. It has been estimated that to collect one pound of honey from clover, 62,000 heads of clover must be despoiled of their nectar, and 3,750,000 visits must be made by the bees.

The Albatross.—In the spring or early summer the Albatross leaves its young and goes to sea, and does not return to the breeding-grounds till the next Tenth Month. During their absence the young birds remain at home. Immediately after their return, the old pair go to their nest, and turn out the young and prepare the nest for another brood.

Eagles Breeding.—Although eagles are now more than rare in Britain, there was a time when they bred among the crags of Cumbria. Gray and Sir Humphrey Davy watched the eagles in their eyries, and the former tells how he saw them robbed of their young. To say nothing of the carnage made on hares, grouse, and water-fowl, these birds during the breeding season destroyed a lamb daily. It is no wonder that the farmers, shepherds, and dalefolk were careful to plunder the eyries, though this was not done without very considerable risk. In one case a man was lowered down the rocks a distance of fifty fathoms, and during the descent he had to protect himself against the attacks of the parent birds. Year by year the eggs or egglings were taken, and as their presence was injurious to the interests of the farmers, the latter were willing to pay for their extermination. If the nest contained young birds, these were to be the cliff-climbers' remuneration; but if eggs, every neighboring farmer paid for each egg five shillings. The nests were formed of the branches of trees, and lined with coarse grass and bents that grew on the neighboring rocks. On the eagles being so frequently robbed of their young, they became unsettled and removed from crag to crag. On one mighty escarpment more inaccessible than the rest they nested for fourteen consecutive years. These eagles and their progenitors had probably bred in the near vicinity for centuries, and the conservatism of birds—especially birds of prey—is quite remarkable. Of this two instances may be given. In Cotacea Wolleyana it is recorded that a peregrine falcon's nest on a hill called Arasaxa, in Finland, is mentioned by the French astronomer Maupertuis as having been observed by him in 1736. In 1799 it was again rediscovered by Skjöldebrand and Acerti. Wolley himself found it tenanted in 1853, and by examining the remains of a young bird lying near the nest, proved that it belonged to this species. It is probable, therefore, that this particular eyrie had been used by the same species of falcon for one hundred and seventeen years.—Poachers and Poaching.

Bewildering Effect of a Snow Storm.—J. C. Atkinson, in describing his residence in a Yorkshire parish, relates his experience in returning home from a funeral during a severe snow storm. "The wind and drift were directly in my teeth. I could not see ten yards ahead of me distinctly, but it was only a small field of half a dozen acres I had to cross diagonally to get into the road. But before I had got half the distance, as I reckoned, I saw the boughs of a tree on my left hand which I recognized as growing in the left-hand fence of the field, whereas my road lay along the right-hand fence; and at the same moment a voice hailed me with the words, 'You've gotten wrong, Mr. Atkinson.' I laughed over my error and tried again, making for the corner of the field at the end of the right-hand fence. But instead of reaching it, I was brought up by the fence running transversely from that on the left to that on the right—which I followed to the place where I would be. I had thus gone astray twice within an area of less than 500 yards square."

Price of Eggs.—The money value of a complete set of clutches of eggs of British birds is about £200, although more than double this sum would be given for eggs taken within the British Islands. Of course a great number of birds do not breed and never have bred here; for whilst the number of species comprising the home-list is three hundred and sixty-seven, only two hundred breed within our shores.

Not a few of the eggs of British birds are worth more than their weight in gold, whilst those of a certain species which are supposed to have become extinct bring quite fabulous prices. A well-marked pair of golden-eagle's eggs have been known to fetch £25. The market value of an egg of the swallow-tailed kite is three guineas, of Pallas's sand-grouse thirty shillings, while ten times that amount was recently offered for an egg of this Asiatic species taken in Britain. On the other hand the eggs of certain of the social breeding birds are so common in their season as to be systematically collected for domestic purposes. And this in face of the fact that many of them are remarkable alike for size, shape, and beauty of coloring. This applies particularly to the guillemot, whose eggs are often remarkably handsome. As a rule the color of these is bluish-green, heavily blotched and streaked with brown or black, and the form that of an elongated handsome pear. The guillemot is one of our commonest cliff birds, and is found in greatest abundance at Flamborough Head. The eggs are systematically gathered by men who are let down the rocks in ropes. They traverse the narrowest ledges, placing the eggs which they gather daily in baskets fastened round their shoulders. The guillemot makes no nest, lays but one egg, and incubation lasts about a month. The birds sit upright, and when suddenly alarmed, as by the firing of a gun, the eggs fall in showers into the sea. Most of those collected at Flamborough are sent to Leeds, where the albumen is used in the preparation of patent leather, whilst the eggs taken on Lundy are used at Bristol in the manufacture of sugar.—Poachers and Poaching.

Walking-Stick Insects.—These belong to the same division of insects as the Grasshoppers. They have a marvellous external resemblance to certain portions of the vegetable kingdom. Some assuming the forms of a broken branch and twigs with such extraordinary fidelity that the most practiced eye is often deceived. Louisa A. Meredith, in her account of the natural productions of Tasmania, gives a lively account of a species sometimes, although rarely, found on that island. She says:

"Mother! Lina! where are you? Do come out a minute; I've something wonderful to show you," cried Guy, hurrying in from the garden one Sunday afternoon. "Oh! here you are. Come down this walk, where we planted the native shrubs. Now you see that bush of red Epacris? Very well; my wonderful discovery is there. Do you see it?"

"Mrs. Merton and Lina looked attentively in the direction to which Guy pointed.

"I cannot see anything but the few remaining flowers, and a great many dead-looking sticks," said Lina.

"Mrs. Merton gazed still more searchingly. 'Nor do I. Your wonder must have vanished, Guy.'"

"The boy laughed merrily. 'Oh, no, mother; he's there still. I see him plainly enough, and so ought you, for he's seven or eight inches long.'"

"What nonsense!" cried Lina. "You're making fun of us."

"Stay," said her mother, restraining her from touching the bush. "Look there—I saw something move—a long, brown-jointed leg—and there's another, and another—six of them—and having found the legs we can now trace the body they belong to—long, brown and thin—so exactly like one of the dead Epacris sticks, it is not strange we did not readily discover it."—Tasmanian Friends and Foes.

ESTATE.—Nothing, however, can prevent my succeeding to a small estate which I have lately been inspecting. It certainly possesses many advantages, being title-free, and the land-tax redeemed. In this snug retreat, which is perfectly sequestered, you are surrounded with wood, and yet close to a populous neighborhood, to the parish church, and the high-road. Its proprietor enjoys several privileges and advantages: he pays no taxes, is exempt from serving in the militia, or sitting upon juries, his privacy is undisturbed by the impudent intrusion of neighbors, he has no cares by day, and he is ture of a sound sleep at night. When a new occupant comes to take possession he usually arrives in a coach and four, with numerous attendants, and he is not only received with bell-ringing, but the clergyman and a portion of the parishioners go out to meet him, and escort him home with much ceremony. The house, though it can hardly be called anything better than a mere country box, has so many recommendations, that there is no instance of an occupant quitting it, after he has once given it a fair trial.

Readers! whether gentle or simple, you need not envy me my expectations. A similar landed estate is entailed upon every one of you, and upon your children's children. If you want a description of it, refer to Blair's poem of "The Grave."

One of the Roman emperors wept that nothing could prevent the master of the wide world from being finally imprisoned in an urn. I would counsel some of our landed proprietors—

—Large-acred men,
Lords of fat Evesham, and of Lincoln fen—who, in the pride of their possessions, "bestride the narrow earth like a Colossus," to cast their eyes downwards, if looking upwards will not teach them humility, and to reflect that their huge estates must inevitably shrink into six feet by two!—The Tin Trumpet.

Items.

Horse-Racing.—The attention of the good citizens of Camden County, New Jersey, has been strongly turned to the demoralization and other evils attendant upon the practice of horse-racing, by the disgraceful scenes that have been exhibited from time to time at Gloucester in that county, where horse races have been practiced, and attended with gambling, intoxication and other things inconsistent with the public virtue and welfare. This race-course has been closed for the present, but those interested in the maintenance of such establishments propose obtaining from the Legislature, which convenes in the early part of the First Month, 1892, an act repealing those laws which make horse-racing illegal. And they will probably be able to accomplish their purpose, unless a strong public feeling can be awakened, adverse to this step.

The Meeting for Sufferings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, some months ago had its attention called to the general subject; and, as a result of the exercise felt, has prepared a short tract on the subject, in the form of an address to our fellow-citizens. A large edition has been printed, and efforts will be made to give it a wide circulation. This is especially desirable in New Jersey, in view of the proposed legislation in that State. Any of our readers who will interest themselves in the circulation, may obtain copies gratuitously, by addressing James Smedley, at the Book Store, No. 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

In connection with this subject, we notice that the City Council of Chicago has passed an ordinance, prohibiting all betting, wagering, or other forms of gambling in or about any ground where horse-racing is practiced. The horse-racing part of the community is so thoroughly infected with this disease, that we believe the mere legal prohibition of betting will not be a sufficient remedy. It would have been a far more effectual step, to have prohibited the racing itself.

G. W. Curtis on Funerals.—George William Curtis deserves the thanks of the American people for protesting against the ostentation which has become so marked a feature of funerals in this country. He justly says: "The Christian thought in that hour should instinctively dwell upon the soul, not upon the body, and the simplest and most unostentatious rite of burial would seem to be the most truly Christian." Let rich Christians set an example of moderation, for the poor will make equally useless and injurious sacrifices "so long as ostentation is the custom."—Selected.

Roman Catholic Missions.—The wife of Fred. Moir, in her book, "A lady's letters from Central Africa," gives an account of the plans of working of the Roman Catholic missionaries. There are three stations on Lake Tanganyika, with five fathers at each station. The missionaries come for life. They buy several hundred small boys and girls from three to five years old. They are taught to work, and are brought up as Roman Catholics. When old enough, a boy and girl are married and established in a neighboring village. They are Roman Catholics, knowing no other religion. The mission is practically self-supporting, the only heavy expense being for the purchase of children. One station has 1,000 church-goers. Two Protestant missionaries said: "Don't be surprised if sometime you find the whole shores of Lake Tanganyika Roman Catholic."

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 2, 1892.

The Editor has felt a desire to bear a short testimony to the character of his valued and beloved friend, Francis T. King, of Baltimore, who died after a short attack of the prevailing influenza, on the 17th of Twelfth Month, 1891. And he is the more disposed to do so, because there seems to him something very instructive in the history of his life experiences.

F. T. King was born in Baltimore in 1819, and after the completion of his school education and business training in a commercial house, he entered into business about the time he came of age and continued (with some variations of employment) for about sixteen years. He retired from mercantile pursuits when comparatively a young man, and devoted his time to the service of the Society of Friends, and to the management of various public and charitable institutions. A few weeks ago he told the writer, that at one time he was trustee, or otherwise connected with the management of twenty-eight such establishments, involving in the aggregate a capital of many million dollars.

Early in life he was preciously visited with the extensions of Divine grace, and he was favored through submission to the teachings of the Spirit, to come to the holy resolution to spend his life in the service of his Divine Master, as He might show him the way. While showing in his outward business that clearness of judgment, energy and industry which are necessary to success, he was careful to manifest his allegiance to his Lord and lawgiver. At one time he had on hand a large lot of coarse, heavy goods, which, as summer was coming on, when they would be out of season, he boxed up and stored in the cellar to keep them from moths. Soon after a customer came in and gave him an order for a large amount of this material. Before leaving the store, he remarked that he had a contract for supplying uniforms to the troops that were being equipped in Baltimore for the Mexican war; and that those goods would be just what he wanted. Francis at once replied, that he could not have them. And in response to the remonstrances of his disappointed customer, told him that all war was wrong, and this Mexican war was a peculiarly wicked and unjustifiable one, and he could not in any measure be implicated in it.

Another incident, which F. T. King related in the course of an open conversation on his life experiences, illustrates the comfort to be derived from habitual communion with God. In a time of mercantile depression, his firm had a note of $450 coming due, and it seemed impossible to procure the money to meet it. The day before it was to be paid, he went to dinner, feeling much concerned on this account. On his return to the store, with his mind lifted up to the Lord in silent appeal, a sudden feeling of relief came over him. He entered the store, and found a business friend sitting with his partner by the side of the stove, who said to him, his partner had been telling him a story about financial trouble, and he wanted to know what Francis had to say about it. Francis replied that he had a note of $450 to pay the next day, and did not know where the money was to come from; but from the feeling that had come over him, as he was returning from dinner, he had no doubt that it would be provided. The man opened his pocket-book, took out a check for $450 and handed it to Francis, saying that a Tennessee correspondent had sent it to the firm, through his care!

We have no doubt that the dedication of heart to the Lord's cause, and the habitual communion with Him, in which he lived, were important elements in the success which attended Francis T. King's efforts in connection with the various important concerns which claimed his attention; and we believe also, that they tended to keep him in an humble state of mind, which ascribed all the glory to his heavenly Leader, without whose aid he could never have accomplished all that he was instrumental in effecting.

He was sick about five days, and during the latter part of the time, the brain was affected by the disease—so that if a preparation for heaven had not previously been accomplished, there would seem to have been but little opportunity to make up for lost time. But his friends have the consolation of believing that the grace of God which bringeth salvation, and which appeared to him in early life, and followed him all through his course, did not desert him, when heart and flesh failed.

The series of articles under the heading, "The Eastern Shore of Chesapeake Bay" is completed in the present number of "THE FRIEND." With its completion ceases the gratuitous distribution of the paper, which has been sent to many persons residing in the Peninsula, who were met with in the course of the visit alluded to in these articles. If any of those who have been its recipients desire the continued visits of our journal, they can make application to the publishing agent, John S. Stokes, No. 116 N. Fourth St., Philadelphia.

A friend sends us information that there are three inaccuracies in the names of persons mentioned in a recent number, and says that Edward Powell should read Edward A. Powell; J. Wilson Tyler should be Wilson M. Tyler; and Robert W. Dixon should be Robert B. Dixon.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Le Ghalt, our Belgian Minister, has received a cablegram announcing that the Brussels Anti-Slave Trade, Rum and Fire-arms Convention was ratified by the French Senate on the 27th ult. The Chamber of Deputies took similar action on the 24th. Eighteen Powers were represented in the Brussels conference, and the adhesion of all of them is requisite to render this acte generale effective. France makes the seventeenth nation that has ratified the Convention, leaving only the United States to determine whether it shall become operative. The latest date for the exchange of ratifications is Second Month 2, 1892, and the exchange must be made at Brussels.

The question will therefore be brought again before the United States Senate this month.

The Chief of the Bureau of Statistics has prepared a report, showing that the total value of imports into the United States during the twelve months ending Eleventh Month 30th was $949,022,185, as compared with $855,952,136 during the preceding year.

On Twelfth Month 23d ult., a delegation of six Cherokees, including one in his clothing with the necessary seed and tools. They also asked that their rations be increased, as they strongly protested against parting with any more of their land.

A dispatch from Tahlequah, Indian Territory, says that C. J. Harris has been elected Principal Chief of the Cherokee Nation to succeed J. B. Hayes, who died recently. Harris has been prominent in Cherokee politics for the past twelve years, having served in the Senate and as a delegate to Washington, and was only recently elected Treasurer of the Cherokee Nation. Stephen Trehe was elected Second Chief.

The bill introduced in the Senate providing the lower House of the South Carolina Legislature by sixteen majority, failed in the Senate, which did not meet the issue squarely, but killed the bill by an evasive political trick, the Anti-Prohibition Senators purposely exhausting the time limit for the reading of bills before adjournment by the placing of the Prohibition bill beyond reach at the present session. The result will be to increase and intensify the Prohibition sentiment of South Carolina.

John B. Richardson, one of the greatest cotton planters in the South, died on the 23d ult., in Chattanooga, Georgia, where he was supplying the market with an excessive amount of cotton.

Two thousand people at Ottumwa, Iowa, are said to be suffering from the gripple. The disease is said to have seriously interfered with the freight business of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad, at least 100,000 tons of employments being laid off because of it. There are estimated to be 2,000 cases of the gripple at Dubuque, Iowa.

A dispatch from Hamilton, Ohio, says that fully three-fourths of the population of that place are afflicted with the gripple, and that more than half of the industrial establishments are shut down in consequence.

A hitherto unknown stone has been found in the mining district of Candelaria, in Nevada. It is of a dark green color, and takes on a very high polish, and so is classed by the State geologist as "sarcinite." Several beautiful ornaments have been produced from it, but so far it has not been found in any considerable quantity.

Another rich find of aluminum is reported. The deposit is said to be in the San Mateo Mountains, and the samples analyzed 25 per cent. of aluminum.

The mortality here reported in this city last week was 718; being 93 more than in the corresponding week, and exactly twice as many as occurred the week before last week last year. Of the whole number, 336 were males and 382 females; 171 died of pneumonia; 66 of consumption; 61 of influenza; 43 of diphtheria; 33 of 22 of diseases of the heart; 26 of old age; 12 of convulsions; 10 of Bright's disease; 10 of cancer; 15 of croup; 15 of scarlet fever; 16 of inflammation of the brain; 14 of paralysis; 12 of apoplexy; 12 of congestion of the lungs; 11 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels and 10 of inanition.

Dec. 4.—U. S. Extended 25, 100 a 101; 4's, rec., 114 1/2; 117 1/2; coupon, 117 1/2; 118 1/2; currency 65, 100 a 118.

COTTON moved slowly, but prices were unchanged. Sales on a basis of 8 1/2c per pound for middling uplands.

WHEAT.—Western and Pennsylvania super, $5.50 a $5.75; do, do, extra, $5.35 a $4.10; do, 2 winter family, $4.25 a $4.50; Pennsylvania, do, do, winter, $4.50 a $4.75; Western winter, clear, $4.50 a $4.75; do, do, straight, $4.75 a $4.90; winter patent, new, $4.90 a $5.25; Minnesota, clear, $4.50 a $4.85; do, do, do, favorite large, $5.10 a $5.50. Rye flour sold in small way, at $5.00 a $5.05 per barrel, for choice Pennsylvania. Buckwheat flour was dull, at $2.00 a $2.15 per 100 pounds.

DEEF CATTLE.—Extra, none here; good, 51 cts.; medium, 44 1/2 cts.; fair, 44 1/2 cts.; common, 44 cts.; culls, 32 1/2 cts.; fat cows, 2 1/2 cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5 1/2 a 6 cts.; good, 4 1/2 a 5 cts.; medium, 4 1/2 a 5 cts.; and common, 3 1/2 a 4 1/2 cts.; culls, 1 1/2 a 2 cts. Lambs, 4 1/2 a 6 1/2 cts.

HOGS.—5 1/2 a 5 3/4 cts. for good Western, and 5 a 5 1/2 cts. for other grades.

FOREIGN.—Last week the city of London was enveloped in a dense fog, with never an intermission night or day. The number of deaths traceable to the fog, some of them from accidents, have been numerous.

Five hundred children under ten years of age have been taken into custody in twelve months in London as drunk and incapable.

The position of Lord Hartington as the leader of the Liberals will remain unaltered on his going into the House of Lords. Joseph Chamberlain will lead in the House.

The returns of the election for a member of Parliament in Waterford, show that John E. Edmondson (Parrellite) received 1,725 votes, and Michael Davitt (McCallite) 1,223 votes, a majority of 496 votes for the Parrellite candidate.

On the 28th ult., Ribot, Minister of Foreign Affairs in France, made to the Chamber of Deputies a statement of the relations between France and Bulgaria. The Minister gave no new details of the Chadoine incident, but said that the matter was now in the hands of the courts, and demanded of Bulgaria an explanation of her action in expelling the French journalist from the country.

Telegrams from Madagascar received in Paris, state that the relations between the French Government and the Malagasy Government, growing out of the question as to which shall grant exequators to foreign representatives in Madagascar, have, after a long interperiod of tension, been ruptured altogether. No one can foretell what the outcome of the dispute will be, both powers seemingly being determined not to make any concessions that would tend to bridge over the trouble, and the result is that commerce of the country is in a state of anarchy.

The London Telegraph's correspondent at St. Petersburg says that there has been an enormous falling off in the Government revenues from the famine-stricken provinces.

A dispatch from London says: Contradictory stories are afloat here regarding the Grand Duke Sergius, brother of the Czar, who last spring was appointed Governor of Moscow. At the beginning of the present month it was said that the Grand Duke was making himself very unpopular by his efforts to suppress fraudulent practices growing out of the corruption for which he is so notorious.

The advice received on the 28th ult. is that the Czar suspects his brother of "nursing ambitious designs," though the nature of these designs in a country where all social and political honors emanate from the Czar is not stated. It is added that the Czar has been so long and so array of evidence presented to him against the Grand Duke that it hinders him to send him into exile.

The authorities are indignant that Russian society should prove so generously responsive to the appeal of Count Tolstoi, to whom tens of thousands of roubles were being sent every week from all quarters of Russia, while the Czar's Interior was obliged to use the very strong pressure to obtain less than a half million roubles in eight weeks. The newspapers are not permitted to reprint the letter of Countess Tolstoi asking for contributions.

The St. Petersburg correspondent of the London Telegraph says, that a report has been received there on the state of the Samara Prison, and extracts from it, published in the journal called Realist, have created a most shocking state of affairs. All the space available in the prison, including the baths, corridors and workshops, is occupied by prisoners, who are huddled together in rags in a barrel. The manner in which the rooms are arranged is simply incredible. The prison, which can barely accommodate 240 inmates, actually contains 1,000. The atmosphere is unbreathable, and when any one of the doors is opened thick clouds of pestilential vapor roll out, scaring the inmates into flight. The supply of clothes for the prisoners is lamentably insufficient. Whole groups of convicts are never examined by the doctor, who, during the past month, has not been once to the prison.

The Governor of Durango has telegraphed to the City of Mexico that the people in his State are "actually dying of starvation." Corn is being sold at cost to the poor, and money is being loaned. The purchase of corn are being distributed by organized societies. The President has directed the proper Federal officials to aid the poor in Durango, and also in other States where there is any suffering because of scarcity of provisions.

It is reported from Mexico that silver ores of a fabulous richness and value have recently been discovered near Tomimli, in the State of Durango, about four and one-half miles' mule ride from the port of Mazatlan, on the western coast of Mexico.

It is estimated that there are now 1,000 cases of the gripple in Montreal. About 2 per cent. of the police force are laid up with the disease.

NOTICES.

WESTWON BOARDING SCHOOL.—The General Committee meet in Philadelphia on Saturday, First Mo., 1892, at 11 o'clock a. m. The Committee on Instruction meet the same day, at 9 a. m.

WILLIAM EVANS, Clerk.

GWYNEDD MONTHLY MEETING will be held alternately at Plymouth and Norriswauka—at Plymouth on the even, and at Norriswauka in the odd months.

DIED, Twelfth Month 14, 1891, at her home in Salem, Ohio, of paralysis, EMELIE MAERKT, a member of the Salem Monthly Meeting, was born in Wartenberg in 1814, and came to this country when quite young with her father, Dr. Steinbofer, of the noted family of that name in Germany, and settled in Baltimore. About fifty-seven years ago she married Frederick Maerk, whom she survived nearly ten years. After their marriage they were both convinced of the truth of the Gospel as professed by Friends, and in due time were received as members. They continued firm in that faith and were diligent in the attendance of our religious meetings as long as able. This dear friend was increasingly concerned to know her duty in respect to the day, and was at various times favored with the evidence of her conviction, and her end should come. From the peaceful feeling pervading her chamber during her illness, which was short, we believe her hope was well grounded. "He that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast off."

At the residence of her brother-in-law, Robert H. Miller, in Salem, Ohio, on the 15th of Twelfth Month, 1891, DEBORAH DEWEES, in the sixty-fourth year of her age. A member of Salem Monthly Meeting. This dear friend was concerned to be found doing her Master's bidding, which led her to be ever reminding the poor, often exerting herself to the extent of her strength, ready to add to their comfort, and to encourage them in better ways than those who were afflicted, she would always turn with sympathy and aid. She had been in failing health for near a year, though was suddenly called away at last, and we trust, was found with her "Lamp trimmed and burning" ready for her lot of the "many mansions" which our Heavenly Father has prepared for those who love and serve Him.

—, on the 5th of Twelfth Month, 1891, at the residence of his uncle, Alva J. Smith, Emporia, Kansas, CLARKSON J. PENROSE, son of the late James and Margaret Penrose, in the twenty-first year of his age. A member of the Creek Monthly Meeting of Friends, Iowa. This dear youth passed through much suffering during the last five years of his life, which he bore with marked cheerfulness and patience.

—, on Tenth Month 16, 1891, at her late residence near Chester, Pa., LYDIA TRIMBLE, wife of Stephen M. Trimble, in the eightieth year of her age. A beloved member of Chester Monthly and Particular Meetings of Friends.

—, at her residence in West Chester, Pa., Twelfth Month 14, 1891, MARGARETTA WINDE, widow of William Winde and daughter of Thomas and Margaret J. Jencks, in her eighty-sixth year. This dear friend had for a considerable time been subjected to severe attacks of pain, which she bore with Christian patience and resignation. In her last illness she frequently quoted from the Bible, a book whose pages she loved to peruse whilst in health, together with the writings of early Friends. Her faculties remained clear and bright to the end, and she manifested interest in our beloved Society, and regretted when any of our members were deprived of its sheltering care. Near the close she quoted the following passage: "I leave with you, my peace I give unto you." The last words she uttered were, "I have the power of the sweet Psalmist of Israel—"Cast me not off in the time of old age: forsake me not when my strength faileth!"

Selections from the Journal of William Evans.

1850.—Fifth Month 29th. "Notice having been given at the Quarterly Meeting, we had a meeting at Mansfield; in which ability was given to preach the Gospel, and to invite the people to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, not only as He is our glorified Redeemer and Intercessor, at the right hand of the Father, but also as He appears in the heart, by his Spirit; to purge away sin by the administration of judgment, and his refining fire, so as to prepare man to hold communion with his Maker, and to follow Him in all his requirements. The meekness and lowliness of Christ, and the gentleness with which He deals with those who are brought to obey Him, and our duty to follow his example, were a little set forth."

"Sixth Month 2d. Attended their First-day Meeting at Rahway; in which there was a qualification vouchsafed, to search Jerusalem as with candles, and to warn some of the danger they were exposed to, through an eager pursuit of the world, and being drawn into an alliance with its fashions and customs; as well as from the influence of other spirits, who are at enmity with the cross of Christ, while professing a respect for religion. They were reminded, that while we might be courteous, as a Christian is bound to be, that love without obedience is of little more worth than faith without works. Our Lord declared, 'If a man love me, He will keep my words, and my Father will love him, and we will come into him, and make our abode with him.' It is only by obedience to the grace of Christ Jesus, that the heart can be changed and sanctified, and thus prepared for the Lord, to dwell in, by his Spirit. The matter being furnished, flowed freely, and many truths of the everlasting Gospel were clearly opened. The spirit of supplication being felt, prayer was put up. The minds of some were tenderly wrought upon; but a few of the worldly young men, though respectful, appeared to cast off or lightly esteem the obligations of religion, and the simplicity of its character and requirements."

"Attended the usual Mid-week Meeting at Westfield. The Master, I trust, qualified to enter a little into the state of the meeting, and to show that those who are faithful in a little, will be made rulers over more; and will be favored to see the beauty, order and strength of the church of Christ, the Lamb's wife; and as they persevere, receive gifts to be occupied in their respective places, to his honor, and the benefit one of another. The exercise of parents for the everlasting welfare of their children, on whose account, as they rightly value the salvation of their own souls, their prayers and tears will often be poured forth, was spread before them, and the tendering power of the Holy Spirit appeared to be over some. Samuel Leeds closed the opportunity with supplication for Divine preservation for us all, and with thanksgiving to our Heavenly Father, for the renewed visitation of his goodness at this time. I was clothed with weakness, and a sense of unworthiness, yet hoped the pure mind was stirred up in not a few. After dinner, my kind and attentive companion S. N. took me down to Camden, where we parted, with increased affection for each other. I then crossed the Delaware to my own home, where I found my beloved wife and family in good health, and glad to receive me. The feeling of sweet peace clothed my mind, with gratitude to the Lord for his preserving power, and the ability which He furnished for the work whereunto I believed He had called me."

"Seventh Month 4th. This morning, before rising, there seemed to be a gentle pointing to the Arch Street Meeting, where I had not been since the Quarterly Meeting. When there the life was low, and I felt borne down with discouraging thoughts; but finally the necessity of daily and hourly living in the fear of the Lord, and maintaining the watch, that we might be delivered from the various snares and temptations with which we are surrounded, came before me, with the intimation to rise with it. The importance of young people beginning early in life to cherish this fear, and the daily practice of watching against and resisting temptation, by the aid of the Lord's Holy Spirit, was spread before them. The apostle exhorted the believers to resist the devil and he would flee from them; which was found to be true by the Lord's children and servants, down to the present day. The declaration concerning Levi was, 'My covenant was with him of life and peace; and I gave them to him for the fear wherewith he feared me, and was afraid before my name.' As this holy fear is kept, the Captain of salvation will keep us, and establish us upon the immovable foundation; give us the testimony that we are his, and when the end comes, receive us into the arms of everlasting mercy, which will be of more value than all the world can give, could we possess it."

"9th. From an apprehension of duty, I went to the Northern District Meeting; and in the course of our silent waiting, the peace and safety of being brought to feel ourselves as the least of the Lord's children, came before me, with the testimony of the apostle Paul, that he was less than the least of all saints. It felt to me there was great sweetness of spirit enjoyed at times in this humble state. We were enabled in it, to bear being trampled on, if that was the Lord's will to permit it; while others may seem to reign as kings without us. Here we experience Divine support; and when we are let down into baptism and suffering for our own sakes, and the body's, our Lord will be with us; and when our faith has been tried, He will show himself to be the resurrection and the life; giving renewed qualification to speak to the praise of his excellent name. The language of encouragement was held out to some who had their peculiar trials to bear, that they might humble themselves as a little child, and thereby, according to our Lord's doctrine, be great in the kingdom of heaven. For if there is anything pertaining to us, that will bear the name of greatness, it is in being constantly clothed with the garment of humility."

"28th. This morning I went to Germantown, in order to be at the meeting there; having a secret drawing to be with them. The testimony was raised, that the Lord's tender mercies are still over all his works; extended even to the rebellious, and to those who love and serve Him. I was enabled to declare of the new and living way, that was opened by the blood of Jesus, and of the gift of grace purchased by Him; by obedience to which, all may come to have access to God by this new way, and to worship Him in spirit, and pour forth their prayers to Him. To the rebellious, the danger of neglecting the proffered salvation, by suffering the day of visitation to pass away unimproved, was held out. Those who have given up and made sacrifices, but from whom the Beloved of souls had hid his face, were encouraged to keep fast hold of their faith, however much reduced, and He would, when the dispensation had accomplished its purpose, again cause his face to shine upon them, show them with clearness their duties in his church, and give wisdom and strength to fulfil them. The aged who held fast their integrity to the Lord, when the powers of body and mind were weakening, would know Him who took them in his arms in the day of their espousals, to renew their strength as the eagle; enabling them to rise above the tribulations of time, and animate them with holy hope and confidence, that in the end an admittance would be granted into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. I hoped there were some serious and cheering feelings brought over the different classes."

"Eighth Month 26th. Was held Chester Monthly Meeting at Springfield, and a pretty large company gathered. I was fervently engaged to warn Friends of the danger of making idols of the temporal blessings with which we are so abundantly surrounded; forgetting and neglecting the duties and the gratitude which we owe to the Great Giver. For all these things, we must give account in the day of judgment. If we are delighting and aggrandizing ourselves with them, and growing in self-importance, the language from one of the holy watchers may go forth, 'Hew down the tree, and cut off the branches;' and awful will be the condition of such. Such were called upon to come again to Bethel, and through holy help, renew their covenants with the Lord; that so they may again experience that humility and tenderness, which they were once favored with. It was a solemn opportunity, in which I hoped the Truth had the dominion; and Friends parted with feelings of near affection."

"Ninth Month 10th. Went to the North Meeting; which, for the middle of the week, was quite large. I sat, perhaps, nearly an hour, during which many presentations passed before me. Finally the happy condition of those who were brought as children into the Lord's family, and were preserved in it to the end, even to old age, came livingly before me; and through the blessed openings of the Key of David, I was enabled to enlarge upon the progress, baptisms, preservations and deliverances of these, to the comfort and strength, I hope, of some present. To those who had been often called, yet turned the back upon the heavenly vocation, a voice of solemn warning went forth; and the mourners were encouraged to hold fast their confidence firm to the end. I came away with a peaceful, cheered mind."

"Tenth Month 5th. I am sixty-three years old this day. Thoughts of the race being nearly run; and the possibility of its being brought to a close earlier than I may anticipate, produce feelings of a serious kind, and desires to be making ready for the solemn moment of death.

"6th. First-day morning, in our meeting, I was constrained to testify, that a manifestation of the Holy Spirit was given to every man, to enable him to work out his salvation. That it reveals sin in the heart, and affords the strength which alone can deliver from it. This grace and truth come by Jesus Christ; who not only was offered upon the cross, a propitiatory sacrifice for the sins of all mankind, but also purchased for all, this Divine Grace, which teacheth us to deny all ungodliness, and the world's lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world. As it is obeyed, it regenerates the dark heart, and gives true faith in the Son of God, and prepares us to receive a Divine understanding of the Scriptures; which were written by holy men under the guidance of the Spirit of Christ. It alone can give a true sense and belief of them. It felt to me that there were some present who had fallen into a state of unbelief, through the despite which they had committed against this grace; and by trampling under foot the blood of the covenant, by which alone they can be sanctified, they were nigh to denying the Lord that bought them. The great change that had been wrought in many unbelievers, who were brought to receive Christ into their hearts and to obey Him, so that they experienced, like the man out of whom the devils were cast, what it is to be clothed and in their right mind; and who then desired and loved nothing so much as to sit at Jesus' feet, was laid before them. He who appeared in the midst of his disciples, the doors being shut, and called on Thomas to put his fingers into the print of the nails, and thrust his hand into the hole in his side, made by the soldier's spear, and be not faithless, but believing, and when Thomas had done so, and said, my Lord and my God; is an omnipresent, as well as omnipotent Saviour. Not only all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hid in Him; but all powers in heaven and in earth is given unto Him; and He alone can give true faith, and enable us to believe in Him, and give power to become the sons of God. Many things connected with the work of salvation, until we come to be established upon Him, the Rock and Foundation, against which the gates of hell cannot prevail, were opened."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

An Address to the Citizens of Pennsylvania and New Jersey on Horse Racing and its attendant Evils. By the Representatives of the Religious Society of Friends for Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware. Issued Twelfth Month 18, 1891.

Among the great variety of popular diversions that have been resorted to for pastime or relaxation from the pressure of daily cares, there are some which from their very nature must prove of serious injury to those who pursue them, and detrimental to the highest interests of the community. To this class we believe Horse-Racing, when considered in all its bearings, will be found undoubtedly to belong. The cruelty thereby inflicted upon a noble animal, whose faithful services to mankind should be requited only by kind treatment and consideration on our part, is sufficient reason for condemning a sport, which, under the pressure of whip and spur, exacts from him the utmost of his powers.

When, therefore, men seek amusement by methods which do violence to the Divine law of love, and inflict suffering or abuse upon the creatures which God has given to their control, but which He has also placed under their protection, it is not strange if their standard of morals becomes thereby lowered, the noble instincts of their nature are blunted, and their tastes depraved. These can scarcely fail to be recognized by the careful observer, as among the direct results that follow an indulgence in the practice under consideration.

The evils resulting to the public from horse-racing have been so recognized by the moral part of the community, both in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, that laws have been enacted from time to time to effect its suppression. So long ago as the year 1820, the Legislature of Pennsylvania placed on her Statute Book the following law: "All racing, running, pacing or trotting of horses, &c., for money, goods or chattels, or other valuable things, shall be and hereby are declared to be common nuisances and offences against this State; and the authors, parties, contrivers and abettors thereof shall be prosecuted and proceeded against by indictment." By the second section of this Act the horses used in such races were forfeited to the County.

It further provided that all wagers and bets made on racing should be void, and the loser, by action at law, might recover from the winner the money so paid; that all persons contributing money to make up a purse for racing, should be liable to a fine of thirty dollars for each offence.

The Act imposes a fine of twenty dollars on any person who should print, or set up any advertisement mentioning the time or place of such race. The suits for these offences and the penalties attached are directed by the Act to be prosecuted by the Overseers of the poor of the Township, or the Supervisor of the highways, and in case of their failure to do so, a fine of ten dollars is imposed upon such defaulting officers.

The above law is still in force, except that the clause relating to the forfeiture of the horses is relaxed in the case of "regularly incorporated trotting associations," by a statute passed in 1891.

By a statute of New Jersey, passed in 1863, "All racing by running, pacing or trotting of horses for money or other valuable thing, or where twenty or more persons are assembled together, shall be and are hereby declared to be offences against the State, and the authors, parties, contrivers and abettors thereof, and all and every other person or persons concerned therein, either directly or indirectly, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or imprisonment not exceeding six months or both, at the discretion of the Court. Provided that this section shall not apply to fairs or exhibitions of any agricultural or other incorporated society."

The subsequent sections of the above Act provide that all persons who shall bet or wager upon the racing of horses, or who shall be a stakeholder of any such wager, or shall print or set up any paper or other thing advertising such race, or shall ride or drive any horse therein, or shall collect or contribute any money, or ask others to contribute for a purse or wager as aforesaid, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both, at the discretion of the Court.

It also provides that if any person shall rent or let his or her land for the purpose of a race course, or shall knowingly permit such racing upon lands belonging to him, such persons shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, at the discretion of the Court.

It is a serious fact that with such positive prohibitions of this sport and its attendant practices of betting and gambling, horse-racing is more prevalent of late years in both Pennsylvania and New Jersey than perhaps ever before. Men who profess to be law-abiding and reputable citizens in other respects appear to be unscrupulous in breaking these laws openly and defiantly.
